A shriek that pierced through the apartment alarmed the members of the Lodge, who, all rushing to the door, and finding that Miss St. Leger had been in the room during the ceremony, resolved, it is said, in the paroxysm of their rage, to put the fair spectatress to death; but at the moving and earnest supplication of her youngest brother, her life was spared, on condition of her going through the two remaining steps of the solemn ceremony she had unlawfully witnessed. This she consented to, and they conducted the beautiful and terrified young lady through those trials which are sometimes more than enough for masculine resolution, little thinking they were taking into the bosom of their craft a member that would afterward reflect a luster on the annals of Masonry.

Miss St. Leger was directly descended from Sir Richard de St. Leger, who accompanied William the Conqueror to England, and was of that high repute that he, with his own hand, supported the prince when he first went out of his ship to land in Sussex. Miss St. Leger was cousin to General Anthony St. Leger, Governor of St. Lucia, who instituted the interesting race, and the celebrated Doncaster St. Leger stakes. Eventually she married Richard Aldworth, Esq., of Newmarket, a member of a highly honorable and ancient family. Whenever a benefit was given at any of the theaters in Dublin or Cork, for the Masonic Female Orphan Asylum, Mrs. Aldworth walked at the head of the Freemasons, with her apron and other insignia of Freemasonry, and sat in the front row of the stage box. The house was always crowded on these occasions. The portrait of this estimable woman is in the lodge-room of almost every lodge in Ireland.

Birth of Islands in the Pacific.

Almost as fast as the coral insects build, the sand, always suspended and washed about in sea water, fills up the cells and pores and interstices of the minute masonry, while broken remnants of dead coral and other matter thrown up by the sea are caught and cemented to the growing wall, and form a solid mass with it as high as the common tides reach. When that limit is attained, and the surface of the reef is now out of or even with the water, the labor of the coralligenous zoophyte is over, the sea gradually recedes, the rampart rises, the limed debris or fragments upon it, being now rarely covered with water, and dried by the sun, lose their adhesiveness and become brittle remnants, forming what is called sometimes a key upon the top of the reef, from the Spanish Cayo.

This new bank is, of course, not long in being visited by sea birds; salt plants take root upon it, branches of floating sea-weed are caught and entangled by it; muscles and crabs, and echimises, and turtles, and krakens, perhaps crawl upon it and leave their shells, and a soil begins to be formed. By and by a cocoanut, or the drupe of a tropical pandenus is thrown ashore; land birds light on it and deposit the seeds of shrubs and trees, and augment it perhaps with a layer of guano. Every high tide, and still more every gale, adds something to the bank in the shape of matter wrecks organic or inorganic. At length appears the blue hummock of a tropical island, and last of all comes man to take possession, cast there by Providence, and glad not to have the sea his grave, or in quest of discovery and gain.

A New Propeller for Steamers.

Professor Crestadoro has just secured, under the new patent law of England, an interesting scheme for propelling vessels. He considers the use of paddles or blades to be a mistake similar to that which so long prevailed in the application of locomotives on railroads, and which materially retarded the progress of that invention, when, taking for granted the inability of the plain circumference of the wheels to propel the carriage, much labor and skill had been wasted in the contrivance of levers, which acted on the road in a manner somewhat resembling the feet of the horse. Now, as the apprehended insufficiency of the plain circumference of the wheels with the road to propel the carriage has been proved a fallacy, so he considers the necessity of paddles or blades, of whatever description they may be, as altogether fallacious, and that the best and cheapest method of improving the propeller is to use simply the plain circumference of a cylindrical drum.

It is a natural supposition, that a plain round surface should have no tractic adhesion with the water; but on close examination it will be found that not only such is not the case, but, what is even more surprising, the tractic adhesion of a plain cylindrical drum is far greater than that of a paddle-wheel of equal size. Taking, for instance, the steam-vessel Atlantic, whose paddle-wheels are of 35 feet diameter, and length of paddles 12 feet 6 inches, supposing a moderate immersion of 5 feet paddles—one pair of drums of equal size at equal immersion would displace a pair of cubic segments of about 135,631 lbs. of water; or, what amounts to the same thing, a pressure of not less than 60 tuns would act upon the drums as a tractic adhesion, which is by far superior to that afforded by the best method of paddle-wheels in the most favorable circumstances. Now, the cylindrical propeller has the substantial advantage that it can be, when reduced to a moderate diameter, applied as well totally immersed, if it be (as proposed by the patentee) fitted into a semi-cylindrical case, with only such a clearance as is just sufficient to let the drum have a proper action, the other half-drum or semi-cylinder projecting out of the case for the propelling action.

Female Intemperance in England.

We cut the following from the British Friend, a monthly journal, published in Glasgow, devoted to the interests of the Society of Friends. The statistics disclose a remarkable and appalling proportion of females among the frequenters of the tippling shops of that city.

"On Saturday evening, July 12, 1851, there entered into a spirit-shop in Princes-st., between the hours of ten and twelve, 173 males, 365 females, and 38 youths. On Saturday evening, August 9, in a spirit-shop in King-st., between the same hours, 109 males, 247 females, and 41 youths. On Saturday evening, Aug. 16, between the same hours, into a cellar in Stirling-st., 96 males, 105 females, and 117 youths. On Saturday evening, Aug. 23, between the same hours, 60 males, 103 females, and 17 youths, entered a shop in High-st. On Saturday evening, Aug. 30, between the same hours, there entered into one in Stirling-st., 116 males, 149 females, and 14 youths; and on the 6th September, into a spirit cellar in Main-st., Gorbals, there entered 75 males, 111 females, and 13 youths. These facts show, in a striking light, not only the awful prevalence of drunkenness, but the fearful proportion of its female victims."

The way to Pull Turnips.—The Yankee grasps the root by its top, and pulls it with his hand, and then cuts off the tops with a knife. The Englishman has a better way. He sharpens his hoe, and passing along, cuts with a single stroke, the tops of the turnip; then, with the same implement, strikes under it, so as to cut off the tap-root, and brings it out of the earth. In cutting off the tops, he guides his hoe so as to throw them into a sort of row in one place, and, in digging, he guides it so as to throw the roots together in another row. He will dig the roots about four times as fast as one Yankee, with his pulling and knife.

Oswego Corn Starch Factory.

The Oswego Times states that the building in which Corn Starch is manufactured, in that city, has recently been furnished with an iron frame, pillars and braces of that material being introduced to displace the decayed wooden beams. This frame is five stories high, and weighs 300,000 pounds. The buildings occupy a space of one and a half acres, and light is introduced from the roofs, by skylights. About 100 men are employed in the manufacture of the starch, and the machinery used in the factory weighs over half a million pounds. The following are some of the items: three cast-iron cauldrons, containing 1,000 gallons eight lifting pumps, discharging 80,000 gallons, of starch per hour, five rotary and force pumps of the capacity of 5000 gallons per minute, one mile of water-pipes, 200 vats, capable of holding 800,000 gallons, four pair of cast-iron rollers, weighing 10,000 pounds each. There are annually consumed in this factory, nearly 200,000 bushels of corn, 800 tons of coal, and 800,000 feet of lumber, for boxes, &c. The daily product is about 10,000 pounds of starch. This manufacture is a recent thing; the delicacy which it provides for the table not being known a few years since. Oswego has been benefited largely by its discovery and the enterprise which has set in operation a manufactory on so extensive a scale. Competition, however, is admissible, and has already commenced. In a short time, the dainty article of diet will be universally known and used, imparting nourishment and vigor to the human system as well as uprightness and a decent gloss to shirt collars and linen.

Appearance of the Sultan.

A correspondent of the New York Tribune thus speaks of the appearance of the Sultan: "Abdul-Medjid" is a man about thirty, though he looks older. He has a mild, amiable, weak face, dark eyes, a prominent nose, and short, dark brown moustaches and beard. His face is thin and wrinkles are already making their appearance about the corners of his mouth and eyes. But for a certain vacancy of expression, he would be called a handsome man. He sits on a horse with much ease and grace, though there is a slight stoop in his shoulders. His legs are crooked, owing to which cause he appears awkward when on his feet, though he wears a long cloak to conceal the deformity. Sensual indulgence has weakened a constitution not naturally strong, and increased that mildness which has now become a defect in his character. He is not stern enough to be just, and his subjects are less fortunate under his easy rule than under the rod of his savage father, Mahmoud. He was dressed in a style of the utmost richness and elegance. He wore a red Turkish Fez, with an immense rosette of brilliants, and a long, floating plume of bird-of-paradise feathers. The diamond in the center of the rosette is of unusual size; it was picked up some years ago in the Hippodrome, and probably belonged to the Treasury of the Greek Emperors. The breast and collar of his coat were one mass of diamonds, and sparkled in the early sun with a thousand rainbow gleams. His mantle of dark blue cloth hung to his knees, concealing the deformity of his legs. He wore white pantaloons, white kid gloves, and patent leather boots, thrust into his golden stirrups.

A Tartar Hot-House.

Sometimes the travelers slept in their tent, which was apt to be very cold; and sometimes in a house, which was apt to be extremely hot; in fact, they slept on a furnace when in a native house. The entire household was in one large room, where all the cooking, eating, sleeping, talking and scolding went on—to say nothing of smoking and gambling. In the midst of the apartment there is always a large raised counter, on which everybody sits and lies down to sleep. In one end of this counter boilers are inserted for the cooking, and the heat from the furnace passes into the interior of the "kang," as the counter is called, affording a warm bed to everybody. A reed matting, or a floor of planks, is spread under the sleeper; but if he do not accurately understand how to place the reeds or the planks, he is likely to be "done brown" on one side, while the other may be stiff with cold. If this is cleverly managed, there is still much which is not exactly conducive to sleep; for instance, swarms of vermin, clouds of tobacco, and the fumes of the burning dung, of garlic, and rancid oil, such as the cotton wick is floating in. Then there is the gossip of one party, who may like to lie awake very late, chatting over their tea; or of another, who may prefer having their tea in the middle of the night; or of a third, who may want it before they go out at daybreak. On the whole, we feel that whenever we travel there, we shall prefer the tent, if we can but keep up any vital warmth in us at all. In a tent one can at least have a choice of posture, whereas in a Tartar inn, the sleepers on a kang, if numerous, must lie in a circle, with their feet all together in the middle.

Filling Teeth over Exposed Nerves.—Dr. S. P. Hullihen, of Wheeling, Va., has discovered a method whereby the cavities of teeth over exposed nerves may be successfully plugged up. It is this: The diseased parts of the tooth are removed, to make it apparent that the nerve is exposed. The fang is then perforated through the gum, into the nerve cavity. The opening should be of about the size of a small knitting needle. Its object is to open the bloodvessels of the nerve, which will at once be known by the flow of arterial blood. The cavity of the tooth may then be filled without the least fear of pain or ill consequences. This plan has been successfully practiced in a great number of cases. Hitherto, a tooth having an exposed nerve could not be filled, and prevent pain and toothache.

A New Hungarian Colony in Iowa.—Mr. Perezel, who was deputizedby a large number of Hungarians, in Jersey, England, and Paris, France, to act for them, made a purchase last month of two townships, situated near Davenport, in Iowa, for a Hungarian colony, and in the spring the great body of the purchasers design emigrating to this country and settling upon their purchase. Among the number are many persons who have distinguished themselves in the legislatures of their country, and in the recent revolutions. They are Gen. Moritz Perezel, Field Marshal and Minister of War; Count Ladislaus Lisaky; Mr. Foldvary, a wealthy capitalist, and Minister of Justice in the Republic, and others. It is designed to furnish each person in indigent circumstances with forty acres of land, at the Government price, on credit.

Doings in Europe in 1852.—At a meeting of the London Society of the Friends of Italy, held on the 10th of November, Mazzini described the horrible butcheries which have recently taken place, and said he that day received the further information that 27 more victims had been shot at Ancona:—

"We have wholesale butcheries, as you see, in the states of the church, and we have wholesale condemnations, not to death, but to the galleys for life or for twenty years, at Naples. We have wholesale arrests of 100 to 250 persons in Lombardy. These arrests are most likely to lead to condemnations and to executions, like those at Sinigaglia and at Ancona. It is only two months since one of my personal friends strangled himself with his cravat the first day of his entering a dungeon of Austria; and he did this in the fear of his being induced, by physical tortures, which they in Austria do apply, to reveal certain secrets. A few days ago, again, another man of the party, not a personal friend of mine, but an extremely well-known medical man of Lodi, in Lombardy, endeavored to cut his throat, and did half succeed, in the moment of his passing the threshold of an Austrian prison. Everywhere, indeed, in Italy, men are being arrested en masse—at Milan, at Verona and at Mantua. 220 prisoners at Mantua have been beaten in their prisons with sticks until they have bled. That is a fact communicated by them to their families—they writing this information to their families in blood on their linen.

A Noble Example.—The Chicago Tribune heads the following paragraph "A Noble Example," and with reason:—

The other day, having need of help from a drayman, we called an Irishman to our assistance. He performed his duty with great promptness, and his language and demeanor generally were such as to command our admiration. Having paid him for his trouble, the following conversation ensued: "How long have you been in this city?" we inquired "Twelve months to-morrow, sir," he politely replied. "Pray, what was your occupation in the old country?" For a moment the man colored, and dropped his head, but in an instant after, raising himself with the dignity of a man, he boldly replied: "I was a physician in Dublin." Somewhat surprised, we asked how it was that he was now driving a dray. His reply in substance was, that he brought his family direct from Dublin to Chicago; that when he arrived here his funds were so much exhausted that he was unable to maintain the appearance of his profession; besides, he found the city full of young physicians waiting till the city grew. Having no mechanical trade, he purchased a horse and dray, and at once began to earn a livelihood for himself and family. We call this a noble specimen of a man. How much more independent and happy that man had spent the year than if he had been idle and complaining of fortune all that time.

A College Joke.—A short time since a large and heavy box was received at Brunswick by railroad from Augusta, directed to President Woods, of Bowdoin College. The latter, rejoicing in the anticipation of a large and splendid donation of the fruits of the midnight oil to the alcoves of his already beautiful college library, caused the box to be opened, when there was disclosed the chapel bell of Waterville College, with a polite note to Professor Woods from the quasi faculty of Waterville, stating that, highly approving of the system of international exchanges projected by Mons. Vattemare, they thought the scheme might be productive of genial results if brought into exercise between sister colleges; and acting upon this suggestion, they had sent their chapel bell, which they hoped President Woods would accept as a token of their regard, and, in return, trusted he would send them the chapel bell of Bowdoin. The joke was decidedly too heavy to take, and the box was headed up with its contents, to be returned to Waterville. But as it remained at the depot awaiting transportation, the Bowdoin boys, as is easily supposed, spirited it away, and perhaps ere this it has safely arrived at Harvard, Yale, or some other University.

Exporting Acorns.—The Bradford (Pa.) Reporter gives us the following paragraph in regard to a new article of export: "On Thursday last, Burton Kingsbery, Esq., of this place, shipped at the Waverly Depot, seventy-three bushels of acorns, destined for Belgium and Holland. Mr. K. is agent for gentlemen of great wealth, owning land in this County, who ordered these acorns for the purpose of introducing the oak into those countries. They comprise five different varieties of this stately tree, and were collected in Litchfield and Windham. A few bushels previously forwarded to Belgium, arrived in such good order, germinating and giving promise of excellent success for the experiment, that the gentlemen interested have made this large order. The corns are first carefully kiln-dried, boxed, and forwarded to New York, where they are put up in air-tight tin boxes, to stand the voyage. This is truly planting for the benefit of posterity—for generations must pass away before the products of the noble forest trees of Bradford will wave their branches in similar grandeur in Holland and Belgium."

Canker Worms.—The little insects, or grubs, which are responsible for the canker worms of next Spring, are now ascending the trees in great numbers, and they will continue so to do on every warm day until their hateful progeny appears. They should be nipped in the bud—crushed in the egg. Thousands have already gone up, but hundreds of thousands are to follow. Boring trees and filling them with sulphur, and all similiar expedients, have been found to be worthless. There is but one effectual way to destroy them, and that is by the use of leaden troughs filled with oil. The oil should never be permitted to dry up for a day during the winter. Many of our beautiful elms have been nearly destroyed by the canker worms. We believe, however, that the public trees have been faithfully guarded the present year. Those who have not protected their fruit or ornamental trees by oil troughs, will find that although the season is late for the best use of this remedy, it will nevertheless prove to be of great value even now. LITERATURE AND MUSIC
OF THE German Seventh-day Baptists of Pennsylvania.

BY WILLIAM M. FAHNESTOCK, M. D.

One of the speakers at the recent Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society, held at Plainfield, Elder James Bailey, if my memory serves me aright, announced the lamentable fact, that the Seventh-[illegible]aptists have no denominational literature; [illegible]umiliating as was that announcement, yet the speaker told a truth, so far as he understood the matter; and but few persons, perhaps, are more conversant with the affairs of the immediate branch of the family of Sabbath-keepers to which he is attached, (the English branch,) than himself, and doubtless he told it with the best, the purest motives, namely, to excite some emulation among the denomination to take effective measures towards a consummation so devoutly to be wished. Knowing the motive of the speaker, and desiring, equally, to see the good purpose he was advocating so ably, carried out, I refrained from claiming some qualification for the laudable efforts of my German brethren of Pennsylvania, in this department of labor, upwards of a century since; who, unquestionably, produced more original literature, in the same period, than any religious denomination, in any country, in the peculiar circumstances under which they labored at that day, (1730,) in founding their ancient Institution in a wilderness.

For the information of those who have not read my "Historical Sketch," published nearly eighteen years since, in Hazard's Register of Pennsylvania, it may be proper to premise, that in starting a settlement, founding a Church, de novo—casting aside all human traditions, creeds, confessions, &c. &c., and falling back on the Scriptures for all their doctrines and all their ordinances—our People at Ephrata were constantly employed at the hardest labor, to provide buildings to shelter themselves, chapels for worship, mills, and innumerable other buildings, to carry on the affairs of their enterprise; all of which was prepared by hand, from the rudest materials, even to the sawing of all the boards used in their extensive buildings; yet, with all their multifarious labors to establish a community which might support itself, and at the same time subjecting themselves to every possible privation and self-denial to accomplish that end—lying on benches for beds, and using blocks of wood for pillows—to restrict themselves to so frugal a diet, that they ate all their meals off flat wooden plates not over six inches in diameter, and withal gave an hour in the morning, an hour at eventide, and an hour at midnight, to prayer and praise, in their chapels; for there were two chapels, one for the brethren connected with the Brother's House, Bethania, and one for the sisters connected with the Sister's House, Saron, besides the general "Saal," the common Meeting House; yet, amid all this labor and devotion, they found time to write hymns and compose music, almost without limit, and publish ponderous works—original works—which have excited the astonishment and the admiration of succeeding ages.

Many of the brethren being men of education, they established at an early period a school, which soon gained for itself an honorable reputation abroad, and many young men of Philadelphia and Baltimore were sent to this nursery of learning to receive their entire education. The first known Sabbath-School in the world was established by them, and was kept in successful operation full thirty years before the like efforts were made by the world-renowned philanthropist Robert Raikes, at Gloucester, England. See my article on that subject in the Sabbath-School Visitor. Watson, in his Annals of Pennsylvania, says: "They were remarkable, as a community, in being fine Latinists—writing and speaking Latin as readily as their vernacular tongue. Men in Philadelphia, who sought good classical education for their sons, used to send them there; and I have known some who were educated there who used to correspond with some of the brethren in Latin." The Declaration of Independence was sent to Ephrata, at the instance of the Hon. Charles Thompson, Secretary of that ever-memorable Congress, and was translated into seven languages, by Peter Miller, to be sent to the different Courts of Europe.

Such men could not sit down in supineness, or idleness; thye were working men and men-of-all-work. They would cut timber in the forest, drag it home themselves, hew it into scantling, frame it into the most spacious buildings, saw it by hand into boards, be their own joiners, their own masons and plasterers, make the nails, work the farm, manufacture their linen and cloth, pray, preach, write their hymns, compose their music, make their paper, print and bind their own books, and this not by one, or by sets, to each department, but from one to the other as occasion required, and as facility to aid could be acquired by such willing hands. They were, emphatically, working men and working women, and they accomplished more, I boldly assert, for the times, and under the circumstances, than any other People of the age in which their labor was prosecuted, and I challenge the annals of the country to the proof.

As early as 1732, only four years after they first started their labors, they had written a volume of hymns, entitled "Vorspiel der Neuen Welt," which was printed for them by Benjamin Franklin, in English letter, there being no German type at that time in the Province; and in 1739 they had a Hymn Book, of eight hundred pages, double columns, original and selected hymns, printed in German letter, by Christopher Sauer, of Germantown, Pa., called "Zionitischer Weyrauchs Hügel." Soon after this issue, though at great sacrifice of personal wants, and without any particular knowledge of the printing business, they purchased the materials for a printing establishment, put it into operation with wonderful expedition, and besides printing hymns, tracts, and pamphlets without number, issued the following original works from their own press:—

1. Urständliche und Erfahrungs-volle Hohe Zeugnüsse Wie man zum Geistliche Leben und dessen Vollkommenheit gelangen möge, &c., &c., 1745, pp. 58, quarto.

2. Mystiche und Erfahrungs-volle Epistlen, &c., &c., (containing seventy-three Theosophische Epistlen,) 1745, pp. 294, quarto.

3. Das Gesäng der einsamen und verlassenen Turtel Taube, nämlich der Christlichen Kirke, &c., &c. Von einen FRIEDSAM und nach der stillen Ewigkeit wallenden Pilger, &c., 1747, pp. 500, quarto.

4. Erster Theil der Theosopischen Lectionen, Betreffende die Schulen des einsamen Lebens, 1752, pp. 432, quarto.

5. Nachklang zum Gesäng der einsamen Turtel Taube, Enthaltend eine neue Sammlung Geistlicher Lieder. 1755, pp. 112, quarto.

6. Ein Angenehmer Geruch der Rosen und Lilien, Die im Thal der Demuth unter den Dornen hervor gewachsen. Alles aus der Brüderlichen Gesellschafft in BETHANIA. 1756, pp. 30, quarto.

7. Ein Angenehmer Geruch der Rosen und Lilien, &c., &c. Alles aus der Schweslerlichen Gesellschafft in SARON. 1756, pp. 44.

8. Neu-vermerhtes Gesäng der einsamen Turtel Taube. 1762, pp. 330, duod.

9. Der Andere Theil der Theosophischen Lectionen. MS. 1762, pp. 918. This volume is the second part of the Erster Thiel der Theosopischen Lectionen, (4.) of upwards of nine hundred pages of beautiful manuscript, which I have in my possession, and which has never been printed.

10. Paradisches Wunderspiel, Welches sich in diesen letzen zeiten und Tagen in denen Aben-landischen Welt-Theilen, als ein Vorspiel der neuen Welt hervor-gethan. 1766, pp. 472, large quarto, double columns. This is the large hymn book—a select collection of their original, general hymns, for they multiplied hymns for every special occasion, and particularly on the death of each member of the Society, called Gedächlniss-Lied—Hymn of Remembrance—which was written and sung at the funeral or at the Love-Feast held for each respective member, called Gedächtnissfest. On turning over some of those occasional hymns, before me, on loose sheets, I find one for a special prayer day—I presume a general, public fast day, as it is entitled, allgemienen—February 19, 1795. Aside from hundreds of these, which are not embraced in the volume before me, it contains four hundred and forty-one hymns, written by Beissel; seventy-four by the single brethren, one of which contains two hundred and sixteen verses; one hundred by the single sisters, one of which contains two hundred and fifty verses; and one hundred and eleven by the members of the Society settled in the neighborhood; making, together, seven hundred and fifty hymns. Singular evidence of singular facility at metrical composition, of devotional composition of high order, in a single church—productions which have stood the test of more than a century. The whole community were not only singularly fertile in metrical composition, but were imbued with deep poetical thought, which displayed itself, not only in the themes, but often in the titles of their hymns and their books. For instance, their early Hymn Book, (3.) published 1747, was called, The hymns of the solitary and forsaken Turtle Dove—the Christian Church. Then comes a response, (5,) 112 pages, with the beautiful title, Echoes to the notes of the Solitary Turtle Dove; and, again, (6 and 7,) one by the Brethren and the other by the Sisters, with the same title: Savor or Fragrance of the Roses and Lillies, growing beneath the Thorns in the Valley of Humility; (6,) containing 30 pages, quarto, is wholly occupied by one hymn, of 311 verses, written conjointly by the Brethren. The first verse invokes them all to join in the praises of Brotherlove, and each one qualified supplies a portion; in all of which Brotherlove is exalted and cherished, in the warmest and the most lovely strains.

11. Diliciæ Ephratenses, Pars I. Oder des ehrwüdigen Vaters Friedsam Goltrecht, Weyland Stifters und Führers des Christlichen Ordens der Einsamen in Ephrata, Pennsylvania—Christliche Reden. 1773, pp. 340, quarto. I have not succceed in my efforts to find a second part of this work, in print or in manuscript, and therefore have come to the conclusion, that it must be lost, as the title implies that there was, at least, a second volume. For this work a frontispiece was engraved on copper, (the same having previously been cut in wood or type-metal,) and impressions of it have been imprinted or pasted on some of the other works. It consists of a circle of about three inches in diameter, having an altar in the foreground, on which is placed a nest of young birds, reaching up their little necks, with open bills, and extending their short pinions to receive the mother with a branch of fruit in her beak. At the right is an humble cottage, and at a distance on the left is a castle, with mountains in the horizon. On the front of the altar is the following motto: NON OMNIBUS SIMUL, and beneath, crossing a short segment of the circle: "Diliciæ Ephratenses;" while round the margin is displayed a significant legend from the eighty-fourth Psalm: "Invenit Hirundo nidum Jehova altaria tua."

12. Chronicon Ephratense. Enthaltend des Lebens-Lauf des ehrwürdigen Vaters in Christo Frieidsam Gottrecht, &c., &c. Zusammen getragen von Br. Lamech and Agrippa. 1786, pp. 250, large quarto.

To attempt an analysis of these works, and exhibit their merits in any appreciable manner, without examining their principles in detail, and pointing out their errors, (for I do not pretend that they are free from errors, even in a literary sense,) would require the unlimited pages of a Quarterly Review; therefore, in writing for a weekly print, I can merely name the titles of the works, and indicate the extent of their labors in this field, by giving the number of pages, written and printed, so far as I have been able to collect them. I must, however, remark, en passant, that the prominent characteristic of their literature—their hymns, their letters, their lessons, their discourses, and their disquisitions—is unaffected devotion, mixed with much mystical allegory, in magnifying the principle of Wisdom, constantly shadowed forth in the heavenly Sophia, and applying it to single life, in seclusion from the world; yet, constantly supported, beautifully, by much Scripture, and in turn beautifully illustrating the Inspired Word. This makes many of their hymns, and most of their writings, unintelligible to persons who have not some considerable inkling, a particular insight into their peculiar Institution, and renders a version into English very difficult and unsatisfactory. To comprehend them clearly and fully, one has to read himself into a "stand point," from which he can perceive, at a glance, the prominent idea that underlies nearly all their productions; for, conceiving the fundamental truths of the Bible—the doctrines and the ordinances of the household of faith—to be so clearly set forth in the New Testament, and which they taught so strikingly in their walk and conversation, most of their writings were devoted to commending the "einsam leben," single, solitary life, to be the better prepared for marriage with the heavenly Sophia. In elaborating their views on this subject, they dilated largely on such passages as the following, from the writings of the Apostle Paul: "They that are after the flesh, do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the spirit, the things of the spirit." "He that is not married, careth for the things that belong unto the Lord, how he may please the Lord; but he that is married careth for the things of the world, how he may please his wife. There is this difference between a wife and a virgin; the unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy, both in body and in spirit; but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband; I say, therefore, to the unmarried and widows, It is good for them if they abide even a I." And they adduce the following passage from the Revelation of John, to show that those who sacrifice the lusts of the flesh, and live pure virgins for Christ's sake, will possess greater capacities for holy things, and enjoy the first places in glory: "I looked up, and lo, a Lamb stood on Mount Zion, and with him an hundred and forty and four thousand, having his Father's name written on their foreheads. And I heard a voice from heaven, as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of great thunder; and I heard the voice of harpers harping with their harps; and they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four beasts, and the elders; and no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty and four thousand, which were redeemed from the earth. These are they that are not defiled with women; for they are virgins. These are they which follow the Lamb wheresoever he goeth. These are redeemed from among men, being the first fruits unto God and unto the Lamb." In these writings they displayed a great deal of thought and genius.

Beissel's dissertation on the Fall of Man is one of the most singular productions of any age, and as singularly able as it is singular. On the fundamental or radical doctrines and ordinances of the Gospel, he is clear enough; and from the fact of being a pioneer and founder of a Sabbatarian Church, without previous knowledge of there being such an organization in existence, in any part of the world, or ever having read any thing on the subject, his first tract, Mysterion Anomias, written while he belonged to the first-day German Brethren, at Mühlbach, and published in 1725, which caused his separation from that body, is truly forcible, truly remarkable. So likewise with his discourses and disquisitions on Baptism, the Lord's Supper, &c., &c.; but having at heart the establishing of the whole, connected with the predominant idea of the einsam leben, which he found working so admirably in the outset, he could scarcely write without some digression, and tincturing every thing he touched with that coloring. This, however, was not the case with the contributions of the married members. There never was any prohibition against marriage, nor any distinction between single brethren and single sisters and the married portion, in respect to church fellowship and church privileges, although celibacy very soon came to be regarded as a great virtue, as conferring peculiar facilities for and peculiar privileges in spiritual life—greater capabilities for spiritual enjoyment. This einsam leben—modified monastic life—although it was well suited to the age and the circumstances in the commencement of their operations, to raise up a phalanx of unfettered laboring men and women, yet I have ever regarded it as a remnant of the dark ages; for I cannot conceive that the Lord calls his people to seclude themselves from the world in a Cloister, but rather to become shining lights amid a perverse and gainsaying generation. Still, notwithstanding this, the self-sacrifice imposed upon themselves, is not only truly poetic, but heroic, and must excite our admiration and veneration for their unselfish devotion and chaste dedication; and as in all ages Monasteries were the nurseries of learning, so can they still be, and so has it proved in this instance; for, as that order declined among our People, there was a corresponding decline in their Literature and Music.

This peculiarity of the early German Sabbath-keepers, however, must not prejudice their general distinctive doctrines, as Sabbatarian Baptists. The einsam leben was only a superfluous appendage, with which it could live, or do without, as circumstances require; and in nowise militates against the true fundamental principles of the denomination. The age and the circumstances which required it have passed away, and ought to be classed in the category with Camp Meetings; as I also regard the day and the circumstances which rendered them so useful and so successful among the early Methodists, in a sparse settlement, not now needed in densely populated districts, but have become the source of much more evil than good. As a simple House of Religious Refuge—a family community—for a small band of Christians to domicil together to enjoy Christian worship and Christian privileges, which they could not enjoy dispersed abroad, in a country where so few exist—(to which the Societies at Ephrata and Snowh[illegible]w nearly reduced)—it may be pro[illegible] profitable; but to be proper and profitable, they must be stripped of the ancient idea of spiritual wedlock to an imaginary spiritual Sophia; there is but one spiritual wedlock, and that is to the bridegroom Jesus. If they are true sons and true daughters of the Most High, he wants them to give their hearts to himself, and their hands to their neighbors. I repeat, that this extraneous appendage cannot, legitimately, prejudice my brethren, for no Church extant, at the present day, is without some extra-scriptural excrescence or appliance. I make no exception; but that fact is not to prejudice any of them materially. Truth may be commingled, may amalgamate in a measure, with error, and present the semblance of perfect union; but they can never be fused into one identical mass, one identical substance—cannot form a tertian quid. Truth is eternal, and endures unaffected by admixture with spurious sentiment or philosophy falsely so called. Truth never dies, however crushed, however oppressed beneath sectarianism, bigotry, and superstition, while forms and modes and human inventions, vanish and perish. Truth, religious truth, possesses a vitality which can sustain any load of error, and not be destroyed. The Cabalists, the Rosicrucians, and the Alchymists, who impiously endeavored to stay the fiat of Heaven, and wrest the issues of life and death from the Judge of the quick and dead, were deeply imbued with religious truth, and commingled religious truth, with all their philosophy—amid all their errors and presumptions, gave evidence of vital truth burning within them. Their errors and their fallacies have passed away, and truth comes out of the crucible, again, tenfold brighter—all their dross has been consumed, while the principles of eternal truth—gospel truth—have triumphed over all their errors and all their vagaries. A community may adopt any policy, encumbered with all gothic darkness and superstition, but it cannot affect the divine truth commingled with it—eternal truth remains the same, whether man will bear or forbear, in every age and under every circumstance. It is folly in man to attempt to contract or pervert it to suit his own whims or caprices—he cannot impress those whims and caprices with the stability of Scriptural truth. Scriptural truth will abide the same, and come out renovated, the one thing altogether lovely. Man's policy will, must change with the age—truth is the same to-day, to-morrow, and forever. The founder of Ephrata exhibited much foresight in not making the einsam leben a fundamental principle, although it was a predominant, a favorite principle. He could clearly distinguish between a fundamental and an adventitious condition. That adventitious condition has served its day. It was of earthly origin, and must pass away. The eternal truth—the religious truths—of the denomination, must and will live forever; for their foundation is the New Testament, divested of all traditions, ecclesiastical restrictions, and human appliances. Neither celibacy nor cenobism was ever regarded as an integral, an essential part of Christian doctrine and church fellowship, among the German Seventh-day Baptists; it resulted more from the force of circumstances, and motives of expediency than absolute requirement; and no one who evinced dissent from it ever sustained any damage in his covenant relations.

After Beissel wrote his Mysterion Anomias, which produced discord among his former brethren at Mühlbach, he retired to a cell on the bank of the Kochhalekung, now corcrupted into Cocalico, and lived a recluse life—became a hermit; not that he regarded that the Scriptures required him to become a hermit, but from the temperament of his mind, and the force of circumstances—to escape from contention, as he was a man of peace, and shunned strife—and to have uninterrupted leisure for meditation, and the investigation of the new phases that spiritual matters now presented to his cognizance. When the brethren drew him from his cell, by their importunities, as a matter of expediency, they adopted a modified monastic institution, which served its day admirably. It is, now, an old worn-out garment—old and ragged enough to be laid aside; and I have no question in my own mind, that the Society would be much relieved, and prosper better, without that incumberance.

To return to the matter before me, it will be seen, by the foregoing list, that laying aside the "Zionitischer Weyrauchs Hügel," 800 pages, and not counting the second part of the Theosophischen Lectionen, of upwards of 900 pages, in manuscript, leaves nearly three thousand pages of original matter, printed by themselves, illustrative of their history, and expounding their principles; and this while engaged, almost incessantly, in employments particularly distracting to literary pursuits; yet accomplished by them while in a wilderness, and at a time when but little attention was bestowed on literature in the colonies.

With the publication of the Chronicon Ephratense, and the demise of Peter Miller, the bright literary epoch of the German Seventh-day Baptists was brought to a close, and a period of Cimmerian darkness has succeeded, in which scarcely any thing of the kind has been produced. Within a few weeks past, a Hymn Book has emanated from the Snowhill branch of the family, in two languages—German and English—entitled Christliche Harmonie—Christian Harmony—together making 636 pages of 36 mo.; being a selection, with some original productions—the latter, I regret to add, not much calculated to excite a very high estimate of their literary attainments, or to enhance the value of the book. While I do not desire, in the least, to be censorious, yet I feel obliged, in faithfulness, to make two remarks on this publication. 1. It betrays painful evidence of sad declension in the literary character of our People of the present day. 2. The most exceptionable feature in our People undertaking such a work, is, that it must detract from their musical excellence, as it will induce them to depart from the soft, measured cadences of their primitive music, and to fall into the nasal drawlings and hideous jargon, so constantly screamed by the surrounding congregations; which I have uniformly found to be the case, when they leave their own matchless melodies, and sing a hymn, as they occasionally do, from other collections and other music. When they drop their own inimitable music, they lose their sweet harmony entirely, and become very ordinary singers; if not harsh and grating, certainly, ranting and indifferent. One great peculiarity of the hymns and the music of the ancient brotherhood, is, that every line, every word, every syllable, and every sentiment, was expressed by the particular piece of music, composed expressly for it and to it; and this was so nicely adjusted, that the difference of accent in a single syllable made it difficult to sing another hymn, of the same metre, to music which had not been expressly composed for it, or at least to lose much of the effect of the piece. I have never heard music which has so much and such decided accent throughout, soft as the strain may be, even when the cadences melt away almost into a whisper; and from this cause their music requires long study and careful training to master it, and, consequently, cannot be picked up and corrupted by a mere tyro who can "harp a note," or chant a tune. It is this that preserves it; and when our People leave their own compositions and come down to the music of others, they deteriorate, and deteriorate rapidly. In this respect I deplore, deeply deplore, this innovation, for I am afraid it will result in the abandonment, entirely, of their soft, soul-stirring melodies.

The Literature and the Music of the German Seventh-day Baptists are so intimately connected, that an account of the one would be imperfect without some notice of the other; and, therefore, at the risk of extending my article to more than a goodly length, I append some cursory account of this delightful accomplishment of the ancient brethren and sisters of Ephrata; for they were co-workers in this enchanting employment—composed their full complement of hymns and music, and certainly reduplicated immeasurably the most, and that in much superior style, in supplying full copies for all the members of the choir, which numbered upwards of sixty persons, as well as in supplying a full quota of Lectionen to both the printed and manuscript copies.

The cultivation of music among the German Seventh-day Baptists is coeval with their origin as a denomination. Beissel was a fine musician, an amateur violinist, in his early years, yea, a rare proficient, seldom to be met with, and when he gave his heart to his Master, like David, he consecrated that talent, that great talent, to exalt his Lord and Master; and exalted him in the sweetest and most touching strains. His first aspirations, on waking in the morning, and the last at night, on sinking into slumber, were hymned in mellifluous strains. At all their seasons of worship, singing formed a prominent part, and even when they met at their regular meals, they never rose from the table without expressing their gratitude, in a song of praise, to their Father and their God. Beissel was a good composer of music, as well as an exquisite performer. In composing sacred music, he took his style from the music of nature, and the whole of it, comprising several large volumes, is founded on the tones of the Æolian harp—the singing, in a word, is the Æolian harp harmonized. It is very peculiar in its style and concords, and in its execution. The tones issuing from the choir imitate very soft instrumental music; carrying a softness and devotion almost superhuman to the auditor. Their music is set in two, four, five, and seven parts. All the parts, save the bass, which is set in two parts, are led and sung exclusively by the females, the men being confined to the high and low bass—the latter resembling the deep tones of the organ, and the former, in combination with one of the female parts, the counter, produces an excellent imitation of the concert horn. The whole is sung in the falsette voice; the singers scarcely opening their lips, which throws the voice up to the ceiling, and the tones, which seem to be more than human, at least so far from common church music, appear to be entering from above, and hovering over the heads of the assembly. Their singing so charmed the Commissioners, who were sent to visit the Society, by the English Government, after the French War, (1756,) that they requested a copy to be sent to the Royal Family in England; which was cheerfully complied with, and which, I understand, is still preserved in the National Library. About twelve months afterward, a box was received, of three or four feet long, and two or two and a half wide, containing a present in return. What the present was, is now not certainly known—none having seen it but Biessel and Miller, who was then Prior, and to whose care it was consigned. It was buried, secretly, by him, with the advice of Biessel. It is supposed, from a hint given by Miller, that they were images of the King and Queen, in full costume, or images of the Saviour on the Cross and the Virgin Mary; supposing, as many in this country have erroneously thought, that the People of Ephrata, possess many of the Roman Catholic principles and feelings, from the circumstance of supporting modified monastic institutions. The King, at whose instance they were sent, was a German, and we may presume, that he considered that they retained the same views as the monastic institutions of Europe. They have upwards of a thousand pieces of original music, and some of these set in two parts, first and second, for social praise of two together; the same, set in four parts; and again, the same set in five parts; which latter was the arrangement generally used in public worship. Much, very much of this, very beautifully transcribed, has been scattered abroad, and much of it has been lost. I have before me the music for the "Zionitischer Weyrauchs Hügel," containing seven hundred and fifty pieces of music, set in two parts, in four parts, and in five parts, each bearing date 1746, done as beautifully as on copper-plate. There are three books, which I do not possess, of still higher merit. 1. The music to the Turtel Taube; 2. The music of the Paradisches Wanderspiel, which embraces the music of the preceding volume. There is one copy of this, or perhaps more, at Snowhill, but the copy I speak of was prepared with much care, and ornamented highly, for Freidsam—Beissel. 3. A folio volume of Anthems, in seven parts. The only volume, now extant, of this production, is, also, at Snowhill. I have before me a beautiful and singular volume, being the entire "Song of Solomon," in the Bible, the whole eight chapters, set to music, from beginning to end, and has every sentiment and every word expressed by appropriate melody.

This music is now lost, entirely, at Ephrata—not the music books, but the style of singing; they scarcely ever attempt it any more. It is still, however, preserved and finely executed at Snowhill, which is now the principal settlement of our People. There they keep up the institution as originally established at Ephrata. Their singing, which is weak in comparison with the old Ephrata choir, and may be likened to the performance of an overture by a musical box, with its execution by a full orchestra in an opera house, is so peculiar and affecting, that when once heard, can never be forgotten. I heard it once, at Ephrata, in my very young days, when several of the old choir were still living, and the Snowhill choir had met with them. And some years since I sojourned in the neighborhood of Snowhill, during the summer season, where I had a fine opportunity of hearing it frequently, and judging of its excellence. On each returning commencement of the Sabbath—Friday evening—I regularly mounted my horse and rode to that place, a distance of three miles, and lingered about the grove in front of the building, during the evening exercises, charmed to enchantment. It was in my gay days, when the fashion and ambition of the world possessed my whole breast, but there was such a sublimity and devotion in their music, that I repaired, with the greatest punctuality, to the place, to drink in those mellifluous notes, which transported my spirit, for the time, to regions of unalloyed bliss—tones, the like of which I have never heard from mortal man, though I have frequented the English, the French, and the Italian opera. That is music for the ear—the music of Beissel is music for the soul—music that affords more than natural gratification. It was always a delightful hour to me, enhanced by the situation of the Cloister, which is in a lonely vale just beyond the South Mountain. During the week I longed for the return of that evening; and on the succeeding morning was irresistibly led to take the same ride, (if I did not let it be known in the evening that I was on the ground, for whenever it was discovered, I was invited and passed the night in the Cloister,) to attend morning service; at which time I always entered the room, as there was then preaching; but so often as I entered I became ashamed of myself, for scarcely had those strains of celestial melody touched my ear, than I was bathed in tears—unable to suppress them; they continued to cover my face during the whole service; nor in spite of my mortification could I keep away. They were not tears of penitence, for my heart was not then subdued to the Lord, but tears of ecstatic rapture, giving a foretaste of the joys of heaven.

Of this music, Elder Davison, in his narrative of a trip to Snowhill, a few years since, says: "I never before heard or conceived of such solemu, soft, soul-stirring melodies. * * * They are constantly making additions, and take great delight in making new books, transcribed with the pen, and richly ornamented pages done in the same manner. They have prefixed to one of their books the passage from Revelations, 14: 3—And they sang as it were a new song before the throne and before the four-footed beasts and the elders; and no man could learn that song, but the hundred and forty and four thousand, which were redeemed from the earth. It appeared to me, that their music was composed with this idea in their mind throughout." And John F. Watson, Esq., in his Annals of Philadelphia, after introducing several notices of our People, and making numerous extracts from the writer's Historical Sketch, says: "Above all, they were peculiar for their superior music and singing;" but that author is wrong in his hasty conclusion, "that it was this attraction which allured young Dr. Fahnestock to their meetings, and when his heart was touched, like St. Augustine's, he readily fell into sympathy with their religion." Friend Watson is right in repeating the above statement that I was allured to their meetings by their very peculiar music; but he is wrong in assuming that it influenced him to fall into sympathy with their religion. It was not the sound of their sweet melodies, that induced him to embrace their views of Gospel truth, and unite himself with that branch of Zion; but because they base their faith, exclusively, on the unmutilated Word of God, and receive and administer all the ordinances, literally, as they are prescribed by the great Head of the Church, himself;—because, upon faithful inquiry and diligent research, he became convinced that they approached nearer to Bible truth and primitive simplicity, than any other denomination of professing Christians, in the present day, although encumbered with some peculiarities which belong to another age and another country; because, with them man may exercise his own conscience, and shape his faith to the teachings of the pure, unadulterated Word of the Most High, without being straitened by man-made Creeds, Covenants, or Articles of Faith; because, there they may enjoy the liberty wherewith the Gospel makes us free, and leaves him accountable to his Judge alone, for the faithful discharge of his Christian duties. Yet, while I do not regard them as entirely perfect in all their views of a Gospel Church, still, as they approach nearer to the simple truth and polity of the Bible, than any other existing Church, I felt constrained to cast in my lot with their portion of God's heritage, upwards of twenty years since; and although we have had to suffer sore trials and persecutions for the truth's sake, still I have much reason to rejoice in the election I then made. Friend Watson is, also, in error in another supposition in reference to the writer, when he states, that "he (myself) has probably become one of their preachers;" to which office he has never aspired, because he has never felt himself called to that office-work, nor has he ever made the least pretensions to it; but which may have arisen from the circumstance of being their historiographer, and the defender of their faith on several occasions.

CHRISTMAS—FESTIVALS.

The festival of Christmas, which will have passed before another [illegible]ue of our paper, is suggestive of a few thoughts which, for want of something m[illegible]important, we lay before our readers.

Many thousands of people are under the impression, that the twenty-fifth day of December is the veritable anniversary of the birth of Christ. We shall not go into any discussion of this question, as it is one which we consider to be of no importance. The fact itself, that "the word was made flesh, and dwelt among us," is very important to be believed; for "every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God." The Scriptures, accordingly, set forth this fact with much circumstantiality All those particulars of his miraculous conception and birth, which, taken in connection with his subsequent history, go to prove that the fullness of the Godhead had become embodied in human form, are presented with a minuteness of detail sufficient to satisfy the faith of every humble inquirer. But of the time when this wonder of wonders—the manifestation of God in the flesh—began first to be displayed, the Scriptures say nothing, save that it was some time during the reign of Cesar Augustus, and while Herod was king of Judea. This is, to our mind, sufficient proof that an annual recognition of the time by his people does not devolve upon them with any obligation.

Not an annual recognition of the time, but an habitual recognition of the fact, of Christ's incarnation, is the great duty which devolves upon believers; for the Christian life is sustained, not by the observance of "days, and months, and times, and years"—mere festival celebrations—but by the devout contemplation of those facts in which our redemption stands. Accordingly, Christianity presents us with no festivals. It recognizes the existence of the weekly Sabbath, it is true—a festival which celebrates the creation of the world—but it does not originate the observance of it, nor of any thing having a resemblance to it. It originates no festivals of any kind. Should it be said that the Eucharist is a festival, because it commemorates the Lord's death, we reply, that it is not strictly a festival, because no specified time is set for the celebration of it. It may be attended to at any time. Whereas festivals always imply set times for their observance.

It was contrary to the genius of Christianity to institute festivals. History establishes no fact more striking than that of the continued proneness of men to make all their religion consist in the devout observance of times and seasons. Judaism embraced such observances to a considerable extent, because they were necessary as types of the age to come; yet even the Jews, in spite of the care of their prophets to guard them against it, displayed the common perverseness of human nature in this respect. They celebrated their festivals with rigid regard to the appointed times, and observed all the external rites which the law of Moses enjoined, and then reckoned themselves righteous before God on that account. But human nature is every where the same. Give men, whether Jews or Gentiles, a system of religion which embraces a great number of such observances, and they very soon show their disposition to rest in them, to the neglect of the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith. It was no unnecessary alarm, therefore, that the Apostle to the Gentiles felt, when he saw the Galatians turning to such observances; and no unnecessary admonition to the Colossians, that they should beware of incurring censure on this score. Gal. 4 : 10, 11, Col. 2 : 16.

What then is Christmas, what is Easter, what is Good Friday, and a host of other festivals which have long been more or less honored in the Christian Church, but so many incumbrances by which the power of the Christian System to promote the life of God in the soul is hindered, not to say destroyed? Such we sincerely regard them. Christianity is simply a scheme for rendering sinners just before God. And as this justification is accomplished, not by the works of the sinner, but solely and wholly by the work of the Lord Jesus, nothing is introduced into the scheme, in the way of festivals or ordinances, which would for a moment draw away attention from "the Lord our Righteousness." Ordinances there are, indeed—two very simple ones—one of them complied with at the beginning of the new life, and never afterwards repeated; the other repeated often, but so simple in its character, and so directly exhibiting the great fact upon which our redemption depends, that it can have no tendency to divert the mind in any contrary direction. But apart from these ordinances, or even in connection with them, Christianity is a system of such severe simplicity, that it cannot long interest the hearts of those who have never discovered the necessity of some other righteousness besides that which lies in external observances. MILK TRAFFIC ON SUNDAY.—The New Jersey Conference of Congregational Churches held a meeting recently at Middletown, N. Y.—one of the milk depots on the Erie Railroad. As was very natural, the milk traffic on Sunday was a prominent topic of discussion. The following resolutions were adopted, and are published by request in The Independent. The principle they aim to inculcate, that labor should cease on the Sabbath, is a sound one. O that the men who inculcate it would themselves cease to labor on the Sabbath! Here are the resolutions :—

Whereas this Conference sees with regret the increasing desecration of the Sabbath by means of the milk traffic as now conducted; and whereas many members of the Church of Christ have become involved in that traffic, thereby lending their sanction to the whole Sabbath breaking system; therefore

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Conference it is inconsistent with Christian character to engage in the sale of milk on the Sabbath.

2. That we cannot expect the outpouring of the Spirit of God in revivals of religion upon churches where this sin is practiced with impunity.

3. That we affectionately and earnestly request all Christians implicated in the subject to examine it carefully in the light of the word of God, and, repenting of their past course, to withdraw immediately from farther sin in this respect."

Plymouth Rock.

As in duty bound, we made a pilgrimage to Plymouth, Pilgrim, or Forefather's Rock, as it is variously styled. We found nothing peculiar in its structure, size, or appearance. There are hundreds as imposing all along the rock-bound coast of New England. If it had depended upon its own intrinsic merits for notoriety, it would never have been noticed, save by the stone-cutter and the mason. It is emblematic. Like the crags of Horeb and Sinai, it speaks of spiritual grandeur. It tells of some great principle, for which the spirit of man is struggling, and to which it bows with loyalty and reverence.

A few ridiculed, despised outcasts, came over from the Old World, nearly two hundred and thirty-two years ago, in a small, leaky ship; and, as they pass from their boats to the shore, they step upon this rock. No great affair, certainly—a simple matter-of-fact occurrence. But man thinks that he sees some mystical tie connecting this simple event with much of spiritual greatness and power.

These exiles had dared to assert, that "the custom of the church is but the custom of men; the sentence of the fathers, but the opinions of men; the determination of councils, but the judgments of men." Discarding, thus, the commandments of men, they had adopted the Bible as their guide and law. Inspired by its principles, they flung out to the world a banner inscribed with political and religious freedom—spiritual independency. Very true, the inscription was, at first, an almost unintelligible scrawl, not fully understood even by themselves; but destined to become known and read of all men. They discovered a light after which humanity had long been groping. They elevated it on Plymouth Rock, henceforth to be a bright moral Pharos, shooting its rays far and wide into the deep moral night of the world. Henceforth, not only the rock, but every relic connected with the event, becomes sacred to man.

We found the rock to be a boulder of hard sienitic granite, some four or five feet in diameter. It had been a pilgrim itself in its earlier days, having wandered from some northern home, showing by its well-worn surface, that it had seen rough seas and hard usage. Only half of it remains where the Pilgrims stept upon it in 1620. The other half has been transported to the square in front of Pilgrim Hall. The story of its removal, as given in a reliable narrative of the times, is this: When the spirit of political freedom, which led to the Revolution, first began to manifest itself, the friends of liberty determined to turn the patriotic associations connected with the this rock to good account. They undertook its removal to the town square, with the intention of erecting over it a liberty pole, to increase the enthusiasm for independence. As they were raising it from its bed, it split into two parts. This created much surprise and excitement among the assembled group, and led to hesitation, at first; but it was luckily interpreted as an omen of the separation of the colonies from the mother country. They accordingly left one portion in its former position, and transported the other, with great enthusiasm, to the square, devoting it to the cause of liberty. The part remaining at the water's edge is now nearly buried in a street leading to the wharf; but measures have been recently taken to erect over it a suitable monument, thus rescuing it from its present degraded position.

It is very difficult to obtain a genuine piece of the rock; but by due perseverance, we were so fortunate as to get a few small pieces, far more precious than the gold of California or Australia. Every piece spoke to us of the inflexible purpose, the love for truth, the firmness for right, the purity of spirit, and the constancy in labors and sufferings, of the immortal one hundred and one, first landing here. Individuals from various parts of the country are frequenting the rock, and striving to bear to their homes and friends, some relic connected with it. We found some there, who were picking up pebbles along the shore, and laying them on the rock, thence to be taken as sacred relics. The next day we saw, in the possession of individuals, several pieces of stone which we had left upon Plymouth rock, in our endeavors to obtain genuine specimens. Their possessors were taking them to their homes as precious relics. One man, in particular, was contending that he had a genuine specimen. We could have informed him, that we had the misfortune to break it from quite a different rock; but he was laboring under an illusion so delightful to him, that we could not have the heart to correct his mistake, and that false specimen may be handed down to other generations [illegible] genuine. How easy it is to be deceived, when the deception favors our inclination. Men are usually convinced rather by inclination than by investigation, and their faith comes from bias rather than conviction. How easy, also, to correct an error in the beginning, when, after the growth and stre[illegible] of years, it may cost the labor and lives [illegible]ands to eradicate it.

Pilgrim [illegible]

The descendants of t[illegible]ms erected, in 1824, a hall, styled Pil[illegible]ll, for the reception and preservation of interesting memorials connected with the early settlement of the country. Among others, we noticed the following articles, noted as being brought over in the Mayflower: A couple of antique grave, looking chairs—a couple of pewter dishes—an iron pot—a piece of a chest—a sword—an earthern mug—a pocket-book—a box—a Bible—all showing the marks of age, and well-worn withal—venerable looking, every one. There is also a small library, in which are several books belonging to the earliest settlers. Several portraits, and specimens of the handwriting of some of the principal personages, are hung about the walls.

In front of the Hall lies that portion of the rock which was first taken to the town square. It is surrounded by an iron railing, upon which is inscribed the names of the forty-one individuals who subscribed the governmental compact on board of the Mayflower.

The Graves of the Pilgrims.

From the head of Plymouth Bay, the land rises in terrace-like eminences. Upon the brink of the first, were buried those of the Pilgrims who died the first winter after their arrival, being nearly half of their number. Their fast-multiplying graves were smoothed over, that the Indian might not know how few were left. No grave stones being erected, all definite traces of the precise location of the graves have been lost. Houses and streets now occupy most of the spot.

Upon the highest part of the last terrace, overlooking the bay, and the surrounding country, receiving the first rays of the rising sun, and the last of the setting, is the burial ground used after the first year or so. We could find but a few grave-stones, whose date ran back into the seventeenth century. We however found one dated 1687, another 1627, and one dated 1622—two years after the landing of the Pilgrims. These earlier gravestones are of English slate, being transported from England. They are fast crumbling with age.

I walked upon this "hill of hallowed brow, where the Pilgrim sleepeth," again in the evening. The moon was just coming up from the ocean, giving to the scene a soft, melancholy hue. The hum of business and the merry laugh of childhood came up from the modest, antique appearing village, which lay along between me and the bay. The gravestones stood around me in the dim moon-light, like silent sentinels, keeping an unbroken watch over the spot where the Pilgrims are at rest. Their sentinel watch spoke of the watchings and fears of the Pilgrims who went to sleep in a wilderness, the war-whoop of the Indian sounding in their ears. But the Indian has long since been chased over a country, whose extent they had not imagined, and his war-cry and patriotic song is fast dying away amid the roar of a far western ocean. It is true that as I stood there I heard, every now and then a shrill scream coming up from the distance, through the still night air; but it was not the Indian's voice, or the panther's scream, but the voice of an animal entirely unknown to them, with iron sinews, a heart of fire, and breath of smoke and steam, dragging in its pathway of blood, long trains of men and women, who were running a gantlet nearly as deadly as that of the Indian. While the nation of their founding has been growing beyond their wildest dreams, increasing in wealth, knowledege, and political importance and power, accompanied by the facilities of advancing civilization, the Pilgrims have slumbered on, heeding not the changes going on around them. As I stood thus amid the Pilgrim Fathers, musing upon the duration of the slumbers of death, upon the fruits of their labors and sufferings, and upon the Pilgrim spirit that still lives in their descendants, and

> "That watches the graves of the brave who have bled,
> And shall guard the ice-bound shore,
> Till the waves of the bay, were the Mayflower lay,
> Shall foam and freeze no more,"

a dark autumnal cloud passed over, and veiled the moon. I turned my eyes towards Marshfield, which lay across the bay, and thought of a nation veiled in mourning for a man, who lay there awaiting his burial on the morrow.

Funeral at Marshfield.

Early on the morrow, we started for Marshfield. After passing over some of the most barren lands of rugged New England, we came upon a farm of some fifteen hundred acres, which by money and labor had been in a measure redeemed from the surrounding barrenness. As we approached the mansion, we saw a few friends and neighbors gathered around. They were bringing forth the master of the house. They laid him in the shade of a large poplar on the lawn. He was clothed in his summer dress—such as he was wont to wear in his happiest and best days—but lying before us in the silent majesty of death. We entered his house. Many things bespoke the substantial home comforts of a farmer. His library, though not large, was selected from the master minds of the world. In every thing there seemed to be united the tastes of a farmer, statesman, and scholar. The family appeared small, or much scattered and thinned; but, on going out to the family burying-ground, the mystery was explained. In his tomb, we saw gathered a goodly family group. There lay the infant in years—those of happy childhood—a son that had fallen in the prime of manhood—a daughter that had laid aside the graces of womanhood—and the wife of his youth. Amid this group rested an open coffin, awaiting the coming of the husband and father, soon to form a silent but lasting reunion, undistrubed by the cares, honors, or disappointments of life. Soon, amid gathering thousands, he slowly wended his way to this his final home. It occupies the site of the second church organized by the Pilgrims, on a bleak and barren hill, looking out over long and dreary stretches of marshes and sand banks. Such were the circumstances under which we saw DANIEL WEBSTER, for the first and last time.

The Crystal Palace—Religious Liberty in Tuscany.

GLASGOW, December 3d, 1852.

The question as to the opening of the new Crystal Palace on Sunday, is still exciting attention and discussion. The religious periodicals generally are, as was to be expected, decidedly opposed; the secular press generally in its favor. The fact that both the Prime Minister and the Lord Chief Justice have openly avowed, in the House of Lords, opinions favorable, is looked at with alarm by the Church, and petitions are being sent to Parliament on the subject. This day week, Mr. Laing, M. P., was at Windsor Castle, the home of our Queen, describing to Prince Albert the progress made in the new erection; and attention has been fixed on the statement in the announcement of the circumstance that the Prince was especially interested in the arrangements: "having reference to the moral and artistic education of the people." The Record, the Evangelical Episcopal newspaper, had a long leading article on the subject in the beginning of the week, and a separate announcement of their having, from good authority, that the Directors of the Company had resolved not open the Palace on Sundays. As if more [illegible] mistrusting the authority, however, the writer earnestly desires that this may prove true. It was intended that a deputation from Edinburgh and Glasgow should have waited upon the Prime Minister, to urge their grounds of opposition to the contemplated opening; and Mr. Cowan, one of the M. P.s for Edinburgh, having written his Lordship, requesting an interview for the purpose, he, by letter, declined to receive them. We will probably ere long have the opinion of the law officers of the Crown as to the bearing of the statute against places of amusement on such an exhibition as that proposed, and further discussion if a special law of exemption for the Palace be proposed.

It is announced this morning, by telegraph, that a letter from Florence intimates that it was expected that the Madiai would be set at liberty on Dec. 1st. If this shall have proved true, the news will be the more welcome that all recent intelligence had led us to look for protracted imprisonment, if not death itself, as designed for these devoted Bible readers. The correspondent of the Daily News, writing from Rome, lately, stated that the husband had been placed under the surveillance of a guard of Capuchin friars, whose instructions were to employ all the available resources of the Church to bring him back to the Romish faith. The Protestant Deputation in their favor state in their report, that the persecution, so far from being confined to those whose names have been so conspicuously connected with it, is of a very general nature. At Florence, "a system prevails of entering into every house where suspicion, not of political 'crime' exists; hailing men and women, committing them to prison, and breathing out threatenings." Still more recently, the Grand Duke has issued a new edict, dated Nov. 16th, reviving the punishment of death, which was abolished last century. One class of offenses to which this punishment is made applicable, is "those against religion." Looking at the present state of Tuscany, and the view and determination of rooting out heretics, which the Grand Duke has been stated to have expressed, the whole purpose of the revived punishment is probably the suppression of true religion. All this, Dr. Fregelles says, is done with the consent and by the advice of the Pope. He has it "from unquestionable authority, that the Grand Duke takes no step in the case of the Madiai without consulting the Pope, and that he has sent to him at least twenty times for instruction." J. A. BEGG.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN.—By reference to the advertisement of Messrs. John P. Jewett & Co., in another column, it will be seen that "Uncle Tom's Cabin" can now be obtained at almost any price from 37½ cents to five dollars. The Illustrated Edition is a real gem, or a casket of gems. It is a volume of 560 pages octavo, with about one hundred and fifty illustrations, engraved by Baker and Smith, from original designs by Billings. The paper and print are unexceptionable, while the engravings are mostly in the best style of the art, and add much to the interest of the work. A capital holiday gift is the Illustrated Edition of Uncle Tom's Cabin.

—Speaking of Uncle Tom's Cabin reminds us of a statement we have seen somewhere, that Prof. and Mrs. Stowe have recently received a communication, signed by Rev. Dr. Wardlaw, on behalf of a committee of ladies and gentlemen of Glasgow, inviting them to visit England and Scotland, and offering to defray the expense. A speech made at a public meeting of the Glasgow Anti-Slavery Association, assures them of "a reception as enthusiastic as that of Jenny Lind."

NEW YORK, December 15, 1852.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder :—

I sent the following question to your office, some time since, but have not seen it acknowledged among the "letters received," therefore conclude that it did not reach its destination, and take the liberty to repeat it.

Suppose two sea captains, sailing from the same port, are called, in the discharge of duty, "redeeming the time," to circumnavigate the globe—the one going in an easterly, the other in a westerly direction. Can you give them any plain, consistent directions, according to the Word of God, whereby they can keep the Sabbath as you understand that term, during their voyage, and regulate the day in every port they enter, in any latitude or longitude? We will suppose, also, they should meet in a distant land, and then, in returning to their place of departure, each stops at the places which his friend had previously visited.

Yours respectfully, ENQUIRER.

Reply.

1. "Plain, consistent directions, according to the Word of God," are as follows—"Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy; six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," &c. Exod. 20 : 8—11.

2. The astronomy of the question we would not undertake to determine by the Word of God, that Book not informing us any thing about the rotundity of our planet, nor how we are to "regulate the day in any latitude or longitude."

3. If a "sea captain," or any body else, is unable to determine, in any port, what day of the week it is at that place, we trust that He who is not "strict to mark iniquities" will accept his honest efforts to come as near keeping the seventh day of the week as possible.

T. B. B.

THE SABBATH-SCHOOL VISITOR commences its third volume with the new year, 1853. We are sorry to have occasion to say, that the patronage of the Visitor, during the second volume, was not quite equal to that of the first volume—a circumstance which is attributed, not to a diminution of interest in the work, but to the difficulty of finding, in the several churches and societies, persons willing to take the trouble of getting up lists of subscribers, distributing the papers, &c. That the Visitor has done much to foster and increase the interest of parents, teachers and scholars in the Sabbath-School enterprise, can scarcely be questioned. In many places where, a few years ago, it seemed almost impossible to start schools, or where, if started, they were generally short-lived, it is now found comparatively easy to call together the young for religious instruction; and the distribution among them, once a month, of these little messengers, serves to attach them to the school, and give to the school permanence. In view of this, we would gladly add to the number circulated; to secure which, we have placed the subscription price at a small remove from actual cost; and having done so, we must rely upon the friends of Sabbath-Schools in the various localities to obtain for it such a number of readers as they may judge that the interest of all concerned demands. May we not hope, that in each church and society an immediate effort will be made to get up a larger list of subscribers than has ever before been obtained? Now is the time to act, and the result should be reported early. Pastors, Superintendents, Teachers, Friends of Sabbath-Schools, to you we look for aid in this matter.

AN EXAMPLE.—When the Sabbath-School Visitor was commenced, two years ago, the Church in Plainfield, N. J., order forty copies, and subsequently the number was increased to sixty, for the first volume. Of the second volume, seventy copies were taken; and last week we received an order with the money for eighty copies of the third volume. The brother who collected the money was commended for the gradual increase of subscribers, and the promptness with which the money was remitted. His reply was: "We find that a copy of the Visitor to every member of the Sabbath School is the most acceptable present we can make them, and the surest means of keeping up their interest in the School; and as to our promptness, it is just as easy to attend to such business at the beginning of the year as three months after." This reply is worthy of consideration, and the example of imitation. We might name other schools in which a similar increase has been made—as at Pawcatuck, R. I., and Little Genesee, N. Y.—and in each a growing interest in the Sabbath-School enterprise has been witnessed.

TRACTS AND NEWSPAPERS.—Each number of the Sabbath Recorder contains new matter equal to eighteen four-page tracts; so that, in a year of fifty-two numbers, each subscriber is furnished with matter equal to nine hundred and thirty-six four-page tracts, or three thousand seven hundred and forty-four tract-pages of matter, for two dollars. With these facts before us, it is very easy to see, that the newspaper form of disseminating truth is by far the cheapest ever discovered. The Independent, which has a circulation of about 11,000, estimates that it furnishes each year an amount of matter "equal to eighty-five million pages, which is more by eleven millions than all the tracts circulated last year by the American Tract Society."

REVIVAL AT ULYSSES, PA.—Under date of Hebron, Pa., Dec. 8th, Bro. Hiram W. Babcock says: "It may be interesting to you to know, that there is a revival of religion on the field of my labors in Ulysses, Potter Co., Pa. There have been about twenty hopeful conversions; backsliders have been reclaimed, and a goodly number of the young are yet seeking. During the past summer, four have embraced the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment. I find the Recorder to be an important auxiliary in my missionary operations."

THE AMERICAN ART-UNION.—The Courts having decided that it would be a breach of the anti-gambling law for the Art-Union to distribute its pictures by lot as heretofore, the Managers determined to sell them at auction, which was done on fourth, fifth, and sixth days of last week. The prices realized were quite satisfactory, the whole collection bringing over forty thousand dollars. One picture—"New England Secenery," painted by Church—which cost the Art-Union $500, sold for $1,300. Another piece—"Marion crossing the Pedee," painted by Ranney—brought $900, being about $150 more than it cost. It is doubtful if the Art-Union will be able hereafter to furnish so valuable a collection of pictures for free exhibition.

RAILROADS AND SUNDAY.—In the Board of Aldermen, New York, on the 18th inst., when the Third Avenue Railroad charter was under consideration, a motion was made by Alderman Denman, to amend by striking out the clause requiring the cars to run on Sunday. Ald. Tweed was willing to agree to this if the ferry-boats would be stopped on Sunday. Ald. Francis opposed the amendment. It was also strongly opposed by Ald. Sturtevant, and on being submitted to a vote, it was lost.

REVIVAL AT GREENFIELD, PA.—A business letter from Pardon C. Kenyon, of Greenfield, Pa., says that there has recently been quite a revival of religion among the different denominations in his neighborhood. A church has been organized by the Six-Principle Baptists, and the Free-Will Baptists have had quite an addition to their number. The Association Baptists and the Methodists have likewise shared in the work.

CENSORSHIP OF THE PRESS IN FRANCE.—In France, under a recent decree, books of every description, political or religious, circulated by colporteurs, have to be stamped by the prefects. The mark is placed on the title page of every volume. Each colporteur is required to obtain a license, and the prefects of the different departments are authorized to withdraw these licenses in case of dissatisfaction with colporteurs.

EMBARKATION OF MISSIONARIES.—Revs. Wm. W. Scudder and Nathan S. Lord, with their wives, recently sailed from Boston for Madras, by ship Jenny Lind. They are expecting to join the Ceylon mission, the Rev. Mr. Scudder having already resided several years in that island. The usual services were held on board the vessel prior to the embarkation.

DERUYTER INSTITUTE.—The winter term of DeRuyter Institute opened some three weeks ago, with very encouraging prospects. The number of scholars in attendance is between 110 and 120—about as many, we believe, as can be comfortably accommodated.

"HEAVEN, AND ITS SCRIPTURAL EMBLEMS," is the title of a work by Rev. Rufus W. Clarke, just published by Jewett & Co., Boston. It is an octavo volume of 269 pages, elegantly printed, with five original designs by Billings, beautifully engraved on steel. As a religious souvenir, we know of nothing better; it is adapted to all seasons.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

A letter from Professor Crow, in the Northern Christian Advocate, states that a deep religious interest exists among the students at Genesee College and Seminary, Lima, N. Y. Prayer meetings are held daily, at which sometimes twenty of the students present themselves at the altar for prayer.

At the close of a very impressive sermon, on "Home," at the old South church in Andover, on Thanksgiving day, the choir arose and sung "Sweet Home." The moistened eyes in every part of the house showed how tender a chord the music and words had touched.

Dr. Howe has examined almost the entire number of cases of idiocy known in Massachusetts, and the result is, in all but four instances, he found the parents of these idiots were either intemperate, addicted to sensual vices, scrofulous, predisposed to insanity, or had intermarried with blood relations.

The Countess Rumford, who died at Concord, N. H., on the 2d inst., in her will bequeathed $15,000, and a homestead worth $5,000, for an asylum for Widows and Orphans, $15,000 to the Insane Asylum of New Hampshire, and $2,500 to the Charitable Society of the females of Concord.

Nearly or quite forty thousand dollars have been contributed recently by the Mercer-street church, in aid of the Union Theological Seminary of this city. "It is a permanent, invaluable object of intelligent charity, worthy of the thoughtful and liberal consideration of the Christian public."

A State Temperance Convention will meet in Albany, N. Y., on the second Wednesday in January, and a Woman's Temperance Convention on the following day and evening. Gerrit Smith, Rev. S. J. May, Rev. Wm. Hosmer, and other eminent speakers, will attend and address the latter.

In the late council between the Winnebago chiefs and Gov. Ramsey, Big Bear said that he did not want to see any more schools among his people, because, said he, afterward, education makes the young women bad, and the young men too lazy to hunt.

Rev. James Calvert expired in the pulpit, while engaged in the performance of religious service, at Orton, Cattaraugus County, N. Y., a short time since. He was reading from the 13th chapter of St. Luke, and after uttering the words, "I will arise and go to my——," exclaimed, "O, my friends!" fell in the pulpit, and almost instantly expired.

The celebrated Methodist Church case will be sent up to the Supreme Court, as the Judges of the United States Circuit Court cannot agree in the matter.

General Intelligence.

SECOND-DAY, DEC. 13.

The SENATE was occupied during the early part of the day in a discussion about Standing Committees. Mr. Hale having been left off, asked the reason, and was told it was because the majority considered him outside of any healthy political organization. Finally, the Committees were appointed, being nearly the same as those of last session. The closing part of the deliberations were upon a motion declaring Mr. Dixon entitled to the senatorial seat of Kentucky.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Hall introduced a bill for the organization of the Territory of Platte. After some other business of less interest, Mr. Wilcox (Miss.) introduced a resolution, in substance, to instruct all Representatives of the United States abroad, to urge such amendments to existing Treaties, as will allow the same freedom of religious worsip of American citizens abroad that is allowed to foreigners in this country. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Then came a debate on the Tariff, of very little general interest. Before adjourning, the House amended one of its rules, so that hereafter no reporter who has a claim to prosecute can enter upon the floor—nor can more than one reporter be assigned to the same seat.

THIRD-DAY, DEC. 14.

In SENATE, after a variety of business of little interest, Mr. Davis called the attention of the Senate to that part of the President's Message relating to the death of the Secretary of State. Speeches on the occasion were made by Messrs. Davis, Butler, Cass, and Seward.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Brooks's motion for a select Committee upon the Tariff, came up, giving an opportunity for Mr. Meade to announce an intended motion to relieve railroad iron from duties; to Mr. Stanton, of Ohio, to say a word in favor of our own industry and specific duties; Mr. Giddings, to strike at the Whigs and the slave-growers of Maryland, Virginia and Kentucky, all in a breath; and for Mr. Stanly to refer to an appropriation last session for a lunatic asylum, with a hint that it might be the proper place for the member from Ohio.

FOURTH-DAY, DEC. 15.

In the SENATE, the bill reported by Mr. Mason, to amend the proviso in the act making appropriations for continuing the Mexican Boundary Commission, was read a third time and passed. Mr. Brodhead introduced a bill changing the Bounty Land law, so as to give all engaged in the last war 160 acres of land. The Kentucky election case occupied the latter part of the day.

In the HOUSE, the day was devoted to the memory of Daniel Webster. Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, moved the usual resolutions of respect, preceding them with a glowing eulogium on the deceased. Several other members eulogized Mr. Webster; among them Messrs. Appleton of Maine, Preston of Kentucky, Seymour of New York, Chandler, Bagley and Stanley.

FIFTH-DAY, DEC. 16.

In SENATE, the proceedings were of very little interest. Mr. Clement's resolution authorizing the creation of the office of Lieut. General, received some verbal amendments, and was postponed to Second-day. Several gentlemen spoke upon the Kentucky Senator question, among them Mr. Hale.

In the HOUSE, the principal business was the proposition of Mr. Brooks to refer the subject of the Tariff to a select committee, which, after some additional discussion, was rejected. Mr. Clingman offered an amendment, to abolish the duty on Railroad Iron, and pending the consideration of this subject, the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, DEC. 17.

The SENATE was not in session.

In the HOUSE, little business was done. An act of some importance to the mercantile community was passed, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue registers, &c., of vessels in certain cases which have heretofore required special acts of Congress. The Mexican Boundary Appropriation Bill was passed.

Arrest of Counterfeiters.

The leaders of a gang of counterfeiters were arrested in New York on Tuesday night, Dec. 14th. Two or three Germans, who had been passing counterfeit money, were first arrseted. After their arrest, officers Gleason and Martin proceeded to a large family grocery-store, corner of Dominick and Varick-streets, kept by a German named John Becker, alias Wickens, upon whom suspicion had long rested that he was extensively connected with a gang of shrewd counterfeiters. Before reaching the store, the officers laid their plans to detect the rogue. Sergeant Martin pulled the collar of his overcoat over his face, and assuming the character of a drunken man, staggered up to the counter, and called for a glass of beer and a cigar. The grocer did not suspect the trap, and believing the police officer was intoxicated, he paid no attention to him. Martin held fast to the bar railing, and laid down a $10 note on the Empire City Bank to pay for his beer and cigar. It was changed, and among the bills was one of the counterfeit "fives" on the Leland Bank. Martin, fearing he would excite the suspicion of the German, carelessly shoved the change into his pocket, and asking what time the Sixth-avenue cars came along, staggered out of the premises. In a few moments the two officers returned to the store, arrested this Becker, and searched the money-drawers. They found $62 in good money; five $5 counterfeit notes on the Leland Bank; $2 bills on the Putnam, counterfeit; also $5 notes on the Dutchess County Bank; $5s on Harrisburg Bank, Penn.; $5s on the Franklin Bank; $1s on the Milford Bank, Conn., and a $20 note altered from the North Scituate Bank, R. I., so as to represent the Hamilton Bank of Boston. The grocer was frightened nearly out of his wits, and at once divulged an important secret to the officers, which led to the arrest of a heavy coal dealer, by the name of Abraham Allen, residing in Varick-street, who is said to be the king-pin in these dangerous counterfeiting operations. Officer Martin proceeded to the house of Allen, and upon arresting him found $79 in good money and a lot of $1's, $2's, and $5's, spurious bills, in his possession, some of which are on the Leland Bank.

European News.

By the steamer Africa, European news to Dec. 4th has been received, of which we give a summary.

In England, the principal topic of discussion among politicians when the steamer sailed was the presentation of Disraeli's "Budget" to the House of Commons.

From France, we have the speech with which the new Emperor greeted the announcement of his elevation. We copy the clever and curious document:—

GENTLEMEN.—The new reign which you this day inaugurate has not its origin, as so many others which history records, in violence, conquest, or intrigue; it is, as you have just declared, the legal result of the will of an entire people, which it had founded in the midst of agitation.

I am deeply grateful to the nation which three times in four years has supported me by its suffrage, and which each time has only augmented its majority in order to increase my power. But the more this power gains in extent and in vital force, the more need it has of enlightened men, like those whom I address, to guide me by their counsels, and to reduce my authority within just limits, if ever it should transgress them.

From this day I take with the crown the name of Napoleon III., because the opinion of the people has already bestowed it on me in their acclamations, because the Senate has legally proposed it, and because the whole nation has ratified it.

Does this, however, signify that in taking this title I fall into the error imputed to the prince who, returning from exile, declared all that had been done in his absence null and void?

So erroneous a notion is far from me. Not only do I recognize the Governments which have preceded me, but I inherit in some sort what they have accomplished of good and evil; for successive Governments, notwithstanding their different origin, are severally bound by the acts of their predecessors.

But the more I accept that which, for the last 50 years, history hands down to us with its inflexible authority, the less was it allowed me to pass over in silence the glorious reign of the chief of my family, and the title, regular although ephemeral of his son, which the Chambers proclaimed with the last outburst of conquered patriotism.

Thus, then, the title of Napoleon III. is not one of those dynastic and obsolete pretensions which seem an insult alike to truth and common sense; it is the homage paid to a Government which was legitimate, and to which we are indebted for the finest pages of our modern history. My reign does not date from 1815; it dates from the very instant that you have communicated to me the suffrages of the nation.

Receive, then, Messieurs les Deputés, my acknowledgments for the distinction you have given to the manifestation of the national will, rendering it more apparent by your supervision, and more imposing by your declaration.

I thank you, also, Messieurs les Senateurs, for having been the first to congratulate me, as you were also the first to express the national wish.

Assist me, all of you, to establish in this land, harassed by so many revolutions, a stable Government, based on religion, justice, probity, and the love of the humbler classes.

And here receive the oath, that I will use every exertion to assure the prosperity of this country; and that, whilst maintaining peace, I will yield nothing which affects the honor and the dignity of France.

The Emperor would be proclaimed in all the Departments on Sunday, 5th inst.

The French Government has received the following dispatch from General Yusuf, who had been sent by Gen. Camon, Governor General of Algieria, to suppress an insurrection of the Laghouate, excited by Cheriff Ben Abdallah: "After a forced march of twenty-four hours, with my moveable column, I fell on the Cheriff's men, encamped at El Keig. We have killed 200 men, and carried off 2,000 camels and 20,000 sheep. It was a magnificent coup. Our losses are insignificant."

A Birmingham house has received an order to coin 700 tons of copper into coinage of the new French Empire. Four thousand tons are required in all, and the work will take four years to complete.

At London, Lord Frankfort, a young nobleman, was recently sentenced to twelve months imprisonment in the House of Correction, for a libel on Lord Henry Lenox.

The second Report of the Commissioners of the World's Fair of 1851 has just been issued, from which it appears that the Commissioners have purchased the Gore House estate, at Kensington, facing Hyde-park, 21½ acres, for £60,000, and 48 acres, adjoining, for £153,500, on the understanding that Government will contribute a like sum toward erecting thereon institutions of a national character. A new National Gallery and a Museum of Art are among the buildings contemplated.

At a meeting of the Eastern Steam Navigation Company, held at London 1st inst., it was incidentally mentioned by Sir C. Fox, the eminent engineer, that he had with his partner, Mr. Bressey, contractor, signed a contract for the construction of a Ship-Canal through the Isthmus of Darien, as designed by Mr. Gisborne, C. E. The Canal is to be a cut 30 feet deep at low tide, 140 feet broad at bottom, and 100 feet at low water surface. The locks will be 400 feet from meter to meter, 90 feet wide between the gate quoins, and each lock will have a lift of 30 feet to overweight the iron gates. Such a cut as that was considered equal to the trade of the world, as well as for permanent safety and rapidity of transit.

A German paper states that Signor and Madame Madiai will be liberated December 1, owing to the express interference of the King of Prussia. The London Morning Advertiser states that another case similar to that of the Madiai has occurred, the victim being a clerk in a banking house at Florence, whose sole crime is said to be his Protestantism. His name is not stated.

On Saturday, the 27th ult., expired, after a lingering illness of more than a year's duration, Lady Ada Augusta Lovelace, only daughter of the poet Byron. Her age was 37.

The Pope has resolved to send an apostolic delegate to the Haytien Government, and has chosen for the purpose Padre Spaccapietra, a Neapolitan, who is to be consecrated Bishop in partibus.

The Pope has received a letter from the King of Siam, promising that, during his reign, there shall be no persecution of the Christians within his dominions.

In view of the extraordinary activity that prevails in the French navy yards, the British Government has resolved to call upon Parliament to vote the necessary supplies for an addition of 5,000 men to the British Navy.

Disastrous floods have again occurred in various parts of England, especially along the course of the Thames, Medway, Trent, and their tributaries. There has been much loss among shipping on the east coast of Scotland, from a continuance of violent gales.

The Daily News' correspondence states that preparations are making just now at Hamburg for the emigration of several hundred persons, who are about to proceed, viâ Liverpool and New Orleans, to Salt Lake City. The expedition is well organized and expensively fitted out.

The latest Russian novelty is the smoking of cigarettes containing tea instead of tobacco. The French paper in which we find the circumstance, says the practice is becoming quite fashionable, and tea has at least the merit of being less narcotic.

By this arrival we have the particulars of the capture of Prome, in Burmah, by the British troops. The British forces had advanced up the river, on 21st and 22d September. They ascended without interruption till the morning of the 9th October, when they reached Prome. The defenses of the Burmese consisted of a log stockade on the edge of the hills on the right bank, a breastwork of masonry on the point, and guns planted on every position of advantage on both sides of the river. So soon as the squadron came within range, they were fired on from all the points by the enemy; this was returned by the steamers Phlegethon and Mahanuddy, and by the rest of the squadron, as they came within range. In two hours the fire of the enemy was completely silenced. As a sharp discharge of musketry was still kept up from behind the numerous pagodas which lay on the bank of the river, and the irregular portions of the ground where marksmen could be concealed, the steamers came to anchor and commenced, about noon, throwing shells, which speedily cleared the neighborhood. As the heat of the day diminished, preparations were made for landing. At 5 P. M., the wing of the 80th Regiment landed. They experienced scarcely any opposition. On touching the shore, they threw out skirmishers, and pushed rapidly up the hill, dislodging the enemy as they advanced. The Golden Pagoda in front of them was defended by 500 men. A short check here ensued. The enemy, after receiving two or three heavy volleys, broke and fled in all directions. At so late an hour it was not deemed expedient to attack the town. In the course of the night, the troops, in all amounting to about 3,000 men, of whom 500 were seamen, were landed. The next morning, they marched, without opposition, into Prome.

DEATH OF HORATIO GREENOUGH.—We learn from the Boston Transcript, that the death of Horatio Greenough, whose serious illness was announced a short time since, took place on Saturday morning, Dec. 18, after a violent attack of brain fever. Mr. Greenough was well known as a sculptor of distinguished genius. He was born in Boston in the year 1805, and took his first degree at Harvard University in 1825. During his residence at Cambridge, he contracted an intimacy with Washington Allston, to whom, in subsequent life, he always acknowledged a large debt of gratitude for profound suggestions in regard to the principles of Art, and genial encouragement in its pursuit. After leaving Cambridge, Mr. Greenough went to Italy, where he resided at intervals for several years. His principal productions are the colossal statue of Washington in the Capitol, the Chanting Cherubs, executed in 1828 for Mr. Fenimore Cooper, the Medora, finished in 1831 for Mr. Gilmore of Baltimore, the Rescue, and busts of John Quincy Adams, Josiah Quincy, and several other eminent personages. He had recently been engaged on the equestrian statue of Washington, to be erected in Union Park.

PERIL AND HEROISM.—On Monday morning, Dec. 13th, the schr. Gazette, Capt. Bassett, reached Cleveland harbor in distress, having suffered much in the gales on the lake. The crew had been nearly twenty-four hours without a mouthful of food, and were worn out with fatigue. As she entered the harbor, the Gazette was cast against the East pier, and a hole was knocked in her bow; she then drifted into the Lake, and there capsized. The crew succeeded in getting into the rigging, but seemed unable to hang on, in consequence of cold and exhaustion. Capt. Watts, of the Queen City, Capt. Stannard, of the Cleveland, and other noble fellows, took small boats, and at the hazard of their lives pulled out to the wreck, and succeeded, after much difficulty, in rescuing the crew in almost a dying condition. Thousands of persons assembled on the dock to witness the brave action. The vessel lies in 20 feet of water, and is uninsured. She had a few tuns of coal for ballast.

We learn from the Oswego Journal, that a fatal rencontre occurred at Brockville, C. W., a few days since, between a posse of Custom-house officers and two men named Chamberlain and Henry Smith, who had brought over from the American side a load of goods, and were endeavoring to elude the scrutiny of the Custom-house officers. The goods were seized, and upon resistance being made, the officers fired upon the smugglers with revolvers, shooting Smith through the body and killing him on the spot. Chamberlain was also wounded. The deceased was employed by the latter, who is a merchant at Kitley, to bring over the goods.

A dispatch dated Albany, Monday, Dec. 13, 1852, says: The large Seminary at Richmondville, Schoharie, Co., was destroyed by fire early this morning. There were about 330 pupils in the building asleep at the time the fire broke out, but owing to the abundant means provided for the purpose, they all escaped without personal injury, and with all their clothing. Loss estimated at $14,000; fully insured.

An Ohio Yankee has invented a Lath-cutting Machine, and has sold for $50,000 three-fourths of his patent for the Eastern States alone, reserving the Western. They say it will cut a large log up into Lath in the course of three minutes.

SUMMARY.

The Lockport Courier says, "We are informed that an Eastern Company has been organized for the purpose of constructing a canal at Niagara Falls. The canal is to commence about half a mile above the Falls, and pass directly through the village at the Falls, and empty, of course, into the river below the cataract. The Porters have made liberal donations to the enterprise, and there is no doubt, in the opinion of our informant, but that the project will be successfully carried out."

Among the provisions of the Maine law which recently passed the Vermont Legislature, is one authorizing constables to arrest and commit to prison every man they find "swipsey," and there keep him till he is in a fit state to testify where he obtained his liquor. If he refuses to testify, the justice before whom he is brought has power to commit till he will. The law is to be voted on by the people; if they say yes, it goes into operation the 1st of April; if no, then on the 1st of Dec. The option given is rather curious.

The fishing captains and owners of Cape Ann and thereabout had a meeting recently at Gloucester, Mass., to confer with Lorenzo Sabine on the fishery question. They expressed themselves in favor of reciprocal free trade between the United States and the British Provinces in the products of the sea, forest and soil, but hoped that in the event of any such arrangement, liberty to hire fishing stands from the inhabitants of the provinces would be secured to themselves.

Capt. Howe, of the bark J. W. Dyer, from Messina, reports, Nov. 14, lat. 37 30, long. 16 57, at 11 30 P. M., the wind from the south-west, with fresh breezes and squally, the bark being under double-reefed topsails, there was a ball of fire came from the north-east, struck the fore-topsail, and burst with the report of a cannon. It was about the size of a thirty-two pound ball, and if it had not been raining heavily at the time, it probably would have set fire to the vessel. It split the fore-topsail and did some slight damage on deck.

We mentioned recently the attempted introduction of Mormonism into Norway by the preachers Ahmanson and Folkman, at Brevig. It seems that they were not allowed much opportunity to make converts. The Magistrate gave them notice, that as they belonged to no sect of Christians acknowledged by the Government, they would not be allowed either to hold public worship or to baptize. As they paid no attention to the warning, they were arrested and taken to the jail.

A Bridgewater correspondent of the Plymouth (Mass.) Memorial, states that the introduction of sewing machines for stitching shoes is becoming quite common. One establishment in Abington used no less than six. It is said that an operator, with the machine, will stitch in a day more than ten times the amount usually accomplished by a "stitcher," and that the cost is very materially reduced.

Two important bills are introduced into the Ohio House of Representatives. The first is to prevent the circulation of foreign bank notes in the State, where no provision is made for their redemption within its boundaries. The other is to render more stringent the proceedings against the banks of the State for non-payment of the taxes imposed upon them by the Legislature.

Mr. David Ross, of New York Mills, Oneida Co., was killed on the afternoon of the 15th inst. He was seated upon a load of cord-wood, when the end-board of the wagon gave way, letting him down in front of the wheels, two of which passed over him, and crushed him so badly that he died in a few hours after. He leaves a widow and eight children.

Rt. Rev. Dr. Ives, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of North Carolina, (now in Europe,) is reported in the Tablet as a convert to Roman Catholicism. He is said to have so declared to Dr. Wiseman, Cardinal Archbishop in London, on whom he called on his way to Rome. As Dr. Ives is married, he will probably not enter the Catholic Ministry.

Frederick Douglass' paper says that "the colorod young men of Rochester, under the lead of Messrs. Robert Johnson, Benjamin Cleggett, and Howard, have organized a debating and mental improvement society, which promises to be highly beneficial in promoting intelligence and a spirit of progress among them."

On Friday several boys were amusing themselves by playing with powder on the Swan Land, South Boston, when one of them, a lad seventeen years of age, fired a pistol into a keyhole. The pistol recoiled, striking the boy in the face, and bruising him frightfully. His eyes were also badly burnt by the powder, and there is great danger that he will lose his sight.

Ira Wilcox, Esq., a retired merchant and much respected citizen of Oxford, Chenango Co., died at Jacksonville, Florida, a few days since. He was President of the Bank of Chenango, and formerly a member of the Legislature. His disease was bilious cholic.

There is a printer in Cincinnati who has led quite an eventful life. He has, within the past ten years, been a soldier, a sailor, a school-teacher, a bar-keeper, an attaché of a menagerie, a negro-dancer, a confectioner—an editor.

Hon. Bishop Perkins, member of Congress elect from the St. Lawrence and Herkimer District, lately resigned the office of Clerk of the Board of Supervisors of St. Lawrence, an office which he has held uninterruptedly for thirty-three years.

Mr. Hooper C. Hicks, while passing through Lombard-st., Baltimore, Tuesday evening, Dec. 14, had a rope thrown round his neck, was dragged into an alley, received a handful of lime in his face, and while blinded and choked was robbed of $3,000.

Arthur Edward Sheldon Seguin, the vocalist, died in this City December 13. He was born in London in 1809, and was member of the London Academy of Music, from which he retired in 1830, having gained the honors of the academy.

The ship Shackamaxon, of Philadelphia, bound from Liverpool for Australia, with 600 passengers, was spoken on the 29th Oct., in lat. 15 N., lon. 26 W., and reported the death of 23 passengers from Scarlatina.

Paul Stillman, of New York, was among the passengers by the steamship John L. Stevens, which sailed from this port for Panama, via Rio Janeiro and Valparaiso, on the 18th inst. Mr. Stillman goes out for the benefit of his health, and hopes by taking this route to escape the rigors of winter.

The Mayor of New York has vetoed the act of the Common Council chartering a railroad through Broadway. He thinks that such a road ought not to be built at all, but if built it should be by the property owners or others, who offer large compensation to the city and low fares to the public, instead of the Company to whom the right was given.

Mr. Bartlett, of the Mexican Boundary Commission, reached Chihuahua, Oct. 22, in 15 days from El Paso. On the 18th, he and his party had a conflict with the Indians, during which one of his men was killed, and eleven of his mules stolen. The Indians also left one dead on the field.

We learn that the shares in the proposed New York Exhibiton of Industry, command over fifty per cent. premium. The getters up of the scheme, therefore, expect to realize that sum from the fees paid by exhibitors and by visitors. This is a good speculation, and beats anything that Barnum ever ventured on.

The Baltimore American says one concern in the oyster trade in that city forwards to the West daily, by railroad, eight tons of oysters in cans. One hundred and fifty persons are constantly employed in opening the shells.

The Countess Rumford has bequeathed in her will $15,000, and a homestead worth $5,000, for a Widow and Orphans Asylum; $15,000 to the New Hampshire Insane Asylum; and $2,500 to the Concord Charitable Female Society.

A new clipper ship, of nearly 2,000 tuns, having three decks, and now nearly ready for launching, has been sold by Mr. D. McKay, of East Boston, her builder, to a Baltimore firm, for $125,000. She is of a most beautiful model, designed expressly for speed.

A commission, consisting of Prof. Bache, of the Coast Survey, Capt. Bowman and Lieut. Gilmer of the U. S. Military Engineers, are now making examinations of the river and harbor of Savannah, with a view to their improvement.

Mr. King, President of the Senate, is very feeble from a disease of the lungs, similar to that which took off Mr. Clay. It is expected that he will resign the Presidency of the Senate at an early day, to be succeeded, probably, by Mr. Atchison.

The Hudson River Railroad train that left East Albany at 8¼ o'clock, last Friday morning, stopped at its Thirty-first-st. station in this City at 10 minutes past 12—making the run from city to city, including all its regular stops, five minutes short of four hours.

A negro man, belonging to Hon. Geo. H. Lee, of Clarksburg, Va., was found guilty of burglary by the County Court of Harrison County, on the 17th inst., and sentenced to be hung on the 21st day of January.

Mr. Andrew Russell, of Washington County, Va., was a member of the Electoral College from 1800 to 1836, and voted for Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Crawford, Jackson, and Van Buren.

We see by the Cincinnati papers, that Mad. D'Arusment (Fanny Wright) died in that city on the 13th inst., having been confined to her room for a long time by injuries received from a fall last winter.

Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

An Edition for the Million.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN FOR 37½ CENTS!—We have yielded to the repeated and urgent solicitations of numerous friends of humanity, and now offer to them, and to the public generally—TO THE LIVING MASSES—an edition of Mrs. Stowe's unrivaled work, at a price so low as to bring it within the means of every person. It seems a work of supererogation to speak in complimentary terms of a book,

ONE MILLION COPIES OF WHICH

have been printed, in this country and in Europe, in a little more than six months—a sale which has no counterpart in the world's history. Yet, notwithstanding this immense sale, there are hundreds of thousands in our own country, who have not yet perused the glowing pages of UNCLE TOM'S CABIN, many of whom have been prevented from doing so, from inability to purchase. To remove this obstacle, we have issued this edition

☞ FOR THE MILLION. ☜

And millions will now read it, and own it, and drink in its heavenly principles, and the living generations of men will imbibe its noble sentiments, and generations yet unborn will rise up and bless its author, and thank the God of Heaven for inspiring a noble woman to utter such glowing, burning truths, for the redemption of the oppressed millions of our race.

To Booksellers, Philanthropists, or Societies, who wish to purchase the above by the thousand, for sale or distribution, a liberal discount will be made. The edition is very neatly printed, in a large octavo pamphlet of 166 pages, double columns, thick paper covers, and firmly stitched. We now offer to the public the following editions:

Miscellaneous.

The First Cross Word.

"You seem happy, Annette, always. I have never been in a family where the husband and wife seemed more so."

"Well done, Kate," said Mrs. Huntington, laughing, "you have used the word seem only twice in that short sentence. And now you have a begging way about you, as if you were really in earnest to hear something about married life, before taking the fatal step. It is well Harry is not here to see the look of sadness in the eye of his bride elect. He might fancy her heart was full of misgivings, instead of wedding finery."

"Don't laugh at me, Annette; talk with me as you used to do. I love Henry, you know, and yet I have many misgivings about married life. I see so few who are really happy in this relation—I mean happy as I should wish to be. You seem to come nearer to it than any one else. Do you ever—"

"Quarrel? No, not often now. We had our breaking in. I believe it must come to all sooner or later."

"Do tell me all about it, will you, Annette?"

"Yes, if you are very desirous of it. You may learn something from it.

"I was a romantic girl, as you well know, Kate. Some few friends I had, whom I loved dearly; but these friendships did not quite satisfy my heart. Something more it craved. I hardly knew what, until I loved my husband. When we were first married, I used sometimes to ask myself: Now, do I find in this life all which I expected to find? Am I as happy as I thought I should be? My heart always responded, Yes, and more so. With us the romance of married life, if I may call it so, held on a long time. For my part, I was conscious of a pleasurable excitement of feeling when we were together. I enjoyed walking and riding alone with him. The brightest hours of the day were those in which we sat down alone together, to talk or read. For a long time I felt a gentle restraint in his presence. I liked to be becomingly dressed. When dull, I made an effort to be social and cheerful if he was present. I had a great fear of getting into the way of sitting down stupidly with my husband, or of having nothing to talk about but the children and the butcher's bill. I made a business of remembering every pleasant thing which I read, or heard, or thought, to tell him; and when all these subjects were exhausted, we had each of us a hobby we could ride, so that we were never silent for want of something to say. Thus we lived for a yerr or two. I was very happy. I think people were often surprised to see us enjoy each other's society with so much zest.

"But there was this about it. As yet I had nothing to try me. We were boarding, I had no care, and his tenderness and interest was a sovereign panacea for the little ails and roughnesses which must fall to us in our best estate. This could not last, however, forever. He became more and more occupied in his business, and I at length had a house and a baby to look after. Then, for the first time, our mutual forbearance was put to the test. Hitherto, we had been devoted to each other; now the real cares of life pressed upon us so as often really to absorb our energies. I was the first to feel the change. It seemed to me as if something was overshadowing us. Sometimes I would get sentimental, and think he did not love me as he once did. As I look back now, I am convinced that here was my first wrong step. Indulgence in these moods weakened my resolution. It was an injustice to him, of which I ought not to have been guilty. It left me too, with a wounded feeling, as if I had been wronged, which began to affect my spirits.

"Once, I had for some time carried about this little sore spot in my heart. I kept the matter all to myself, for I was in part ashamed, and in part too proud to speak of it. Here was another wrong step. There is no security of happiness in married life but in the most perfect confidence.

"There came a season of damp, chilly weather. One morning I got up feeling very irritable. I had taken cold; my head ached; and my baby had been worrisome during the night. In my kitchen I had a cross, ignorant servant girl, and on this particular morning she had done her very worst for breakfast. The beef steak was burned to a cinder; the eggs were like bullets; the bread was half baked; and the coffee, which was our main stay, was execrable. My husband was very patient with all this, until it came to the coffee, and that upset him. He put his cup down, and said, in a half vexed tone, 'I do wish we could ever have any good coffee. Annette, why cannot you have it made as my mother does?'

"This was the drop too much for me, and I boiled over. 'You never think any thing on our table fit to be eaten,' said I, and I almost started at the sound of my own voice—'you had better live at home, if you are not satisfied, or else provide me with decent servants. I cannot do every thing—take care of my baby all night, and get the breakfast too.'

"'I did not know before that I was so very unreasonable,' said he, in a tone of injured feeling. He sat a few minutes, then rose, left his untasted breakfast, put on his hat, and went off.

"When I heard the door shut behind him, all my temper left me. I went into my room, locked myself in, sat down and cried like a child. This was the first cross word I had ever spoken to my husband. It seemed to me as if some sudden calamity had befallen us. I worked myself up to such a pitch of feeling, that I walked about the room wringing my hands.

"'Oh, it is all over with us,' thought I; 'we shall never be happy again in this world.' This thought made me unspeakably miserable. I felt as if a black pall had fallen around me, and in the future there was only blank—darkness. In my misery I sought to comfort myself by blaming him. 'He need not have spoken so to me, at any rate,' said I, out loud; 'he might have seen how I felt; it was too much for any one to bear. It really was not one bit kind in him. It is plain enough that he does not care for my comfort as he once did. Then to be always telling me what nice things his mother cooks, when he knows I am trying to do my best to learn to please him! It is really too bad.'

"Don't look so dreadfully sober, Kate. My baby cried just here, and I had to run before I was through with my catalogue of grievances, yet I had gone far enough to get well on the wrong track again. I began to calm myself with the reflection, that if there had been a great wrong done, I was not the only one to blame for it. I was dreadfully sorry that I had spoken cross to him, but I thought he ought to be sorry too. Before my baby had finished crying, I came to the conclusion that I would not exhibit signs of penitence until I saw some in him.

"So I bathed my face, that no traces of tears might remain, dressed myself with unusual care, and went down to Bridget, to give some very particular directions about the dinner. I did this with a martyr-like spirit. I meant to try my best to make him sorry for his injustice. I resolved to reproach him with a first rate dinner, good as his mother could cook. To whet the edge of my delicate reproof, I made, with my own hands, a most excellent cup of coffee.

"One o'clock came, at last, though I thought it never would; the door opened, and I heard his quick step in the hall. Of all things in this world, he was whistling! He came to the table with a bright face, from which every trace of the morning's cloud had disappeared, and he sat down and looked around with a pleased expression.

"'Why, Annette,' said he, 'what a nice dinner.'

"'I am glad you are pleased,' said I, in a subdued tone.

"'Capital,' said he, 'the best roast we have had this season.'

"He was so much taken up with my delicate reproofs as not to notice that I was out of spirits. I was half pleased and half provoked; but I kept rather still, making little conversation excepting in reply to him.

"After dessert, I handed him his cup of coffee. He was quite astonished. 'Why, Annette,' said he, 'I do believe you went to work to-day to see what you could do.'

"He had hit the truth, though without the least suspicion of the cause. My first impulse was, to be honest and out with it by replying,—'Is it as good as your mother makes?' This would have given the key to the whole story—he would have ferreted it out, and we should have settled it there; but I felt ashamed to. I sipped my coffee in silence. The golden moment passed and my good angel took his flight. Pride had the day. I even began to be vexed at his enjoying a good dinner, so easily forgetting what had caused me so much suffering. He was very busy on that day, and did not stay with me as long as usual to chat, but went off whistling even more cheerily than when he came.

"I went up into the nursery and sat down to think it over. Baby was asleep; the rain was pattering against the windows; the wind was rising, and to me the world looked dreary enough. I had tired myself all out getting up such a dinner, and now the excitement was over and I felt the reaction. I began to ask myself what I had got for it. Just nothing at all. My husband either did not or would not see that there was anything to be reconciled about. I blamed him for his insensibility. 'Once,' thought I, 'he would have noticed any change in my voice or any shadow which came over my spirits; now, I can really be cross to him, and he does not mind it at all.'

"I had a doleful afternoon of it. I was restless enough; trying first one employment and then another, but finding nothing which would suit. I went down to tea, farther, if anything, from the right point than I had been at noon. I sat dejected and silent. My husband tried once or twice to engage me in conversation, without success.

"'Annette,' said he at length, in a kind tone, 'do you not feel well to-day?'

"'Not very,' said I with a sigh.

"'What is the matter?'

"'My head aches; the baby kept me awake almost all night.' This was the truth, but only in part, and I felt guilty as I said it. Then he begged me to go and lie down on the sofa in the parlor, and said he would read to me anything I would like to hear.

"I felt this was kind in him. It was like old times; the new times, you see had been but a day, but to me it seemed very long; yet it was not what I wanted. I wished to have the trouble cleared away, not bridged over; and I determined to hold out until it could come to this, and he should see and feel that I could not be made happy after a cross word, without a scene of mutual contrition and forgiveness; so I would not stay and be read to, but told him I must go to bed. I left him in his easy chair, and his study-lamp and book and bright fire, in regular old bachelor style, and went off into my nursery, and then to bed, and cried myself to sleep. You laugh, Kate, as though you thought I was a fool. I think so myself now."

"How did it all end, Annette?"

"I held out a week, becoming every day more and more sad, and sulky, I may as well call it. When I was left alone, I used to take my baby up and cry over him as if my husband was dead, and the child was all I had left in the world. Dear me! how unhappy I was, and every day added to it. I would find something in his conduct to pain me every time we met. Either he was too attentive or not attentive enough; talked too much or too little.

"He bore my moody ill-humor most patiently, thinking I was ill. One day he came home, and told me he had obtained a week's leave of absence, and had engaged a carriole, and I must pack up myself and baby and be ready to start in an hour. He was going to take me home to my mother's. 'We may as well have a journey as pay doctor's bills, Annette,' said he; 'and as to have you drooping about in this style any longer, I am not going to. We will send off old Bridget, lock up our house, run away from all care, and have some fun.'

"He looked up so kindly I could have fallen upon his neck and wept my heart out, to think how ugly I had been; but there was no time then to talk it over. I hurried away to pack, but before I was half through with the packing, I resolved that I would tell him the whole story from beginning to end. The moment I came to this determination, the load was gone; my heart seemed light as a feather; the expression of my countenance, the tones of my voice changed. I was conscious of it, and he noticed it as soon as I joined him, at the appointed hour.

"'Why, Annette,' said he, 'getting ready has cured you. We may as well stay at home now.'

"That will do Kate. The rest of the story will sound sentimental to a third party."

"No, no, Annette, that would be leaving out the very cream of it. Tell me how you settled it."

"Well, we rode on enjoying the change until towards dark. Baby then fell asleep. It was a very quiet hour—everything about us was beautiful and peaceful. I felt deeply, and I longed to have all in my heart pure and peaceful. Tears of real penitence came into my eyes, and before I knew it, they were dropping down upon the baby. My husband turned and saw them.

"'Why, Annette,' said he, with the utmost surprise, 'what is the matter?'

"'O, I am so sorry,' said I.

"'Sorry for what, love,' said he, 'are you not happy? Does any thing trouble you?'

"'I am so sorry,' said I, 'that I have been so ugly this week.'

"'What do you mean?' said he, looking more and more puzzled.

"'How can you help knowing?' said I.

"Then I began at the beginning and told the whole story—how I rose feeling irritable, and was provoked to speak the first cross word; how he told me my things were not as nice as his mother's and went off vexed; then how he got over it, and forgot all about it, and would not help me to feel good natured by saying he was sorry. How I had brooded over it all the week—how it had festered away in my heart and poisoned all my enjoyment. What torrents of tears I had shed when alone, as I thought it was all over with us, and we never should love again as we had once loved.

"He heard me through without making a single remark, and then he burst into a loud laugh. 'I want to know, Annette,' said he, 'if this is what has ailed you this week?'

"'Yes,' said I. Upon this he checked our Dobbin, and began to turn round.

"'What are you going to do?' said I.

"'Going back,' said he, 'if this is all which is the matter with you.'

"I laughed heartily as he did, for now my sin was confessed, I felt very happy; but I pulled the other rein and drew the whip-lash over Dobbin's ears, and away he went like a bird towards my mother's home.

"But we made a resolution then, Kate, that if either had aught against the other, it should be settled before the sun went down; that we might go to sleep, if not at 'peace will all the world,' at least at peace with each other, forgiving and forgiven. This resolution we have faithfully kept, and I have never seen another week of such misery as I have been telling you about, and I trust I never shall. I hope you will find in your new relations, Kate, all the enjoyment we now do. This is the best wish I can offer you and that your first cross word may also be your last."

The Moravians.

The N. Y. Tribune prefaces a sketch of a sermon in behalf of the missions of the Moravians or United Brethren, with the following account of that people:—

The history of this remarkable people is a singular chapter in the records of Protestantism. Their doctrines were, according to their own authority, practically operative in Bohemia before that Kingdom was added to the Western Empire. After that transfer (about the year 1000) the Papal authority immediately endeavored to alienate the Bohemians from the Greek Church and attach them to that of Rome. The Popes made little advance, however; and the Bohemian Church was powerfully strengthened in the latter part of the Twelfth Century by the immigration of great numbers of the persecuted Waldenses, who were flying from their Roman Catholic enemies—Waldo himself being one of the settlers in Bohemia. About the middle of the Fourteenth Century, Pope Clement VI., aided by Charles IV. of Germany, undertook the complete subjugation of the Moravian and Bohemian Churches, and as a chief means the Pope established the University of Prague. But even here the Protestant spirit found root, and John Militsch, one of the Professors, openly and vigorously denounced the corruptions of the Roman Church. The great Apostle of the Moravians, John Huss, the Martyr, was born in 1373, in Southern Bohemia. He was educated in the above University, where he became Professor of Divinity. Happening to get hold of the writings of Wiclif, "the morning star of the Reformation," Huss soon took open ground against the usurpations of the papal Power, wherefore he was forbidden to preach in Prague; but he despised the mandate. The people began to flock to him, and he was denounced to the Pope by the Clergy. Huss was ordered to appear at the Council of Constance, in 1414, where he went, and was treacherously locked up by the Pope, who had promised him freedom and security. Huss was tried—if a proceeding can be called a trial, where the accused is allowed no defense—and burnt at the stake in 1415. The Council of Constance excommunicated all the Hussites, and a savage persecution followed, in which many perished. In 1418 Sigismund laid claim to the Crown of Bohemia, which claim the Hussites opposed, and under the famous John Zisca fought with success for thirteen years. The Moravian, Bohemian or Hussite Church, now had many divisions in regard to doctrines and ceremonies, and it was not till 1460 that they finally settled all their differences and adopted the name "Unitas Fratrum," or "The United Brethren," which is still their real name, although they are oftener called Moravians. They were the first to give the Bible in a living tongue, having printed it at Venice in 1470, and issued three editions of it before the commencement of Luther's Reformation. Persecution raged against them more or less violently all this time, and in 1547 they were expelled from Bohemia by Ferdinand, because they would not join him as the ally of Charles V. against the Lutherans. They took refuge and formed settlements in Poland and Prussia, and in 1557 agreed upon their doctrines and mode of church government. In 1564 Maximilian II. repealed all laws against them, and many of them returned to Bohemia. They had peace thenceforward until the Thirty Years War, (1618 to 1648,) during which they were almost exterminated, and many of their leading men were beheaded. But little was heard of the Moravians from this disaster until their noble patron Count Zinzendorf of Saxony established them on his own estate, where they founded their town of Herrnhut. Thenceforward their progress was rapid, and in a short time they had establishments in almost every kingdom in Europe. Zinzendorf himself came to America in 1741 upon the invitation of the celebrated Whitfield, and established their present headquarters—Bethlehem, Penn. The latest returns within our possession state that the Moravians have establishments in Saxony, Silesia, Brandenburg, Baden, Saxe-Gotha, Reuss, Neufchatel, Utrecht, Schleswig, Astrachan, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, most of the Counties in England, Pennsylvania, New York, Maryland, North Carolina, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, in the West Indies, Surinam, Cape of Good Hope, Upper Canada, Indian Territory, Labrador, and Greenland, beside extensive home missionary operations in Europe, chiefly in the North.

In the prosecution of their Missionary enterprises they have manifested a depth of purpose and warmth of zeal not a little remarkable, as evidenced a hundred years ago in their efforts among the Iroquois, Hurons, and other Indians; for a century and a quarter in Greenland, and for 80 years on the bleak coast of Labrador. They have now 24 missionaries in Greenland, and 30 in Labrador. The little vessel, the Harmony, which annually takes from London supplies for these missions, had, up to 1843, made seventy-one voyages to that bleak and tempestuous ocean without the occurrence of a single accident.

In the City of New York their establishment was commenced in 1736. Two Bishops—Sprangenburg and Nitschman—on their way to Pennsylvania, became acquainted with Elder John Noble, of the Wall-st. Presbyterian Church. Mr. Noble believed in their teachings, withdrew from the Presbyterian Church, and in connection with Mr. Boemper, another merchant, established Moravian worship. The meetings were spirited or languishing for several years, as affected by the presence or absence of the missionaries traveling to and from Europe and Pennsylvania. In 1741 the celebrated Count Zinzendorf arrived here and fully organized a society, except the establishment of the sacrament. In 1748, Bishop Johannes de Wattivel tarried here awhile and completed the organization by administering the Lord's Supper to the congregation (of 100 souls) who met at Mr. Noble's house. In 1751 land was purchased in Fair (Fulton) street, between William and Dutch-sts., and a small frame building erected, the corner stone laid June 17, 1751, by Rev. Owen Rice, and the edifice dedicated June 18, 1752, by Bishop Sprangenberg. Successive generations worshiped here for eighty years, and the house was filled. In 1829 the old house was taken down, and a brick church, 50 by 60 feet, was put up. Bishop Andera dedicated it Nov. 29, 1829. The building was shortened, seven years afterward, in consequence of the widening of Fulton-st., and in 1843 it was abandoned, and the Society erected the present large and substantial Church at the corner of Houston and Mott-sts. The pastoral office in this City has been filled by Rev. Owen Rice from about 1748 to 1757; Rev. Thomas Yarvel to 1765; Rev. G. Neiser to 1775; Rev. Gustavus Shewkerk for a short time during the war; Rev. Ludolph A. Rusmeyer, Rev. James Birkley, and Rev. Godfrey Peters, who died Oct. 27, 1797, the first who had died in this City in the service of the Church. Then came successively Rev. Messrs. Meder, Bardill and Moulther, who served until 1812. In that year, Rev. Benj. Mortimer, who had been a Missionary among the Indians, succeeded to the pastorate, but died in 1834. His successor was Rev. Mr. Vanvleck, who continued until 1836, when he was appointed Bishop of Bethlehem, Pa. Rev. C. F. Kluger served for two years; then Rev. Mr. Bleck from 1838 to 1842, when he went to Salem, N. C. In 1842, Rev. David Bigler was called to the pulpit, where he yet remains, with a large and flourishing congregation.

Of the Moravians at their headquarters—Bethlehem, Pennsylvania—and in other parts of America, we have not space to speak. By the returns of the census of 1850, we learn that the Moravians had 331 churches in the States, accommodating 112,000 hearers; the total value of the Church being $443,347. The churches were distributed as follows: Ohio, 158; Pennsylvania, 84; Indiana, 53; Maryland, 12; Virginia, 8; North Carolina, 7; New York, 3; Illinois, 2; Iowa, 2; Georgia, 1; Michigan, 1.

Wool from Pine Trees.

Interesting accounts have recently appeared in foreign journals of a novel branch of industry carried on in Silesia, combining so much of ingenuity and utility as to render a summary of the information very acceptable to those who are seeking for new sources of employment or of profit. It appears that, in the neighborhood of Breslau, on a domain known as Humboldt Mead, there are two establishments alike remarkable: one is a factory for converting the leaves or spines of the pine trees into a sort of cotton or wool; in the other, the water which has served in the manufacture of this vegetable wool is made use of as salutary baths for invalids. They were both erected under the direction of Herr von Pannewitz, one of the chief forest-inspectors, and the inventor of a chemical process by meams of which a fine filamentous substance can be obtained from the long and slender leaves of the pine. This substance has been called holz wolle, wood wool, from a similarity in its quality to that of ordinary wool; it may be curled, felted, or spun in the same way.

The first use made of the filamentous matter was to substitute it for the wadding used in quilted counterpanes. In 1842, five hundred counterpanes so prepared were purchased for the use of the hospital at Vienna; and, after an experience of several years, the purchase has been renewed. It was remarked, among other things, that the influence of the wood wool prevented parasitic insects from lodging in the beds, and the aromatic odor arising from it had been found as beneficial as it was agreeable. Shortly afterwards, the Penitentiary at Vienna was provided with the same kind of quilts; and they have since been adopted—as well as mattresses filled with the same wool—in the Hospital de la Charité at Berlin, and in the Maternity Hospital and barracks at Breslau. A trial of five years in these different establishments has proved that the wood wool can be very suitably employed for counterpanes, and for stuffed or quilted articles of furniture, and that it is very durable.

It has been further ascertained that this wool can be spun and woven. The finest gives a thread similar to that of hemp, and quite as strong. When spun, woven, and combed, a cloth is produced which has been used for carpets, horse-cloths, &c.; while, mixed with a canvas warp, it will serve for quilts, instead of being employed in the form of wadding.

In the preparation of this wool, an etherized oil is formed, of an agreeable odor, and green in color, but which on exposure to the light changes to a yellowish-orange tint, and which resumes its original color on the light being again excluded. Under the rectifying process, it becomes colorless as water, and is found to differ from the essence of turpentine extracted from the stem of the same tree. Its employment has proved most salutary in gouty and rheumatic affections, and when applied to wounds as a balsam; as also in certain cases of worm disease and cutaneous tumors. In the rectified state, it has been successfully used in the preparation of lacs for the best kinds of varnish; in lamps it burns as well as olive oil; and it dissolves caoutchouc completely and speedily. Already the perfumers of Paris make large use of this pine oil.

With respect to the baths; it having been discovered that a beneficial result attended the external application of the liquor left after the coction of the leaves, a bathing establishment was added to the factory.

We understand that these baths have been in operation for nine years, with a continual increase of reputation and number of visitors That the facts are not exaggerated, would appear from medals having been awarded to M. Weiss, the proprietor and manager, by societies in Berlin and Altenburg, for the extraordinary results produced. As likely to lead to a new development of industry, the processes are especially worthy of attention.

VARIETY.

The Mississippi Valley Railroad Convention, which assembled at St. Louis a short time since, adopted resolutions in favor of the construction of a railroad from the City of New Orleans to a central point in the Territory of Minnesota, in the direction of the Red River of the North, and with a branch to the Falls of St. Anthony; said road to pass by the capital of the State of Arkansas, Iron Mountain, and the City of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, and the valley of the Des Moines, in the State of Iowa. To construct this road, they ask from Congress a quantity of land equal to alternate sections for ten miles in width on each side of said Railroad, throughout its entire length, with the privilege of selecting other lands to make up the quantity of such tracts as may have been sold, or are subject to preëmption, within the distance of ten miles from the line.

The Boston Bee says: "The Truant Law appears to work finely in our city. One of the officers reports, as the result of his labors during the past two months, that he had found 130 truant children, of whom all but 20 had been induced to attend school regularly; 60 of them were habitual truants, 70 were absentees; many of them had never been to school before. Six of the habitual truants have been sent to the House of Reformation for six months; one to the State Reform School for three years; seven taken in charge by the overseers of the poor; three admitted to the Charity School in Channing-st., and four provided with good places in the country."

The Boston papers chronicle a new experiment in paving. They say workmen are engaged in paving Howard-st., between Stoddard and Somerset-sts., with a sort of iron pavement, invented by Mr. Terry, a citizen of Boston. The blocks are 12 inches in diameter, 8 inches deep, 1 inch thick, of cast iron, cylindrical in form, hollow, and divided into cells, which will be filled with gravel. The blocks are so made that when properly laid the edges overlay in such a manner as to keep the whole firmly set. This paving is being laid merely as an experiment, for the purpose of seeing what effect the frost will have upon it.

The Hunterdon (N. J.) Gazette states that a miraculous escape from highway robbery occurred recently near Locktown, Hunterdon Co. Mr. Elisha Warford, in anticipation of going on a journey, had a large sum of money about him. A servant in his employ took the horse and carriage, also the coat and hat often worn by Mr. W. As the servant was returning, some villain, secreted along the fence, fired at the servant, who greatly resembled Mr. W. The first attempt to fire the gun exploded the cap, which caused the horse to leap suddenly, throwing the driver to the bottom of the wagon. The load was discharged through the wagon, and would have killed the driver had he retained his seat.

Mrs. Brougham, mother of the ex-Chancellor, was a most excellent and thrifty housewife. On one occasion she was much troubled with a servant addicted to dish-breaking, and who used to alledge, in extenuation of her fault, "that is was crackit before." One morning little Henry tumbled down stairs, when the fond mother, running after him, exclaimed, "Oh, my boy, you've broke your head." "No, ma," said the future Chancellor, "it was crackit before."

A staid and demure Quaker lady entered a dry goods establishment, with the intention of making purchases. The salesman commenced praising his own goods at the expense of his neighbor's, stating, at the same time, what great saving in expense she would make by purchasing of him. She heard him silently for a time, and finished the conversation by saying: "Friend C., what a pity it is, that it is a sin to lie, when it seems so necessary in thy business!"

A person meeting an old man with silvery hair and a very black bushy beard asked him how it happened that his beard was not so gray as the hair of his head? "Because," said the old gentleman, "it is twenty years younger!"

The art of conversation consists in the exercise of two fine qualities. You must originate and you must sympathize; you must possess at the same time the habit of communication and listening. The union is rare, but irresistible.

We celebrate nobler obsequies to those we love by drying the tears of others than by shedding our own; and the fairest funeral wreath we can hang on their tomb is a fruit offering of good deeds.

In the river bank at Zanesville, Ohio, a "Fossil Elephant" has been discovered, the third of the same species, the Courier says, that has been discovered in the same gravel bank within a few years.

In the New Hampshire Legislature, the other day, notice was given of a bill granting licenses to sell wines and spirituous liquors in certain cases.

"Lost, yesterday, somewhere between sunrise and sunset, two golden hours, each set with sixty diamond minutes. No reward is offered, for they are gone for ever."

The yearly redemption of country money by the Suffolk Bank, Boston, is stated, in the Banker's Magazine, to be $250,000,000, or an average of about five millions of dollars per week.

On Thursday, 2d inst., twenty-five steamboats arrived at New Orleans, bringing immense amounts of produce, and 24,000 bales of cotton.

The following horrible announcement recently appeared in a window in Wolverhampton. "Baking every day. N. B.—People's vitals cooked."

WONDERS OF CREATION.

There is, perhaps, nothing in nature better calculated to call out the sublime emotions of the soul, and to enrapture the intellectual vision, than the study of Astronomy—an investigation, limited though it is, and must necessarily be, of the temple of the Universe, boundless in extent and bulk of matter, and limitless in duration, though subject, now and then, during the revolving cycles of eternity, to changes in the economy of its arrangement. The mind becomes immediately associated with the infinite, and converses with Almighty Power at every step of its progress, until, lost in wonder and adoration, it is forced to exclaim, with the Psalmist, "Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty."

Go out on a clear December evening, and lift your eyes towards the "upper deep," and contemplate its beauties, its glories. Mark the many luminaries that burn there, arranged into so many beautiful configurations. Count their hosts; estimate, if you can, their distances and magnitudes; and then will you be led to exclaim with the poet,

> "O, what a confluence of ethereal fires,
> That, from the steep of heaven, streams to a point,
> And centers on my sight."

Orion, with his beautiful group of stars arranged into the form of a child's cup; Sirus, or the Dog Star; Procyon, in the Lesser Dog; Aldebaran, with his ruddy glow; Castor and Pollux, locked in eternal embrace; the Pliades, or Seven Sisters—are all climbing the eastern steep of the sky, while Cassiopeia with her chair, Cephus, the Dragon, the Great Bear with his dipper and pointers, and the Lesser Bear with his unchanging pole star, as if appointed the eternal sentinels to keep watch over the earth during the hours of darkness, never descending below the horizon, are pacing their unwearied rounds.

To assist in forming a faint idea of the grandeur of the scale on which the Universe is built, let us commence with a contemplation of the Earth, considered as a planet. The Earth is about eight thousand miles in diameter, and twenty-five thousand in circumference. It moves in an elliptical orbit around the sun, through a space of about six hundred millions of miles in three hundred and sixty-five days—sixty-eight thousand miles an hour, or about twenty miles a second. To the minds of most men, there is something startling in the idea of being carried along by a locomotive at the rapid speed of a mile a minute. But what is this compared with moving a thousand times faster—to being tilted along on the whirling sphere of the earth twenty miles at every beating of the pulse? All the powers which man can command, have never produced a motion of any substance tangible to sight and touch, one twentieth part as rapid. A cannon ball, with its most rapid flight, continued, would fall more than sixty thousand miles behind in the short space of an hour. If the contemplation of the steam engine drawing his monstrous loads after him, or the noble steamer, spurning the foaming waters from its ribbed sides, and bearing triumphantly across the deep its hundreds of tuns burden, or Niagara, or the rushing of the tornado, and the tremendous sweep of the hurricane, or the boundless ocean, surging with billowy tides his rocky shores, or Chimborazo, standing in awful majesty, with head piercing the clouds, or of Cotopaxi, belching forth streams of living liquid flame; if the contemplation of these is calculated to call forth unspeakable emotions of awe and grandeur, what overpowering emotions must be created by the contemplation of the whole earth, the theater of all these mighty phenomena, and the seat of numerous Chimborazos and Cotopaxis, sent rolling from the great workshop of creation, with such tremendous force as to carry it forward a thousand miles a minute—this force being so nicely balanced with the attractive energy of the sun, as to cause it to move in an elliptical orbit through all time.

The Sun, the center of the Solar System, is 800,000 miles in diameter, and 2,500,000 miles in circumference, containing about 26,700,000,000,000,000,000 (twenty-six thousand seven hundred millions of billions) of cubic miles. Were a train of cars, moving at the rate of thirty miles per hour, to commence the circuit of the sun's circumference, it would require more than ten years (night and day) to complete the journey. Where the sun a hollow sphere, and the earth placed in the center of it, there would be much more than room enough for the moon to perform its accustomed monthly revolution at its ordinary distance, which is about 240,000 miles, from the earth. Were one million four hundred thousand such worlds as ours heaped together in one vast pile, their united bulk would only equal that of the sun.

The planet Jupiter revolves around the sun at the distance of 495,000,000 miles from that luminary. It performs its revolution in twelve years, moving through a space of 2,980,000,000 miles in that time, at the rate of ten miles a second. Its diameter is 80,000 miles, ten times the diameter of the earth. It is equivalent in bulk to thirteen hundred such globes as ours. It has a diurnal motion of ten hours in length, giving its inhabitants alternate day and night of five hours.

The star Sirus, or the Dog Star, the brightest fixed star in the firmament, is estimated to be more than 20,000,000,000,000 (twenty millions of millions) of miles from the earth, a distance so vast that lightning, flying with the inconceivable velocity of 275,000 miles a second, would require nearly two years and a half to cross the mighty space. A luminary at so vast a distance must be immensely large to enable it to shine with such brilliancy in our nocturnal sky.

The star Vega, in the constellation of the Lyre, is estimated to be 2,400,000 miles in diameter, twenty-seven times greater than the sun, or greater than thirty-seven million worlds like ours!—a universe in itself; and yet the firmament glows with a thousand such universes, and the telescope brings to view millions more. This instrument reveals a semi-transparent body in the southern part of the heavens, supposed to be solid, which is estimated to be so immense in bulk, that its center placed on the center of the sun, its vast circumference would take in the whole orbit of Uranus. This planet is eighteeen hundred million miles from the sun. Double this distance, and we have the immense, the incomprehensible diameter of that vast globe! Eight hundred and fifty thousand times the diameter of the Earth! A globe equivalent to 613,125,000,000,000,000 (more than six hundred thousand millions of millions) such worlds as ours! And yet this is but a mere speck in the Universe of God; and were it anihilated, not one in a million of Earth's inhabitants would know it! How do the puny works of men dwindle to less than nothing, when compared with such mighty, incomprehensible, almost infinite globes! How appropriate the exclamation of the Psalmist, when overwhelmed by the contemplation of the grandeur and glory of the works of God: "Lord, what is man, that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man, that thou visitest him."

The telescope brings to view suns at such vast distances, that light, which leaps across a space of two hundred thousand miles per second, would require thirty thousand years to come from one of them to the earth. Therefore, if one of them were struck out of existence, a thousand generations of men would pass away before its light would cease to shine upon the Earth.

In the presence of Him who made all these mighty globes, and who governs them by the might of His power, how ought we to tremble, and how reverently bow and adore!

MATHETES.

THE CHINA MISSION.

An interesting letter from Bro. Wardner to the Missionary Board, has recently been received, from which the following extract is made. It bears date the 17th of Sept. 1852.

"I propose to fill a part of my letter with extracts from my journal.

"April 12th. Some boat men and women called in my absence for books. Mrs. W., after some conversation, gave each a Calendar, and invited them to call again. This they did on the 15th, bringing a large bundle of greens, which they wished to exchange for books, saying they had nothing better to give. Mrs. W. (I being again absent) replied that what books we had were free for all who wished to read them, and supplied each with a copy of the Ten Commandments with Comments, which they accepted with apparent gratitude, and insisted upon her accepting of the greens as an expression of their thankfulness. They also requested that I would go to their place, (about 100 lee distant,) and preach to them this new doctrine, saying they were poor, and could not provide very good accommodations, but would freely give me such as they had. I was then engaged upon my house, and could not accompany them. I have seen nothing of them since. The distance is greater than foreigners are allowed to go from Shanghae, which might render such an undertaking imprudent. It is seldom that we witness so much zeal among Chinese to learn the doctrine, and it would indeed be a luxury to preach it to them.

"May 22d. Evening after the Sabbath, commenced preaching in a hamlet, a quarter of a mile from our house, in a room which I hire at fifty cents per month, occupying it once a week. It is partly filled with looms, spinning-weels, beds, tables, and farming tools, and sometimes poultry, and occasionally a buffalo, besides the family of the owner. These inconveniences, however, are nothing, so I can get a hearing. At first, the room was crowded, and the doors and windows filled with hearers and spectators. But the number has considerably diminished since, though we have respectable congregations when the weather is good.

"July 4th. Being prevented from going to Sah-whay-jaw yesterday, I started to go to-day. On the road, met the owner of the tea-shop where I preach, with a friend who was seeking employment, and who, after recommending himself as well as he knew how, proposed that if I would employ him, he would believe my doctrine. I replied by asking him whether he would consider it consistent with filial piety, were his son to propose, that if he could be rewarded so much a month, and get this and that favor, he would then respect his father and his authority, but not otherwise? 'O no,' was the reply. But, said I, your proposition amounts to the same thing. You say, if I will employ you, (at good wages, of course,) you will then acknowledge and respect the authority of your Heavenly Father; which implies that you are not willing to do it without. Is this right? I do not feel inclined to hire men to be His disciples; for such hirelings, I fear, would not be true.

"The shop-keeper then began in rather an eloquent strain, saying how much he loved the doctrine, and how diligent he was in proclaiming it to his customers, &c. I understood his game from what I had seen before, which led me to deal with him somewhat more plainly. Said I, 'If you sincerely believe and love the doctrine, as you say, why do you not practice accordingly?'

"Ans. 'I do.'

"'But when I go to your shop, on Sabbath-days, to preach, I generally find that you have gone to the city with a load of produce to sell. Now, if you were honest in your profession, I fancy I should not find you off peddling on the Sabbath quite so often.'

"'But I am poor, and it requires all my time and energies to provide for myself and family.'

"'But if you loved the doctrine much, you would be willing to make some sacrifices for it, and trust God for the result. He has taught his children to ask Him for their daily bread, and has promised to supply them. He feeds the birds of the air, and how much more will he provide for his children! Are not all the necessaries of life the gifts of his providence? And can you expect to gain any thing by offending him? Suppose you had seven dollars, and in charity should give me six, reserving only one for your own use; what would you think if I, not satisfied, should watch my opportunity, and steal your last dollar? Would you consider that a proper return for your kindness? And would you be likely to assist me the second time?'

"'Well, this is just the way you treat God. Every day of your life is his gift, and he has allowed you six days out of seven to labor and transact your worldly business, reserving only the seventh for himself. But you, not satisfied, are continually stealing away and profaning his holy and sanctified day, while at the same time you profess to love him and his precepts. Is this the fruit of your love? Is this a proper return for his mercies to you? Besides, what good do you expect to result from your preaching while you are always contradicting it by your practice? Were I to exhort men not to steal, while I practiced stealing myself every opportunity, and every body knew it, what effect would my exhortations have? If we wish to influence others to do right, we must first set them an example.'

"But he still continued quite eloquent in his efforts to convince me that he was a true believer, and (as I expected) wound up with a very polite request for the loan of three dollars as a stock to trade upon, saying he would bring me some peaches when they were ripe. I told him I had no money furnished me to invest in trade, or to set up others in business. I was sent to China for another purpose. Were he in distress, and unable to help himself, I should then feel it a privilege to assist him. But while he was able to provide for himself, it was his duty to do so. After a little further conversation we parted.

"A large majority of those who profess to be interested in the doctrine, turn out like this man. I presume one half of the people in Shanghae, if questioned, would profess to believe in Jesus and his doctrine. One of my men, (Chung-Quay) the other evening, when asked, professed faith with considerable earnestness, and expressed a desire and a determination to be a true disciple; and I doubt not he would willingly consent to be baptized to-morrow, if I were to propose it. Still, I have no more evidence that he loves the doctrine, than that the majority of the people of Shanghae do; although he doubtless believes it to be a good doctrine.

"15th. About noon, my attention was called to a procession, which was passing about half a mile off. It was about a mile long, having forty-two images of dragons, made of cloth and paper, painted according to the Chinese idea of the original. They were thirty or forty feet long, mounted on bamboo poles, and borne by several men, who kept them constantly raving and writhing, as though in great distress. Each one was accompanied by a band of music. On inquiry, I was told that the design of the procession was to move their deities to give them rain, as they were fearing a drouth; and that the display of these images was to induce the dragon gods of the sea to ascend up to heaven, and bestow the desired blessing. Water-spouts they suppose to be caused by the spiral motions of these monsters, as they take their upward flight, which, they contend, is established by ocular proof. This has so long been the established belief, that they are designated by the name Long-se, dragon water. He is considered as 'the chief of the scaly tribe, and can appear or disappear at pleasure, become large or small, long or short; in spring it mounts up to heaven, in autumn it dives down into the deep.'

"After this, a similar procession advanced to the city daily from some one of the hamlets near us, and returned again towards night. But after a few days, being unsuccessful, they took one of their chief gods from his throne, placed him in an open sedan chair, and thus, day after day, paraded him bareheaded through the hot sun, while the thermometer stood 98° in the shade. He bore his persecution without a murmur, however, till one afternoon, as the procession was returning from the city, and arrived opposite our house, a copious shower burst upon them, drenching them and him from head to foot. As it began to rain, they raised a loud shout of victory, and then fled for shelter.

"Several years ago, there being an excess of rain, the people at Ning-po, after parading their idols through the streets for many successive days without effect, becoming discouraged and vexed, they placed their stubborn gods in the open streets, to suffer the consequences of their hardened indifference, to which they meekly submitted, without being bound. The rain continued, notwithstanding, for many weeks: still, the people were disposed to attribute it to some other cause rather than to the impotency of their gods.

"Public fasts are always held at such times, being proclaimed by the city magistrate. At first, the eating of pork is prohibited, then mutton, then fish, and afterwards other kinds of food, as the occasion may require; at the same time, the mandarins make daily prostrations before the tutelary gods, and sometimes several times in a day. It is said that the ancients also held seasons of fasting, on such occasions, with cessation from labor, when each one was expected carefully to review his conduct, repenting of all his errors, not knowing but he himself may be the cause of the calamity, and that by this means it may be averted. Worshiping of images, and parading of dragons, &c., is of later invention.

"The effects which we attribute to lightning they attribute to a large bird, which accompanies the thunder, (as they have it,) which holds an iron spike in its claws, with which it strikes men, shivers trees, &c. This also, they say, has frequently been seen. When a man is struck with thunder, (as they term it,) they think it is because of some atrocious crime of which he has been guilty, and which is generally revealed by inscriptions made on some part of the body by this winged executioner. This bird is also represented in some of their temples as the god of thunder, and the dragon above mentioned is also represented as the god of rain and of the sea.

"It was once a custom in China, that, when a distinguished man died, his wife or most intimate friend was buried with him, to be his companion and comforter in the other world. After a while, a wooden image or likeness of the person was substituted; which practice was continued till the time of Confucius, by whose influence, chiefly, it was discontinued.

"They have a curious superstition in regard to the fronting their houses. Temples and the residences of mandarins always front due south or due east, with but few exceptions. But the common people scrupulously avoid this position of their houses, as they imagine it will bring calamities upon them. Since I learned this, I have often observed, while passing through some of the principal streets in the city, with a compass in my hand, that most of them are so laid out as to vary a little from either of the four points. And where their general course is either due north and south, or due east and west, they are made to wind back and forth on each side of a direct line. A riot once occurred in Canton in consequence of the arrows on the American flag-staff pointing in a direction which the people thought would bring calamities, and nothing but their removal could quiet them.

"There is a small island near Ning-po, called Poo-too, in the center of which is a large idol temple inhabited by priests, and is resorted to by the people from the main land on their general worship days during the year. This island, they say, when the priests first went there to build the temple, was so infested by serpents, that they were unable to proceed, and a violent contest ensued. But after fighting a long time, and victory being won by neither party, they entered into a treaty of peace, the conditions of which were, that the serpents should not bite any human being, and the priests, in return, were to see that they were protected from all violence; and to this day, it is said, both parties have strictly adhered to the conditions of this treaty. And when others visit the island besides priests, if the serpents show any disposition to molest them, all that is necessary is to call a priest, and they are at once dispersed, and will absent themselves from that spot any length of time the priest may require.

"This superstition, ridiculous as it is, is believed, as I should think from what I hear; and in the mind of a Chinaman, the control which those priests are said to exercise over those serpents, would doubtless be thought a very good offset to the alledged miracles of Jesus. One evidence that the story is believed is, that my teacher, who told me of it, seemed to be in doubt whether it might not be true; and, when I put the question to him whether he believed it, said he did not know whether it were true or not, and spoke of it to find out what report foreigners bring concerning it, as it is a place of much resort by invalids. Such foolish superstitions are eagerly swallowed by the multitude, while the rational truths of God's word are rejected as fables—a sad evidence of the depravity of the human heart, and of its natural bias towards error and wickedness.

"The following remarks of Dr. Legg, in regard to Chinese Chronology, are worthy of serious consideration. No missionary in China, I presume, has not felt some of the difficulties which it involves:

"'The commencement of Shun's reign is placed by Dr. Mailla A. C. 2255, and by Dr. Morrison A. C. 2230. Now, according to the received chronology, the dispersion from Babel took place A. C. 2230. In the same year, therefore, in which the earth was divided, we find Shun succeeding in China to the throne of Taou, who had reigned a hundred years, to a kingdom ruled by an Emperor, having under him twelve governors of districts, a host of nobles, ministers of astronomy, music and public instruction, &c. It is evident that the fathers of the Chinese nation must have separated from the other descendants of Noah, long before the times of Peleg. But from the deluge to the dispersion there elapsed only 113 years. There came out from the Ark Noah, his wife, his sons, and his sons' wives—only eight persons in all. If one son and his wife turned their faces immediately towards the east, it is not easy to conceive of their finding their way from Armenia across the intervening distance of desert to the territory of Shun-se, and there growing, within little more than a century, into a numerous people, with an established government and some scientific culture. It is impossible, I think, for such a thing to have occurred. Shall we discredit the records of the early Chinese history? They will not be discredited. One might as well deny the existence of the different geological strata and periods. They must be looked in the face. It will not serve the cause of revelation to neglect them, or deal with them as if they were only fables. Dr. Russel, late Bishop of Edinburgh, says in his connection of Sacred and Profane History—'We are told by Perren, that the Jesuit missionaries to China were actually obliged to return to Rome, to ask leave to use the Septuagint calculation, in order to satisfy the scruples of the better informed of that country.' It is well known, that the chronology of the world, from the creation up to the birth of Abraham, differs very much in the present Scriptures and in the Septuagint version; so much so that, from the creation to the birth of Christ, there were, according to the Hebrew text, 4004 years, but according to the Septuagint 5507 years. Supposing that the chronology of the Septuagint may be sustained on other grounds, the reign of Shun will commence A. M. 3277, or 1015 years after the deluge; and he will have been contemporary with Torah, the father of Abraham. The existence of an ordered kingdom at that period in China, is not more wonderful than the existence of one in Egypt. According to the same system, from the deluge to Peleg are 531 years. A large colony might then have started from Babel, and travelled to the northeastern part of China, and there is nothing impossible in its reaching its adjusted state in which we find it in the time of Shun, during the intermediate four centuries and a half. It is a question deserving consideration, which chronology to give in the Chinese version of the Scriptures. One who has written well on ancient chronology says—Let a man carefully study the history of Egypt, Assyria or China, or even of Astronomy, and he is instantly confounded with facts, bearing the impress of sterling historic truth, which directly contradict the abbreviated Hebrew chronology. Does not his mind naturally deduce the conclusion, that revelation can be sustained only by the abandonment of ligitimate research? That revealed truth can only stand by the renunciation of historic truth? (Smith's Sacred Annals, p. 99.'")

A BAPTIST HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

A late number of the Christian Watchman and Reflector has a lengthy article calling attention to the importance (which we think can not be over-estimated) of an organization for the purpose of collecting and publishing documents illustrative of the rise and progress of the Baptist Denomination in the United States. Providence, R. I., and Newton, Mass., are spoken of as proper places for the Society's head-quarters. Among the duties of such an organization would be the collecting and filing of newspapers, magazines, minutes, annual reports, sermons, and pamphlets of every kind. Two works for immediate publication are mentioned. One is the "Ill News from New England," written by Dr. John Clarke, the Baptist Pastor of Newport, R. I., and originally published by him in England in 1652, while he was there on colonial business. The other work mentioned is the Ecclesiastical History of New England, by Isaac Backus; concerning which the writer says:—

"This man, ever to be venerated, was born in 1724. At first a minister of the Congregational denomination, among the party known as Separatists, he was in that extensive movement, from which, under the doctrines of Jonathan Edwards and his fellow-laborers, Baptist churches sprung in rapid succession, and in great numbers. At the commencement of the Great Awakening, there were scarcely twenty Baptist churches in all New England, and generally they had little sympathy with the awakening, or participation in it. The rapid rise of the Baptists which then occurred, was an outside movement, from among Congregationalists. It was the natural result of the teachings of Edwards on the nature and privileges of a gospel church, and illustrates what has frequently been observed, that disciples, sooner than teachers, follow principles to their results. The wonderful movement excited the hostility of the standing order, and the hand of power came down heavily upon the Baptists, (as, in justice it should be said, it did upon the Separatists also.) Rising soon to eminence among the Baptists, Backus became their chief representative and champion, and ultimately their historian. He was equal to every position, and adorned every one. Gentle in temper, he had the courage of a lion. He carried the case of his brethren before Conventions, Legislatures, and even the Congress, and made himself and his cause respected. When occasion required, he resorted to the press, and in a style homely, but clear, he stated and defended the rights of conscience with irresistible force. His history secured the thanks of his brethren, at the time, (of the Philadelphia Baptist Association in 1785,) and has always been approved for its honesty, and for its dignified moderation under injury. Bancroft has applauded its documentary accuracy. Long out of print, it is only by the rarest good fortune that a copy can be obtained. Few of our ministers, even, have ever seen it. An abridgement of it is better known, having been twice republished.

"The life of Mr. Backus extended from 1724 to 1806, and covered a period of important events. During his life occurred not only the great Baptist movement in New England, but also that in Virginia; oppressions were renewed against Baptists here and there, and the battle for their liberties was successfully fought. During the same period occurred the war of the Revolution, and the adoption of the Constitution—himself and his brethren sustaining important relations to those events. Brown University was founded while he was in the maturity and strength of his powers, and his sun was not altogether descended beyond the hills, before Carey was at his toils, and the first rays of light from eastern missions came gleaming over the horizon. The materials illustrative of his life and times, now possessed by his grandson, and in part wrought into shape by a venerable brother in the ministry, residing in the neighborhood of Middleboro', are described to us as numerous and valuable. At one time, sent to the American Congress (in 1774) to lay before that body the grievances of his brethren; at another, visiting Virginia to strengthen the hands of the Baptists there, who were struggling for the same rights, he kept journals of these events, which are still in existence. Among his papers are likewise, so we are informed, records of journeys among the churches of Connecticut, developing their condition. A man of facts, he was in the habit of noting down facts on slips of paper, which remain to this day. Besides this, he maintained an extensive correspondence, and large numbers of letters are among the relics of his life. The precise value of all this accumulation, we do not know. The accounts which we have had, have made us anxious to behold it, and of that privilege, we have had the promised pleasure.

"The proposed republication of Backus' History, with a suitable account of his life and times, would require two octavo volumes. It might be more readable, by separating the numerous documents from the text, and putting them in notes. Its republication in some form, and the preservation of the historical materials referred to, seem to us of such consequence as to demand denominational attention. The burning of one or two dwellings would be the irreparable loss of all those materials.

"It will be observed that the lives and times of Clark and Backus embrace more than half the period which has elapsed since the settlement of the country. The period intervening between them could be covered in several ways. John Callender, the accomplished Newport pastor, author of the Historical Discourse, and John Comer, the devout young minister, whose manuscripts are in the possession of the Rhode Island Historical Society, were both historically connected with the First Baptist church in Boston, around which clusters the Baptist question of the close of the 17th century, and commencement of the 18th, a question intimately connected with the purity of religion in New England. During this period occurred the ordination of Elisha Callender, when Cotton Mather preached his Good Men United sermon, and the benefactions to Harvard College, of the delighted Thomas Hollis. There is a deep significance in the events which at this time changed the aspect of a portion of the Boston Congregationalists towards their Baptist brethren.

"We hardly need say, that this series should close with Stillman and Baldwin, whose lives come down to our own day. The former, indeed, was nearly contemporaneous with Backus. Born thirteen years after Backus, he followed him to the grave within less than four months. But he deserves this distinct memorial. Baldwin, too, runs back upon the times of Backus, but he survived him near twenty years, and witnessed the more ripened harvests, of which all these worthies had scattered the seed. He lived to see our missions expanding, and several of our colleges and theological seminaries with their foundations laid. There was another, likewise, whose name would find frequent mention in the Baptist magnolia—Hezekiah Smith, the Haverhill pastor. These men fell upon times which tried men's souls, and had they been less faithful to God, and the rights of conscience, New England, so far as human discernment can judge, would not have been as at this day."

BIBLE-READING SLAVE.

Some time since, while traveling in North Carolina, in consequence of my buggy breaking down in a lonely place, I was obliged to return for some miles with a rail, in place of of a wheel, to the estsblishment of a large planter, the owner of several hundred slaves. When I arrived, the planter and family being from home, I was obliged to take up my abode with the overseer, a kind and obliging man. It was soon rumored among the negroes that a preacher was at the overseer's, which excited no little interest. At an early hour in the evening a large number of slaves came around the house to see the preacher, shake hands with him, and ask if he would pray with and for them at the house of the overseer. Among the crowd was an old man, about eighty years old, who made a profession of religion in the year 1791. He is looked upon as a kind of patriarch among the negroes. When introduced to me, he remarked, "I understand you are a Bible Agent—and I am a Bible-reading slave. I wish you great success—the Bible has been a great blessing to me. When I was brought to see my condition as a lost sinner, I did not know one letter of the alphabet; but, by exertion and perseverance, I learned to read. The Bible has been my daily companion for about fifty years."

His knowledge of the Bible appeared to be general and accurate. He delighted much in the character and work of the Redeemer. His views of the plan of redemption were clear and scriptural. His hope was bright and animating. When asked if he could do anything to procure his own salvation, he replied promptly, "No. Man cannot convert himself to God, or persevere in the ways of righteousness, without the aid of divine grace." He supported his views of doctrines and experience, by bringing forward numerous and appropriate passages of God's Holy Word. He rejoiced much that his salvation was not in his own hands, and depended not upon his own righteousness, but that believers are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation.

After a long and interesting conversation with this Bible-reading slave, as many of the negroes as could get into the the house, and many who stood around it, joined in prayer to God, and rendered thanks for the blessings of the day.

In the morning we had prayers again, and all the negroes who desired were permitted to attend.

The graves of the young should be moistened with tears of joy instead of grief; for the grave is the mausoleum that shuts out from them forever the contact with earthly trouble and misery.

CLOSE OF THE YEAR—FUTURE PROSPECTS.

Though the point at which the old year terminates and the new begins is arbitrarily established—it being neither the winter nor the summer solstic, the autumnal nor the vernal equinox—it is, nevertheless, one whose recurrence is calculated to call up very solemn reflections. The year itself is not an arbitrarily fixed period; it is the time occupied by the earth in its revolution round the sun. The Being who said, "Let there be lights in the firmament of heaven," assigned to them their uses. "Let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years." Gen. 1: 14. Accordingly, we find the duration of man's life reckoned by years from the beginning. And as "the days of our years are three score years and ten," how solemn the reflection, as we approach the moment that divides one year from another, that so many of our years are already gone! O, how soon will death, judgment, and eternity, spring upon us!

Reader, how are you spending your time? Do you make self-gratification the main end of your existence, or do you seek to please Him who created you and redeemed you? Alas! how many of those who name the name of Christ spend the principal part of their time in striving to render themselves comfortable, while the cause of their Master is attended to only so far it does not interfere with their own enjoyment! Yet the Master has said—and he will never alter his words—"Except a man deny himself, he cannot be my disciple."

The year upon which we are soon to enter, if spared, may be a very eventful one. We undertake no vaticination in regard to coming events, but it strikes us that the present prosperity of the business of our country is destined to receive a check before long, and that, in the reaction which will follow, there will be distress and perplexity. That this crisis may come about within a twelve-month, is very possible, and before the time arrives for wishing them a happy new year, some of our readers may have become overwhelmed with such disasters, that the congratulation will seem but mockery.

These forebodings do not grow out of any particular sagacity, on our part, in descrying the state of the commercial heavens. Men of shrewd business tact might think them altogether groundless. By their method of reckoning, it may be proved that business is conducted upon much safer principles than it was previous to the great crash in 1837. The multiplied increase of banking institutions, and the expansion of their issues, may seem of no importance to them, because of the proportionate influx of gold to render unnecessary any suspension of specie payments. And, for aught we know, they may have a method of proving, that the speculation in real estate, whereby property obtains a fictitious value, notwithstanding the mania that is prevailing with regard to it, is perfectly safe. On these points, we profess no particular skill in judging. We leave them to those who are accustomed to handle such matters.

But our ciphering is after another system. We have a Book before us, which teaches us that this world of trial is the place where God schools his children for heaven;—that when their path becomes so filled with snares that they cannot move without falling and being destroyed, he will remove the snares out of the way;—that his faithfulness will not allow them to be tempted above what they are able, but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that they may be able to bear it.

In the present state of community, we see the path of God's children filled with snares. The wonderful facilities open on every hand for the acquisition of wealth, are a temptation to them. They are drawn into the general current, they are becoming dizzy with excitement, and have forgotten their duty as Christians. Moreover, there is, on the part of almost the entire community, a making haste to be rich—a rapacity which refuses to be satisfied with reasonable gains. Men are mad in the pursuit of riches, and seem to care not how they amass them. They grind the poor, and pant after the very dust on his head; and the hire of their laborers is kept back by fraud.

Now the righteousness of God is pledged to put a check to this course of things; and it is on this ground that we look for another commercial prostration very soon. There is a necessity for it in the moral condition of society. Looking at it in this light only, we feel almost as sure of it as if it had actually taken place. It may not occur within the next year, but long delayed it cannot be.

But, reader, we ask you to pause for a moment, and contemplate this solemn state of things—a world madly bent on pleasure and luxury—every one striving after that condition wherein he can say, 'Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry'—mammon the great object of regard, and God not in all their thoughts. Will you allow yourself to be drawn away by the excitement, and with the many say, "Who will show us any 'good?" or will you make the wise choice, and say, "Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us?" T. B. B.

American Baptist Register.—The American Baptist Publication Society, at Philadelphia, has issued a very complete Register of the Baptist Denomination. From a notice of it in the Baptist Record, we learn that the volume contains 496 pages. It is printed on beautiful paper, and embraces engravings of 27 church and college edifices. The sketches of state conventions, associations alphabetically arranged, names of churches, dates of constitution, counties in which located, pastors, the baptized in 1851, number of communicants, with the names and post-offices of ordained and licensed ministers, fill 373 pages. These are followed by the American Indian churches, also the Welsh and German churches. Summary tables of the associations in each state fill 26 pages. These are followed by valuable tables, embracing a comparative summary, colored members, sabbath schools, ratio of churches, ministers and members to the whole population, Baptist periodicals, ordinations, churches constituted, new church buildings dedicated, and obituary notices. Then follows the educational department, embracing theological seminaries, colleges, academies, high schools, &c. Also, an account of the benevolent societies. Next we find tables of the Baptist churches in other countries, British Provinces, Europe, Asia and Africa. The concluding pages contain an account of the Anti-Mission, Free Will, Six Principle, Seventh-day Baptists, &c., with a grand summary of baptized Christians, and religious denominations. The grand total of regular Baptists in the United States, (not including Anti-Mission, Free Will, &c.,) is 772,216, showing the baptism of 56,431 in one year, or a nett gain of 31,142.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Crystal Palace and Sunday—The Madiai and Others in Tuscany.

Glasgow, December 10th, 1852.

The Law Officers of the Crown have given it as their opinion, that the Act of George III., "prohibiting the opening of disorderly places, under the pretence of discussing religious and political questions on Sundays," by its terms would render it illegal to open the Crystal Palace for exhibition on that day. The Charter granted by the Government to the Company contains, therefore, a clause prohibiting its being so opened, unless sanctioned by Parliament. An Act securing them this liberty is to be applied for. This at least the Record states on the authority of a prelate; but that journal complains grievously of being kept in the dark as to what the Palace Company mean to do. From this cause, it says, the Committee of the Sunday Society have met three or four times recently almost in vain. But the Record, in its anxiety to prevent the Sunday exhibition, shows several ways in which, without any new enactment, the law may be so evaded as to admit of it. The Railway Company might arrange, says the journalist, with the Palace Company, to admit gratuitously all that come by that line. They might also admit parties as proprietors at low terms. It is therefore urged, that a Charter should be withheld unless the proprietors agree to the insertion of "a clause which shall irrevocably bind" them from ever opening it on any part of Sunday. But the Charter had been already granted several days before that article was written, and it binds them simply to keep it shut on Sunday, "unless the Legislature sanction" its being opened. But perhaps the Record has little hope that Parliament will refuse its sanction—and, unless it do so, the Sunday cause will have lost rather than gained by the agitation of the question. The Nonconformist, in a leading article, two days ago, intimates this to be his opinion of the result. Two clergymen, in their unscrupulous zeal in the cause, have placed themselves in an awkward position—not to speak of the more serious evil involved. The Rev. H. V. Elliott, Curate of St. Mary's Chapel, Brighton, at a recent meeting in opposition to the Sunday opening of the Palace, spoke confidently of the writers in the Times as being bribed on the question, and as receiving "enormous" sums. But when written to by the solicitors for the Times, he sought to back out, saying he did not intend to charge the Times with "venal advocacy." So, also, the Rev. W. Curling, at another meeting, more recently held, said "he had opportunities of knowing" of this bribery; but, making a mystery of his authority, said he would not inform the audience how he came into possession of the condemnatory fact. The secret has, however, been extorted from him. The same solicitors favored him with a letter of inquiry—when he referred to the speech of his reverend brother above-named, as his only authority. Whether the Times will be contented to leave the matter so, remains to be seen.

A Berlin paper intimated, some time ago, that the Madiai were to be liberated, on the 1st instant, and expectations had previously been indulged that this favor would be shown on the occasion of the Duchess' being confined. The birth of a son, on the 25th ult., has however been announced for a week, but no mention yet is made of the desired restoration of these victims to Papal intolerance and superstition. The King of Prussia had made it a matter of personal request to the Grand Duke, and a Memorial to our Queen in behalf of these persecuted Bible-readers, with 23,172 signatures, was presented on Sabbath last. Among those subscribing were a very large number of the nobility and members of Parliament. There is, however, some reason to fear that the Pope and the Jesuits will have more influence in restraining him. It is evident, that Popery is making a desperate effort to retain its victims; and the Protestant deputation has revealed the fact that very large numbers in Tuscany are inclined to escape from the priestly thrall. On this account, many others were found to be even then in prison; but the Daily News, of the 7th instant, has a communication from their Florence correspondent, announcing that M. Guarducci, who held an office in a banking-house, has been again arrested for the "crime" of Protestantism. He is one of the five individuals who, with Count Guiccardino, were a year ago sentenced to imprisonment for reading the Bible. His imprisonment was commuted to exile for a year; and having spent this term in Piedmont, he had recently returned to his situation in the bank in Florence. On the 21st ult., at three in the morning, his house was entered and searched, and a copy of Diodati's Bible having been found on the premises, he has been again imprisoned. The Lord be his help and stay!

DEDICATION.

The house built by 'The Adams Seventh-day Baptist Evangelical Society,' for the worship of God, was opened for its appropriate use on Fourth-day, the 15th instant. The religious services were conducted by Elders W. B. Maxson and N. V. Hull, and continued, morning and evening, until the evening of First-day the 19th. These religious exercises were attended by as large assemblies as could be accommodated with seats, and at the close the house was literally crammed. The numerous expressions of religious feeling by members of the congregation, were deeply interesting, and gave us reason to hope that good will result to the Church and Society, and to all who attended the meetings.

This house is erected on the southern limits of the village of Adams Center, Jefferson Co., N. Y. Its dimensions are 42 ft. by 30 ft., with a well-proportioned belfry. Its internal arrangement and finish are both convenient and chaste. It is provided with an ample apparatus for warming and lighting it. Its seats are handsomely cushioned, and we believe, that if the congregation that will occupy it shall be favored with the influence of the Holy Spirit, they will find it a very comfortable house for the worship of God.

Comm.

RAILROADING ON SUNDAY.

In connection with a notice, some weeks ago, of the increase of facilities for traveling on Sunday, in and around New York, we copied from the Tribune an editorial "Case of Conscience." That "case" led to some farther remarks, pro and con, which we copy for the purpose of having them on record for future reference.

To the Editor of the N. Y. Tribune:—

A case of conscience is often a nice question. Such is the one you raise in your paper on the petition against cars on the Sabbath. Like all nice questions, it depends for a just solution on an exact statement of principles. Let me attempt it.

Sabbath-breaking consists not in labor, but in profane labor. And labor is sacred or profane according to its motives and objects. Whatever labor is strictly necessary, to preserve life or the means of life, in emergencies that cannot be prepared for, is held to be of a sacred kind, as well as that required to warm churches, play the church organ, and even to preach the Gospel. So, also, whatever is strictly necessary to bring worshipers in delicate health, or from a distance, to the places where their edification will be best promoted, becomes sacred, by virtue of its sacred object. But if the carriage is ordered out needlessly, to gratify vanity or indolence, the case is radically different. On the other hand, if the City Railroads are wanted on the Sabbath exclusively for religious purposes, the Sabbath would not be profaned by them. Now, the City is to the rail-cars what the Fifth-avenue gentleman is to his elegant private equipage, i. e. their responsible master. If the owner of the private carriage cannot prevent its becoming a vehicle of extensive Sabbath-breaking after it has rolled him to church, he should dispense with it. If the City cannot furnish itself with the convenience of public carriages for attending Divine Service, without at the same time furnishing public facilities and temptations to amusement or business, which thousands will be sure to seize upon, then it violates the Sabbath by so doing.

But it cannot even be pretended that cars are to any considerable extent desired or used on the Sabbath for attending worship. The fares collected from church-goers would hardly feed a single horse, much less induce the owners to run their cars, if permitted. It is notorious that the vainest amusement and dissipation is the principal end ministered to by the Sunday cars. In view of these considerations, whatever condemnation may be due to the needless and vain employment of private carriages, I think your readers will scarcely be able to confound the running of Sunday cars with the use of private carriages, when necessary, to convey worshipers to Church—or the responsibility of the City for carriages licensed and regulated by itself, with its relation to those over which it never assumed control. C.

Brooklyn, Dec. 4, 1852.

Remarks.

We will only correct our correspondent's mistakes of fact. 1. The City does not own the Railcars, and consequently does not stand in the same relation to them that the Fifth-avenue gentleman does to his private carriage. 2. We speak from extensive personal observation, when we say, that several thousands of our citizens do ride to or from Church in Railcars every fair Sabbath—so that C. is mistaken on that point also. 3. Whoever has passed a Sabbath at Coney Island (east-end) or any other popular resort within easy reach of our City, must know, that the licensed carriages of our Hackmen and Stable-Keepers are extensively hired and used on that day—we think more so in summer than on any other day—and that not one in a hundred of those who hire them drive to Church. If, then, either is to be stopped, and but one, we insist that livery stables should be shut up on Sunday rather than Railroad cars should be stopped. But we do not maintain that any thing should or should not be done in the premises. Our position is, that if any thing is done to enforce by law a stricter observance of the Sabbath, it must be so done that the man who can only afford to pay six-pence for a ride shall feel that the man who rides in his own carriage or hires a livery turn-out for two or three dollars, is put under the same restrictions with himself. If this is not attended to, we apprehend difficulty in enforcing any ordinance that may be passed. [Ed. Tribune.

PETITIONS TO CONGRESS ON PEACE.

It is well known, or should be, that the friends of Peace propose to obviate every plea of necessity for war, by the introduction of substitutes which will accomplish all its legitimate ends of international justice and security, far better than the sword ever has, or ever can. Such substitutes can be introduced by rulers alone; and, under a government like ours, we can expect them to move in earnest, on a question of such magnitude, only in response to the voice of the people. They cannot and should not go in their official action farther or faster than public opinion shall clearly demand, or will fully sustain; and hence we would procure from the people, throughout the country, an expression of their wishes in the form of petitions like the one we give below.

We would respectfully, yet earnestly, solicit the reader's co-operation in this matter. We have no other means of obtaining these petitions, than the spontaneous agency of such men as yourself. The thing, however, can be easily done, at once, if you will only resolve that it shall be; but, for this purpose, you must either do it yourself, or actually get somebody else to do it. Just write off two copies of the subjoined forms, and see that they are forthwith circulated for signatures. It must be done soon, because the present session of Congress is so short, that nothing will be accomplished to any serious purpose, unless the subject is brought very early to their notice.

Remember that two petitions should be circulated—one for the Senate, and the other for the House of Representatives, each of which should be signed by every petitioner; and, when full, they should be sent, the former to one of the Senators from your State, and the latter to the Representative of your district, or to some member of each House known to be particularly interested in the object, with a note requesting his early and special attention to the subject.

In behalf of the American Peace Society,
Geo. C. Beckwith, Sec'ry.
Boston, Dec. 10, 1852.

Form of Petition.

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, citizens of ——, in the State of ——, deploring the great and manifold evils of war, and believing it possible to supersede its alledged necessity, as an Arbiter of Justice among nations, by the adoption of timely and feasible substitutes, respectfully petition your Honorable Bodies to take such action as you may deem best for this most desirable end, by "securing in our treaties with other nations, a provision for referring to the decision of umpires, all misunderstandings which cannot be satisfactorily adjusted by amicable negotiation."

THE MAINE LAW IN NEW YORK.

The coming session of the Legislature of New York will be extensively petitioned for a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage. The success of such a law in other States where it has been enacted, will give weight to these petitions, and encourages the hope that something of the kind will be enacted for our State. At any rate, the friends of temperance can hardly claim to be doing their duty, unless they exert themselves in this behalf. The reasons for a prohibitory law are very clearly and forcibly stated in the following extract from an article in a recent number of the N. Y. Tribune:—

1. It is impartial. There can be no pretense that such a law punishes little sins and sinners, but gives impunity to rich and respectable vice. It has at least the merit of treating all offenders exactly alike.

2. It rests on a clear moral basis. Its fundamental assumption is the immortality and evil of the Liquor Traffic. It does not, like our License Laws, assume that this traffic is pernicious or dangerous, and then give any one a dispensation to pursue it on payment of ten dollars. It does not pronounce the traffic immoral, and then attempt to confine it to men of 'good moral character.' But, contemplating and appreciating the great fountain of crime, pauperism and misery, it makes a manly, earnest and straightforward effort to seal it up and stay its bitter waters for ever.

3. It can be enforced. License Laws, especially in great cities, never can be; they rest on no moral basis, and appeal to no moral sentiment. No one can render a moral reason why, if a man who can afford to pay ten dollars for a license should be allowed to sell, a man who lacks and cannot scrape together that sum should not be. Thousands are now selling without license in our City, but those who know the fact will not complain of them, while those who would complain of them have no means of distinguishing them from the Licensed. If our License Laws were meant to be obeyed, they would at least require every seller to display his license conspicuously in the room where his traffic is carried on; but being intended only as a blind, and an anodyne for the public conscience, they are constructed accordingly.

4. The Maine Law embodies no new principle. It is simply the application to the insidious poison, Alcohol, of the common law principle which regulates the general dispensation of poisons. No man is now at liberty to sell Arsenic or Prussic Acid, except to persons who, he has good reason to believe, contemplate an innocent and salutary use of it. The fact that many imbibe Alcohol in ignorance of its poisonous character, is an additional reason for stringent public safeguards against its pernicious sale.

5. The Maine Law does its work. True, it does not stop all selling, any more than our laws against Theft, Forgery and Murder prevent absolutely the perpetration of those crimes; but it renders the traffic infamous, and dooms it to secrecy, stealth and darkness. It confronts every tippler with the warning that he is making himself an accomplice of offenders; it startles every youth, who may be tempted to take his first lessons in dissipation, with the knowledge that the Public Judgment and Public Conscience have deliberately condemned and stigmatized the traffic he is abetting. He who shall become a tippler in defiance of the Maine Law, can never plead ignorance as an excuse, nor saddle his degradation upon the community.

6. And finally, it is popular. The enemies of the Maine Law, though they rail against it as despotic, odious, obnoxious to public sentiment, &c., &c., are very shy of submitting it to the People. They wring and twist every way to dodge that ordeal. They are trying hard to repeal the law in Maine, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island; but in neither State have they desired a submission to the People.

Overland Colony for Oregon.—We noticed, last spring, the project of a Presbyterian colony to go overland to Oregon, under the leadership of Rev. J. C. Hanna, of Ohio. The result has not turned in favor of that mode of emigration. The whole party was scattered, through hardship and want, before reaching Oregon, and Mr. H. and his wife entered the Territory alone, eight days before the main body of colonists. Mr. H. thus describes his closing experience:—

"After two days rest, having spent a quiet Sabbath alone on the summit (or dividing ridge) of the Cascades, I again harnessed my mules, but in vain; they refused to pull. Consequently I was obliged to leave my carriage and goods in the mountains, sixty-five or seventy miles from Oregon City. They were left in care of a trusty friend until I should send out a fresh team. And now behold us packing. Mrs. H., having a side-saddle, was placed upon a pony—a small pack was placed upon a mule. Our provisions consisted of one loaf of bread, half a pound of dried beef, and a little coffee and tea. We were thus straitened on account of having our provisions stolen while preparing to pack. We start, solitary and alone, I on foot, driving before me four mules, so wearied as not to be able to carry a rider. On the second day our pony gave out; we were obliged to leave her in the mountains. Mrs. H. walked a portion of the way to save the noble beast. She was eventually prevailed upon to ride a mule. And in this manner we entered the far-famed valley of the Willamette, having spent four days since leaving our carriage and seven in the Cascade mountains."

Revival at Oberlin.—At the communion season in September, 20 were received to the church at Oberlin, and in December, 41; total 70; of whom 45 were by profession. The Oberlin Evangelist says:—

"Facts show that a considerable number and an increasing proportion of the pupils of the school who are converted here come from families not professedly pious. Some of these are cases of great interest. Among the company who came forward for baptism at the last communion, was one young man who had long been an infidel; one young lady recently from the depths of Catholic superstition in Ireland; another young lady deaf and dumb, but giving the brightest evidence of a sound conversion; and several persons of color. Who could behold such a gathering, and not exclaim: 'What hath God wrought?' 'Is any thing too hard for the Lord?'

Baptist Foreign Missions.—We have noticed (says the Watchman and Reflector) the embarkation of two companies of missionaries within three months, one to Burmah, and another to Africa; the one a scanty reinforcement of missions that call, as they have never before called, for abundant supplies of Christian teachers,—the other, a band devoted to the renewal of missionary effort in a field long neglected by our churches, but not forsaken by the Head of the church. Another company of missionaries now only wait for an opportunity to take passage to Burmah. No one can read the intelligence that comes monthly from our missions, without being deeply impressed with the conviction that Divine Providence is opening "a wide and effectual door" before us, into the very heart of heathenism.

A Colporteur while the World stands.—A friend of the American Baptist Publication Society, residing in Western New York, has determined to sustain a colporteur while the world stands, by the payment, while living or at his death, of $2,500, the interest of which will yield $150, the salary of a colporteur. Another friend in Massachusetts has also set apart in his will the sum of $2,500 for the perpetual support of a colporteur.

The Sabbath Recorder has just entered upon the last half of its ninth volume. In view of this, we have a request to make of our subscribers, which we hope may receive as generous a response as has attended similar requests heretofore. It is, that those who know the paper, and approve its character, will speak of it to others, and aid in extending its circulation. We do not ask you all to turn agents, and canvass your towns or neighborhoods for subscribers. But we suppose there is hardly one who cannot speak a good word to some one person, and thus easily procure one new subscriber for each old one.

The Memorial.—Agents having on hand surplus numbers of the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial are requested to return them to this office when a convenient opportunity offers. A few sets of the four numbers of 1852 have been put up in paper covers, which those subscribing for the second year would do well to order. The numbers of the first two years, bound together, will make a neat volume, containing a large amount of historical matter which can be found nowhere else in so compact and convenient a form.

Mendi Missions.—When the poor Mendians, who were taken from a Spanish slave-ship, and declared free by United States Courts, went back to their own country, they were accompanied by missionaries, of whom Rev. Mr. Raymond was the principal. About two years ago, a reinforcement of eight missionaries was sent out, two of whom fell victims to the climate, and two others were obliged to return home. Last week another reinforcement sailed from New York, consisting of Dr. Cole, Miss Maguire, Mr. and Mrs. Burton, Miss Aldrich, Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, Mr. Afficer, and Miss Saxton. The mission has been remarkably successful, not only in making proselytes, but in checking the slave-trade.

The Pay of Foreign Ministers.—The Secretary of State of the United States some time ago addressed circulars of inquiry to our Foreign Ministers as to the expense of living at the various Courts to which they are sent. Their replies have recently been made public. Mr. Lawrence thinks the Minister to London ought to have $20,000 a year, and says that his own expenses were more than that. Mr. Rives makes it cost about $17,000 a year to live in Paris; and the other Ministers run nearly as high! Of course, they all recommend an increase of their present pay, which is only $6,000 a year, with $9,000 for outfit. Strange that applicants for these offices are so plenty, when the cost of filling them is so much more than the income.

Expenses of Kossuth's Entertainment.—In the Board of New York Aldermen, one evening last week, a long discussion grew out of the presentation of a report of the Finance Committee, in favor of appropriating $3,800 to pay a balance due Mr. Howard, of the Irving House, for entertaining Kossuth and companions. The whole amount incurred at that house, for board, &c., was $14,299 87, and $1,000, it seems, was deducted, leaving $13,299 87. About last January $10,000 was paid on this, leaving a balance due Mr. H. of $3,739 62. The report was finally adopted by a vote of 12 to 7.

Price of Church Pews.—The pews of a Presbyterian Church recently built in Fifth-avenue, N. Y., were sold at auction last week, and brought prices ranging from $250 to $1500 each. Ninety-nine pews were sold in one evening for $86,350, being $14,700 more than their appraised value. How "the poor" are to have the gospel preached to them in a church where sittings are so expensive, is not stated.

New Episcopal Church.—A new church, christened St. Paul's, located in South Brooklyn, was opened for divine service on Christmas morning. "This church, which is capable of seating four hundred persons, was established by the Rector, (Rev. Isaac P. Labagh,) and several gentlemen and ladies of South Brooklyn, for the purpose of affording a convenient place of worship for those who are disposed to attend, from that or any other part of Brooklyn. The church, which is of brick, is just finished, and adds another to the already numerous edifices which have given Brooklyn the name of the 'City of Churches.'"

The Maine Law Wanted in New Jersey.—A writer in the Trenton (N. J.) State Gazette, closes an urgent appeal for the enactment of a Liquor Law like that of Maine, thus:—

"Many of the drunkards are desirous that the law should pass before they are lost. Last winter, when a similar law was before our Legislature, a noble-hearted young man, a friend of mine, said to me, with tears in his eyes, uplifted hands, voice and every nerve trembling from the effect of strong drink, which had often brought him near the grave: 'Oh! my friend! I often think I will stop, but I can't resist the temptation. Oh! for God's sake, get the Legislature to pass a law to put the accursed thing where I can't get it; then I shall keep sober.' Poor young man—now in his grave!"

Not Worth Protecting.—The Territory of New Mexico, about which we had so much trouble with Mexico, and then with Texas, seems after all to be not worth what it costs to protect it. The Secretary of War, in his late annual report, says:—

By the last census, the total population of New Mexico, exclusive of wild Indians, is (in round numbers) 61,000 souls, and its whole real estate is estimated at (in round numbers) $2,700,000. To protect this small population, we are compelled to maintain a large military force, at an annual expense nearly equal to half the value of the whole real estate of the Territory. Would it not be better to induce the inhabitants to abandon a country which seems hardly fit for the habitation of civilized man, by remunerating them for their property in money or in lands situated in more favored regions? Even if the government paid for the property quintuple its value, it would still, merely on the score of economy, be largely the gainer by the transaction, and the troops now stationed in New Mexico, would be available for the protection of other portions of our own and of the Mexican Territory.

Literary Register.—Mr. C. B. Norton, Chambers-st., New York, proposes to issue a useful annual register of publications. Its contents will be:—

"A complete catalogue of all American publications; a synopsis of English publications; an index to the periodical literature of 1852; a list of the public libraries of the United States; particular accounts of some of the larger libraries; lists of literary and scientific societies of this country; with several articles of interest to the book-trade, and to buyers of books."

Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet for January commences a new volume of that excellent work—a work which has no superior of its class, for taste in arrangement, and a pure tone of morality and religion.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, DEC. 20.

In the SENATE, a communication was received from Hon. W. R. King, announcing his resignation of the Chair; in consequence of which, Mr. Atchison was elected President of the Senate, and the usual proceedings consequent upon such an election followed. The Dixon claim to a seat was then discussed, by Messrs. Douglass, Cass, Rusk, Seward, and others, and decided in favor of the claimant.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Brown (Miss.) proposed the appointment of a General Committee on claims, which was finally voted down. A resolution was submitted by Mr. Ewing, of Ky., looking to the choice of Electors of President in single districts, after which the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, DEC. 21.

In the SENATE, nothing of importance was under consideration but the resolution conferring the rank of Lieut. General on Gen. Scott, which, after a long debate, was passed by a vote of 34 to 12.

In the House, the principal question was upon the reference of the Tariff portion of the Message to the Committee of Ways and Means. This led to a discussion of the various propositions for reducing the revenue, for relieving railroad iron from duty, &c., and finally the original motion of reference was passed.

FOURTH-DAY, DEC. 22.

In the SENATE, a variety of bills were reported, among which was one from Mr. Gwin, looking to the construction of a Pacific Railroad, which led to some discussion, and finally to the resuscitation of a bill brought forward last session. Another matter of interest, which came up, was a proposal to change the mode of paying members of Congress, with a proviso to deduct a per diem for all unnecessary absence from their duties, and to compute their mileage by an air line. The bill was indefinitely postponed by a vote of 21 to 19.

In the HOUSE, the sitting was occupied mainly in the presentation of petitions, memorials, &c., and resolutions reported by committees. Among the latter we notice one to pay Mr. Taliaferro, of Virginia, per diem and mileage while contesting a seat in 1711, and again in 1813. One of the claims was allowed.

FIFTH-DAY, DEC. 23.

The SENATE, was occupied all day in a debate upon the following resolution:—

Resolved, That the President of the United States communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion it is not incompatible with public interests, copies of the official notes received from the Ministers of France and England, inviting the Government of the United States to become a party with Great Britain and France to a tripartite Convention, in virtue of of which the three powers should severally and collectively disclaim now and for the future all intention to obtain possession of the Island of Cuba, and should bind themselves to discountenance all attempts to that effect on the part of every power or individual whatever, and of the reply thereto on the part of this Government, referred to in his annual Message to the two Houses of Congress on the 6th inst.

Messrs. Mason and Cass were the principal speakers, though Messrs. Underwood, Weller, Mangum, Soule, Butler, and Gwin, each had something to say. The resolution was finally postponed until after New Year, and the Senate adjourned over to Second-day.

In the HOUSE, after some unimportant business, a letter was read from the Secretary of State, giving an abstract of the return of American Seamen, registered during the year ending Sep. 30, 1852, by which it appears that there were in Maine, 968; New Hampshire, 54; Massachusetts, 4,440; Rhode Island, 242; New York, 1,096; Pennsylvania, 575; Maryland, 351; Virginia, 355; North Carolina, 53; Georgia, 83; District of Mississippi, 1,891; Forida, 35; Texas, 6. Mr. Ashe, (N. C.,) from the Committee on Elections, reported a resolution, authorizing the payment of mileage and per diem to Charles J. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, from the commencement of the XXVIth Congress to July, 1840, the contest for the seat between him and Charles Nailor having been decided at that time. Pending the consideration of the above, the House adjourned till Second-day.

MURDERS AT PETERSBURG, VA.—The Petersburg Intelligencer of Monday gives the particulars of an outrage of more than ordinary horror, which occurred on Sunday in that city. Some days since a man by the name of Sadler was committed to the Petersburg jail on a charge of slave stealing, and locked up with John Jones, a horse thief, and Boyle, an Irishman. Sunday morning, after furnishing these prisoners with their breakfast, two of the guards of the jail turned away to do the same for the colored prisoners in an opposite cell, leaving the former at liberty to come into the passage. Just as the officers were locking the door of the negro cell, Sadler, who had previously told his companions that he intended to gain his liberty at all hazards, and Jones, rushed out of the passage and locked the officers in. Sadler, who had a six-barreled pistol in his possession, by what means does not appear, shot a negro, George, a servant in the jail, and rushed to the outer door, which he ordered Joel Sturdevant, standing by it, to unlock under penalty of being shot. Mr. S. stepped aside, and Sadler shot him dead. He then, accompanied still by Jones, fled from the prison. They soon after separated, Jones going to Chesterfield, where he was soon after arrested and brought back. Sadler went to Prince George County, where he was caught by a Mr. Ledbetter. He refused to return to Petersburg, on which Mr. L. told him, "I will shoot you if you don't go." Sadler replied: "Charley, I love you, and will not hurt you"—raised his pistol to his head, snapped it twice ineffectually, but the third time a bullet passed through his brain, and he fell dead. George, the colored man, lies in a very precarious situation. A letter was found in Sadler's pocket to his children, leaving them the few dollars (33) which he had left, with some good advice, and a request for some acquaintances to care for them.

A company has been organized in Rochester, with a capital of $8,000,000, for constructing a Railroad between that city and Troy. Ten per cent. was subscribed and paid in.

European News.

By the arrival at Boston, Dec. 25th, of the steamer Canada, we have one week later dates from Europe. The news, however, is unimportant.

The British Parliament was engaged in discussing the "Budget," especially the Free Trade doctrines it contained.

The U. S. Mail steamer Washington sailed from Southampton for New York at her regular time, but in consequence of injury from a heavy sea, was obliged to put back to Cowes for repairs, which would soon be completed.

A serious flood occurred on Sunday near Bury, by the bursting of a reservoir, by which, though happily no lives were lost, an immense amount of property has been destroyed. The loss is set down at £35,000.

The London Times of the 4th inst. contains a full report of the trial of "Lord Viscount Frankfort," indicted for publishing an indecent libel upon Lord Henry Lennox. The trial came off in the Court of Queen's Bench, before the Chief Justice (Lord Campbell), and resulted in the conviction of the noble (?) defendant, who was, immediately after the rendition of the verdict, sentenced to be imprisoned in the Middlesex House of Correction for twelve calendar months.

The Emperor of France has set at liberty a great number of political prisoners, and an article has been published in the Moniteur, offering the Imperial pardon to all exiles except those guilty of the highest crimes, who are suffering for their former disobedience to the Government, upon their promising that they will abstain from similar conduct in future.

The balloon Le Napoleon, which ascended from Vangirard with 40,000 proclamations of the empire, to scatter over the line of its route, descended safely in one of the eastern departments.

Letters from Vienna of the 4th inst. report a sanguinary collision between the Montenegroes and the Turks on the Albanian frontier. The Turks are reported to have attacked some villages of Montenegro, and driven off the herds, whereupon the Prince of Montenegro headed a detachment of troops, attacked the Turks, seized the fortresses of Spuz and Zabiak, and gave battle to them at Todgorizza.

The Constantinople correspondent of the Trieste Gazette, writes on the 20th ult.: Reports have been circulated here for the last few days of a most disastrous defeat of the Russians in the Caucasus. The Circassian leader, Schamil Bey, is said to have united his forces and delivered a battle, in which the Russians lost 30,000 men and 100 guns.

By the last returns of cholera at St. Petersburg, it appears that, on the morning of the 24th ult., there were 393 ill of that disease; in the course of the day there were 46 new cases, and 23 deaths.

In the province of West Prussia, with a population of 405,000, the cholera carried off —in 1831, 3,624; in 1837, 841; in 1848, 1,941, and this year, 5,251. The circle of Marienburg, which lost only 271 in 1831, has lost this year 1,529.

The Prussian statistical bureau gives some interesting data on pauperism in Prussia. The agricultural districts, with 11,691,000 inhabitants, the field laborers and village mechanics, forming a population of 3,745,865, counted 312,635 persons, or 8.35 per cent., requiring relief, and receiving on an average 17*s*. each in the course of a year. In the towns, with a population of about 5,000,000. 472,215 persons were relieved, in 1851, with 25*s*. a head on the average. In Berlin, with 436,000 inhabitants, the maintenance of the poor, in 1851, cost 86,600*l*. The number of paupers regularly receiving alms was 7,419, besides 2,927 children wholly supported by the parish; the expense for each pauper was 3*l*. 15*s*., and for each child about 2*l*. 8*s*.

At last accounts from Burmah, the second portion of the troops from Rangoon had started for Prome, under the command of Gen. Goodwin. It was intended to advance up to Ava by land.

The insurrection in China was spreading, and the troops of the Celestial Empire had in several instances been defeated.

ENJOYING CHARITY.—An intellectual and charitable soiree was given a few evenings since in our City, on a plan and for a purpose which we trust will find many approvers and some imitators. Some ladies in the more fortunate walks of life, who are liberally bestowing their time and means to aid through the winter sundry poor and deserving widows and others unable fully to support themselves, suggested an evening party in aid of their efforts, and their desire being made known to Mr. Kemble, No. 45 Nineteenth-st., his spacious mansion and all it contained were at once placed at their service. Cards of invitation at $1 each were speedily taken up by the friends of those interested to the extent of the capacity of the largest parlor in the house; and several distinguished Artists cheerfully gave their services to the cause. Songs by Madame Bouchelle and two Lady Amateurs; Instrumental pieces by Miska Hauser and Charles Meuler; select Readings by Prof. J. W. S. Howes and an eminent Authoress of our City, caused the evening to glide away delightfully, and a handsome sum was realized in aid of the widowed and destitute without any one being sensibly the poorer for it. SUMMARY.

It is stated that a charter for the Air Line Railroad from New York to Norfolk will be applied for to the Legislature of Delaware at its ensuing session. This road, according to the Delaware Gazette, is to start at a point opposite New York City in New Jersey, and run through the center of that State to a convenient point on the Delaware, where a crossing will be effected by steamboat to the Delaware side, and thence through the center of Delaware down the peninsula through the Counties of Somerset and Dorset of Maryland, and the eastern shore of Virginia, to Cherry Stone in Northampton, a point diagonally opposite to Norfolk, and to which access by steamboat is convenient. It is estimated that ten hours will convey passengers by this route from New York to Norfolk.

A very serious outrage was committed in Saxonville, Framingham, Mass., not many days ago. Two persons, Deacon Stone and Mr. Carter, both of whom have, we believe, been active in ferreting out violators of the Liquor Law, were attacked by some person or persons unknown. A stone was thrown into Mr. Carter's window, which would, if it had hit him, have seriously injured or killed him. The stone was thrown with great force, breaking an iron tea-kettle, and making a visible impression in the brick fire-place. In the case of Deacon Stone, some one called at the door and inquired for him. He made his appearance, when a stone was thrown, striking him in the chest and knocking him over. The stone glanced somewhat, and thus probably saved his life.

Last spring a Mr. Bateman, of Kanawha Co., Va., emigrated to Texas with his family and negro servants, with the expectation of doing better in the world, although his circumstances in Virginia were very comfortable. When he reached his Texas home some of his servants died, and sickness in his family so operated upon his mind that he concluded to return to Virginia. On the way, himself, wife and five children fell victims to cholera and other diseases, and found graves upon the banks of the Mississippi. At Memphis the remaining children were left to shift for themselves, and a few days since reached home again, with the little remnant of $700, which had been left of their property.

A fearful and fatal accident occurred at 5½ o'clock on Monday evening, Dec. 20, on the Hudson River Railroad at Spuyten Duyvil Creek, by which it is probable that four persons have lost their lives, and others are injured. A sloop had just passed through the draw-bridge, at the mouth of Spuyten Duyvil Creek, when a gravel train came down before the bridge was shut, and notwithstanding the proper signals were given to stop the train, the conductor did not heed them, and the locomotive, tender, and a gravel car, having on it 33 laborers, were precipitated into the water. The leap of the locomotive was at least 40 feet, and it plunged several feet into the southern abutment of the railroad track. A person present describes the scene as most fearful.

A dispatch dated Cincinnati, Tuesday, Dec. 21, 1852, says: Three men, named Chapin, (of the late firm of Filley & Chapin, shoe dealers,) William Kissane, (of the firm of Smith & Kissane, pork merchants,) and —— Chandler, were arrested in this city yesterday by the U. S. Marshal, charged with swindling, murder and arson, in obtaining insurance policies by false bills of lading, signed by the officers of the steamer Martha Washington, which was burned about the 1st of February last on the Mississippi River. They are also charged with setting fire to the boat, thereby causing the loss of some sixteen lives, and with not having shipped the goods specified in the bills of lading upon which they obtained the insurances.

On Tuesday morning, Dec. 14th, the steamer Western World, from St. Louis, came in collision with the H. R. W. Hill, in a bend of the river below Princeton, causing the loss of ten or fifteen lives. The Hill's bow ran upon the other, carrying over the upper guards. Being together in that condition, they floated down stream for an hour and a half, during which time the officers and crew of the Hill used every endeavor to save those on board. They were then cut loose, when the Western world capsized. She was freighted with 1,400 bbls. flour, a large quantity of corn, and 60 or 70 head of cattle, all of which was lost.

A married woman was found in her room, in the village of Lansinburgh, Pa., quite dead, on Wednesday morning. When discovered, the body was found in a sitting posture against the wall, and the room presented the appearance of the most abject want. She had two small children; one of them, a little boy, three years old, was found in the bed—the other, an infant of fifteen months, was found lying upon the floor almost dead, its life only being preserved by the warmth communicated to its body by a dog, which had kept its midnight vigils, lying close by and partly over the infant sleeper's vital parts.

Otto Kœnig, a German Count, was found the other day in Chambers-st., N. Y., in a suffering condition, and was conveyed to the store of Mr. Bunker, near by, where he soon after died. The Coroner was notified and held an inquest upon the body, when Dr. Lidell made a post-mortem examination, and found that death was caused by hemorrhage of the lungs, and a verdict to that effect was rendered by the Jury. The deceased had been living in Schoharie, Montgomery Co., and had just arrived in this City. He had been disinherited by his father for fighting against the King of Prussia in the Holstein war.

Mrs. Ann Reynoldson, of Dubuque, Iowa, died on the 5th inst., in consequence of deliberately drinking a quantity of boiling water the day previous. Mrs. R. was about 20 years of age, and was the mother of two children. The second child was but about one week old at the time of her death. Before her death Mrs. Reynoldson expressed regret at what she had done, and ascribed the act to a sudden and unaccountable temptation. She had heard that to drink boiling water would cause death in three minutes.

A number of the farmers of Kent Co., Md., all slave-holders, recently held a meeting, and resolved to secure the services of Hon. E. F. Chambers, late Judge of the Court of Appeals of Maryland, to argue the Lemmon slave case before the United States Supreme Court, should the case be brought before that tribunal. They pledged themselves to subscribe a large fee, and also to bear a proportionate share of the costs of the case.

A State gathering of the friends of Temperance will take place in the City of Albany, on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, the 18th, 19th, and 20th of January, 1853, for the purpose of consultation and action, in connection with the presentation to the Legislature of petitions for the enactment of the Maine Law. The officers of the railroads west of Albany have agreed to carry persons attending the Temperance Demonstration over their respective roads at half price, or one fare both ways; and it is expected a similar reduction will be made on all of the other roads leading to the city.

An inquest was held by the Coroner, last week, says the Philadelphia Inquirer, upon the body of Thomas Gould, aged 67, who resided in Harrison Street, near Schuylkill Second. On Sunday afternoon, the deceased was worshiping in the Baptist Church, corner of Ashton and Lombard streets, and was kneeling at prayer, when he fell over and expired. The jury rendered a verdict of death from natural causes.

A writer in the New York Times recommends consumptives who must leave home to go to Curacoa, an island on the northern coast of South America, instead of Cuba. The climate is free from the moisture and malaria of Cuba—the prices of living are very low—the inhabitants are hospitable—and everything combines to make this a place of resort for invalids second to no other.

Mrs. Pierce, the wife of the President elect, is one of the most accomplished ladies of America, and one who will reflect honor upon her station, as the mistress of the national mansion. She is the daughter of the late Rev. Dr. Appleton, formerly President of Bowdoin College. Her earnest, religious character, and elegant manners will exert their appropriate influence in Washington.

Cholera is raging at Apalachicola. Within ten days seventy-five deaths occurred, and no abatement in the malady was observable. This, for so small a place, is a startling mortality. The disorder is attributed to a disease of the oysters, caused by the large and unusual quantity of fresh water poured into the bay by the recent freshet. Cases of the same kind, and traceable to the same cause, occurred a short time since in Columbus, Ga.

Thompson's Bank Note Reporter says: The impression is freely given by members of Congress, that there will be nothing done with the public lands this session. This belief strengthens the market, and we quote:

	Buying.	Selling.
160 acre Warrants	$147	$150
80 acre Warrants	74	76
40 acre Warrants	37½	38½

A great Commercial Convention and Festival was held at Baltimore, recently, and was attended by a large number of Congressman. Its avowed purpose was to devise measures to render that city the commercial metropolis of the country, and to free southern trade from the contamination of freedom, to which it is exposed at New York, as the recent liberation of the Lemmon slaves so clearly demonstrates.

Wednesday, Dec. 22, Abraham Lisk, while proceeding from Little York to Easton, Pa., fell down in the road from fatigue, and was found next morning in a dying state from exposure. He was carried to the farm house of S. Duckworth, whose wife coming suddenly into the room was so shocked at the sight of the unfortunate man that she fell on the floor and died almost instantly. Lisk lived but a few minutes after reaching the house.

The Boston Traveler learns from good authority, that Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," is about to visit Great Britain, with her husband. She has lately received a letter from Dr. Wardlaw, tendering her, in behalf of a number of ladies and gentlemen of Glasgow, an invitation to visit England at their expense. This invitation she has accepted, and she will soon leave for Liverpool.

It is estimated that in Manchester there are 1,500 "unfortunate females;" that they are led to an annual expenditure of £470,000; and that some 250 of them die, in horror and despair, yearly. In England it is calculated that there are 40,000 houses of ill fame, and 280,000 prostitutes; and, further, that not less than £8,000,000 are spent annually in these places.

A dispatch dated Washington, Dec. 20, 1852, says: A bill is drawn, and will soon be presented to the House, authorizing the Postmaster-General to employ Engineers to survey and thereupon to construct a Railroad by the shortest possible route between Washington City and New York, for the transmission of the U. S. Mails.

Among the passengers by the last steamer for California, was Charles Leland, Esq., of the widely known Brothers Leland, hosts of the splendid Metoropolitan Hotel, in Broadway, New York. Mr. L. goes to San Francisco at the earnest solicitation of capitalists of that city, to establish a mammoth hotel, the building for which is nearly completed.

It having been stated that Miss Sutherland, of Newark, Wayne Co., N. Y., was the only lady telegraph operator, the Dover (N. H.) Gazette gives the name of another, Miss Laughton, who was the only operator at that place on the night of the Presidential election, giving the election returns with the utmost correctness.

Twenty-five casks, containing probably more than 1,000 gallons of liquor, were taken at Machias, Me., on board of a small vessel on the 6th inst., under the provisions of the "Maine Law," and condemned. The defendant appealed to the January Term of the Supreme Court, to be held at Machias.

A Company was organized at Keeseville, on the 16th inst., to build a railroad to connect the existing Montreal and New York Railroad at Plattsburgh, with the Washington and Saratoga Railroad at Whitehall, passing through the country on the west shore of Lake Champlain.

The schooner Henry A. Holbrook, a Gloucester fishing vessel, last seen on the Banks 21st November, on her way home, has not since been heard from, and has no doubt gone down with all hands, eight in number, six of whom have families.

The ship Progress cleared recently at Mobile, for Liverpool, with upward of 2,000,000,000 lbs. of Cotton.

Among the signs of "civilization" among our red brethren, the Minnesota Democrat says that in a council the other day with Gov. Ramsey, one of the Winnebago chiefs complained that the Chippewa Indians stole seventeen horses from his people some time ago, and what was worse, killed the horses, dried the meat, and sold it to them for jerked elk!

Two Cadets of the Military Institute, Frankfort, Kentucky, named Pumel and Ingram, had a desperate rencontre Dec. 23d. The former was shot in the chest, the ball penetrating his lungs, and the latter had his skull cleft by a hatchet.

The New York Pilot Boat Washington went ashore at Squam Inlet on Thursday night last. Immediately upon striking, the yawes were got overboard, into which the crew got, but unfortunately one of them capsized in the surf, and, melancholy to relate, three of the occupants were unfortunately drowned.

On Wednesday, two houses were searched in Ware, Mass., and the liquor that it is unlawful to sell was found in various deposits, seized by the officers, and after due proceeding was had, was poured upon the ground. One of the culprits was fined.

On Sunday afternoon, Abijah Huntington, aged 92 years, one of the last survivors of those who witnessed the battle of Lexington, on the 19th of April, 1775, was buried in Lexington, Mass. The services took place in the church on the spot where the fight took place.

The New Bedford Mercury states that the City Marshal has now in his possession liquors to the amount of $500, which will probably be destroyed in a few days. They were seized some weeks ago from a wholesale dealer in that city.

The Echo of the Valley of the Pyrenees announces, that a very interesting discovery has lately been made in the neighborhood of Bagnéres. It is a cavern filled with the petrified remains of hyenas, lions, panthers, and other animals.

Messrs. Marshall & Son, of Washington Market, had on exhibition the other day a fat hog, weighing (dressed) 1,005 pounds. This hog was raised by Mr. J. Decker, of Columbia Co., N. Y., and was eighteen months old when killed.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Sociaty and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses; Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

An Edition for the Million.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN FOR 37½ CENTS!—We have yielded to the repeated and urgent solicitations of numerous friends of humanity, and now offer to them, and to the public generally—TO THE LIVING MASSES—an edition of Mrs. Stowe's unrivaled work, at a price so low as to bring it within the means of every person. It seems a work of supererogation to speak in complimentary terms of a book,

ONE MILLION COPIES OF WHICH

have been printed, in this country and in Europe, in a little more than six months—a sale which has no counterpart in the world's history. Yet, notwithstanding this immense sale, there are hundreds of thousands in our own country, who have not yet perused the glowing pages of UNCLE TOM'S CABIN, many of whom have been prevented from doing so, from inability to purchase. To remove this obstacle, we have issued this edition

☞ FOR THE MILLION. ☜

And millions will now read it, and own it, and drink in its heavenly principles, and the living generations of men will imbibe its noble sentiments, and generations yet unborn will rise up and bless its author, and thank the God of Heaven for inspiring a noble woman to utter such glowing, burning truths, for the redemption of the oppressed millions of our race.

To Booksellers, Philanthropists, or Societies, who wish to purchase the above by the thousand, for sale or distribution, a liberal discount will be made. The edition is very neatly printed, in a large octavo pamphlet of 166 pages, double columns, thick paper covers, and firmly stitched. We now offer to the public the following editions:

	Retail.

Magnificent New Illustrated Works.

ALEXANDER MONTGOMERY, No. 17 Spruce-st., New York, has now in press, and will issue 1st of January, 1853, three of the most superb works of the class which have ever appeared in any country.

THE ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE OF ART.—In monthly parts. Price 25 cents each.

Every arrangement has been made to produce a work of unparalleled magnificence, regardless of cost. The first literary and artistic talent in America and Europe has been engaged upon its various departments. In addition to highly-finished engravings, from the choicest works of the most eminent Painters, it will include a Gallery of Portraits of the most distinguished Men and Women of all countries, with accompanying memoirs, collected from authentic sources; scenes from remarkable passages in history; choice specimens in Architecture and ornamental design; illustrated descriptions of manufacturing processes; objects of curiosity, &c.; forming altogether a work of surpassing beauty and interest.

THE HISTORY OF THE PAINTERS OF ALL NATIONS.—In monthly parts. Price 50 cents each.

The leading feature of this work will be combining specimens of the most celebrated pictures of each great master, with his portrait, and such particulars of his life and works as will be of equal interest to the Student or Professor, and to the public generally.

CASSEL'S NATURAL HISTORY will appear in monthly parts. Price 25 cents each.

Each number of this beautiful work will be embellished with four splendid engravings, printed separately on plate paper, and about thirty engravings incorporated in the letter-press. It will present a full account of all that is known as to the animals at present inhabiting the earth, with the results of the researches of the most distinguished Naturalists on fossil remains, each division of the animal kingdom in the order laid down by Cuvier, and followed by the most eminent Naturalists of the present day.

Terms for the above Publications.

Magazine of Art.—Three Dollars per annum, or 25 cents each number.

History of Painters.—Six Dollars per annum, or 50 cents each number.

Natural History.—Three Dollars per annum, or 25 cents each number.

The above will be sent postage FREE to any part of the Union, if paid in advance for 12 months. Clubs of two or more supplied on liberal terms.

Agents wanted in every town throughout the Union. Any person receiving the first number, and canvassing with the same, will be certain of securing a large number of subscribers. No just conception can be formed of the elegance and beauty of these works from merely reading a printed prospectus.

Miscellaneous.

The Magnetic Telegraph.

Abstract of a Report made to Congress by J. C. G. Kennedy, Superintendent of the Census.

As Telegraphs have formed a subject of inquiry, it is deemed proper to present some account of the information obtained respecting this recent but widely extended and daily enlarging means of communication. At the present time it is a subject engrossing much of the attention of our own citizens, and frequent applications are made to this office from foreign countries for information regarding the minutiæ of the system as conducted in America. It is hoped that the details will prove interesting and instructive.

The telegraphic system is carried to greater extent in the United States than in any other part of the world; and the numerous lines now in full operation form a net-work over the length and breadth of the land. They are not confined to the populous regions of the Atlantic coast, but extend far into the interior, climb the summits of the highest mountains, and cross the almost boundless prairies; and in a few years a continuous communication will be established between the capital of the nation and the shores of the Pacific, as it now exists between the Atlantic, the great Lakes, and the Gulf of Mexico.

Telegraphing employs a large amount of capital, engages the attention of thousands of our citizens, and has become indispensable in a social, political and commercial point of view.

It is to American ingenuity that we owe the practical application of the Magnetic Telegraph for the purpose of communication between distant points, and it has been perfected and improved mainly by American science and skill.

While the honor is due to Professor Morse for the practical application and successful prosecution of the Telegraph, it is mainly owing to the researches and discoveries of Professor Henry, and other scientific Americans, that he was enabled to perfect so valuable an invention.

The first attempt which was made to render electricity available for the transmission of signals, of which we have any account, was that of Lesage, a Frenchman, in 1774. From that time to the present there have been numerous inventions and experiments to effect this object, and from 1820 to 1850 there have been no less than sixty-three claimants for different varieties of telegraphs. We will direct attention only to those of Morse, Bain, and House, they being the only kinds used in this country.

During the summer of 1832, Mr. Samuel F. B. Morse, an American, conceived the idea of an electric, or electro-chemical telegraph, and announced his invention to the public in April, 1837.

On the 10th of March, 1837, Hon. Levi Woodbury, then Secretary of the Treasury, issued a circular, requesting information in regard to the propriety of establishing a system of telgraphs for the United States; to which Prof. Morse replied, giving an account of his invention, its proposed advantages and probable expense. At that time he "presumed that five words could be transmitted in a minute."

Prof. Morse petitioned Congress to aid him in prosecuting his experiments, and to test the practical operation of his invention. An appropriation of $30,000 was made for this purpose, and he then erected the first Telegraphic line in the United States, in the month of June, 1844, between Washington and Baltimore, over a length of 40 miles; previous to which, however, he had conducted a series of experiments in the Capitol building.

This line was extended to Philadelphia and New York, a distance of 250 miles. It reached Boston in 1845, and became the great line of the North, from which branched two others—one, the length of 1,000 miles, from Philadelphia to Lancaster, Harrisburgh, Pittsburgh, Columbus, Cincinnati, Louisville and St. Louis—the other, the length of 1,300 miles, from New York to Albany, Troy, Utica, Rochester, Buffalo, Erie, Cleveland, Chicago and Milwaukie.

Another line, 1,395 miles in length, goes from Buffalo to Lockport, Queenstown, Niagara, Toronto, Kingston, Montreal, Quebec and Halifax.

Two lines run South; one from Cleveland, Ohio, to New Orleans, by Cincinnati, and is 1,200 miles long; the other from Washington, by Fredericksburg, Charleston, Savannah and Mobile to New Orleans, 1,700 miles; the entire length of the latter from New York to New Orleans, being 1,966 miles.

The only line constructed with Government aid, was that connecting the cities of Washington and Baltimore. The others have been established by private enterprise, the patentee being allowed one-half the stock for the use of the patent, as his share of the investment.

The following table exhibits the annual receipts of the "Magnetic Telegraph Company," extending from Washington to New York, which was the first organized in the country, from its commencement to July, 1852:—

From Jan. 27, 1846, to July 1, 1846,	$4,228 77
From July 1, 1846, to July 1, 1847,	32,810 28
From July 1, 1847, to July 1, 1848,	52,252 81
From July 1, 1848, to July 1, 1849,	63,367 62
From July 1, 1849, to July 1, 1850,	61,383 98
From July 1, 1850, to July 1, 1851,	67,737 12
From July 1, 1851, to July 1, 1852,	103,860 84
Total	$385,641 42

The capital of the Company is $370,000. It has six wires from Washington to Philadelphia, and seven from Philadelphia to New York. The number of messages sent over this line in the last six months was 154,514, producing $68,499 23. It is perhaps the most productive line in the world.

The amount of business which a well conducted office can perform is immense. Nearly seven hundred messages, exclusive of those for the press, were sent in one day over the Morse Albany line, and, a few days after, the Bain line at Boston sent and received five hundred communications. Another office with two wires, one five hundred, the other two hundred miles in length, after spending three hours in the transmission of public news, telegraphed, in a single day, four hundred and fifty private messages, averaging twenty-five words each, besides the address, sixty of which were sent in rotation, without a word of repetition.

The instruments cannot be worked successfully without skillful operators, good batteries and machines, and thorough insulation of the conductors. The expense of copper wire, which was at first used, has caused it to be superseded by that of iron, which is found to answer the purpose as well, though the wire in this case must be of increased size. About 300 pounds of iron wire are required to a mile, and it is supported by spars or posts from 20 to 30 feet in hight, set five feet deep, nine inches in diameter at the base, four and a half at the top, and placed about fifteen rods distant from each other. The insulation of the wire is effected by winding it around glass or glazed stoneware knobs, passing it through caps of the same material, or inclosing it throughout with gutta percha. The cost of construction, including wire, posts, labor, &c., is about $150 per mile. The average performance of the Morse instrument is to transmit from 8,000 to 9,000 letters per hour.

In the majority of electric telegraphs in actual use, batteries composed of heterogeneous metals, chiefly zinc and platinum, moistened by a liquid or liquids, are employed for the generation of force. The earth itself has been made to furnish a supply of electric force; in other words, a single pair of zinc and copper plates have been buried sufficiently below the surface to be in the wet subsoil, when the earth, saturated with water, represents the sand saturated with acid-water of an ordinary battery cell. By this means a current of low intensity can be obtained, even when the plates are miles apart. The earth acts as the return wire to any given number of distinct wires, without in the least affecting the regularity of the action of any of them.

The only constant and economical battery which is used in the United States is Grove's, of cups of zinc with strips of platinum in an earthenware or porcelain cup, which cup is filled with nitric acid, which is placed inside of the zinc cup, in a tumbler containing dilated sulphuric acid. The main battery on a line (from 30 to 50 cups) requires renewing only once in every two weeks, and daily in local batteries of two or three cups.

The usual charge of transmission is 25 cents for ten words or less, sent one hundred miles.

Messages passing from one very distant point to another have usually to be rewritten at intermediate stations; though by an improved method the sea-board line has in good weather transmitted communications direct between New York and Mobile, a distance of nearly 1,800 miles, without intermediate rewriting. By the Cincinnati route to New Orleans, a distance of nearly 2,000 miles, the news brought by an Atlantic steamer at 8 o'clock, A. M., has been telegraphed from New York to that distant point, and the effects produced on the market there returned to New York by 11 o'clock A. M. The Congressional reports from Washington are usually received simultaneously in Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York; and all that is necessary at the intermediate stations is the presence of an operator to receive the message as it is developed on paper by the instruments.

The electric telegraph has been applied in this country to a new and highly important purpose, that of the registration of astronomical observations, thus establishing the best possible means for the determination of the difference of longitude. The observatories in different parts of the country are connected by telegraphic wires, and the most delicate experiments, dependent upon the appreciation of minute portions of time, have been successfully performed. This method has been recently used for the determination of the wave-time of electrical currents.

To show the great extent to which telegraphing is now carried, and its importance to the community, reference may here be made to the arrangements of the newspaper press in New York, and their expenses for telegraphic dispatches. The Associated Press, consisting of the seven principal morning papers published in New York, paid during the year ending November, 1852, nearly $50,000 for dispatches, one-third of which was for foreign news. The several newspapers composing this Association paid during the same time about $14,000 for special and exclusive dispatches.

Alexander Bain, a native of Scotland, patented an Electro-Chemical Telegraph on the 12th December, 1846, and another patent was granted to him in connection with Robert Smith in October, 1849. The advantages which the inventor attributes to the Electro-Chemical Telegraph are: 1st. More economy and simplicity in the primitive construction; 2d. More rapidity in the transmission of dispatches—a single wire with a good insulator can transmit 1,200 letters a minute; 3d. An electric current, more feeble than is ordinary, suffices to cause the apparatus to work; 4th. More simplicity and economy in the correspondence and superintendence; 5th. Fewer chances of error in the dispatches sent. The Bain Telegraph used in this country has been materially improved by Henry J. Rogers.

The "House Printing Telegraph" was invented by Royal E. House, a Pennsylvanian, and patented April 18, 1846. The first line operating with this instrument was completed in August, 1850, by the Boston and New York Telegraph Company, between those cities. It has been patented in England by Jacob Brett.

The difference between Morse's and House's telegraph is principally that the first traces at the distant end what is traced at the other; while House's does not trace at either end, but makes a signal of a letter at the distant end which has been made at the other, and thus, by new machinery, and a new power of air and axial magnetism, is enabled to print the signal letter at the last end; and this at the astonishing rate of sixty or seventy strokes or breaks in a second, and at once records the information by its own machinery, in Roman letters. Morse's is less complicated, and easier intelligible, while House's is very difficult to be comprehended in its operations in detail, and works with the addition of two more powers, one air, and the other called axial magnetism. One is a tracing or writing telegraph, the other a signal and printing telegraph.

The telegraphs in England are the next in importance and extent to those in this country. They were first established in 1845, and there is about 4,000 miles of wire in operation.

The charge for transmission of dispatches is much higher than in America, one penny per word being charged for the first fifty miles, and one farthing per mile for any distance beyond one hundred miles. A message of twenty words can be sent a distance of 500 miles in the United States for one dollar, while in England the same would cost seven dollars.

In June, 1852, the submarine telegraph between Dover and Ostend was completed, and on the 1st of November the first electric communication was established direct between Great Britain and the continent of Europe. By a line of wires between London and Dover, via Rochester and Canterbury, in connection with the submarine cable across the Straits of Dover, instantaneous communication is obtained between London, Paris, Sweden, Trieste, Cracow, Odessa and Leghorn. The wires are also being carried onward to St. Petersburgh; also to India and into the interior of Africa.

A project has been formed for constructing a submarine telegraph between Great Britain and the United States. It is proposed to commence at the most northwardly point of Scotland, run thence to the Orkney Islands, and thence by short water lines to the Shetland and Færoe. Thence, a water line of 200 to 300 miles conducts the telegraph to Iceland; from the western coast of Iceland, another submarine line conveys it to Kioge Bay, on the eastern coast of Greenland; it then crosses Greenland to Juliana's Hope, on the western coast of that Continent, in 60° 42′, and is conducted thence by a water-line of about 50 miles, across Davis' Straits to Byron's Bay, on the coast of Labrador. From this point the line is to be extended to Quebec.

The entire length of the line is approximately estimated at 3,500 miles, and the submarine portions of it at from 1,400 to 1,600 miles. The peculiar advantage of the line being divided into several submarine portions is that if a fracture should at any time occur, the defective part could be very readily discovered and repaired promptly at a comparatively trifling expense. From the Shetland Islands it is proposed to carry a branch to Bergen, in Norway, connecting it there with a line to Christiana, Stockholm, Gottenburg and Copenhagen; from Stockholm a line may easily cross the Gulf of Bothnia to St. Petersburg. The whole expense of this great international work is estimated considerably below £500,000.

Another enterprise has been actually started, with every prospect of consummation. A portion of the line is being prosecuted with vigor, and the company propose transmitting intelligence between the Old and New World in four or five days. A charter has been granted by the British Colonial Government to the "Newfoundland Electric Company," with a capital of £100,000, to construct a line of telegraph from Halifax, N. S., to Cape Race, touching at St. Johns, and crossing the Island of Newfoundland to Cape Ray, thence by a submarine line of 149 miles, across the Gulf of St. Lawrence, a landing being made at Cape East, on Prince Edward's Island, and going through that island, it crosses Northumberland Straits by another submarine line of 10 miles, landing at Cape Torment in New Brunswick, and so on to the boundary of the United States, whence by an independent line to New York, the connection is completed. The total distance traversed by this line will be between 1,400 and 1,500 miles, of which 150 are submarine. It is stated that steamers can make ordinary passages between Cape Race, Newfoundland, and Galway, Ireland, in five days.

In Prussia the wires are generally buried about two feet below the surface, and carried through rivers in chain pipes. About 1,700 miles of telegraphic lines are in operation.

In France about 750 miles, and in Germany about 3,000 miles are completed.

In Austria, Saxony, Bavaria, Tuscany, Holland, Italy, Spain and Russia, great progress has already been made in establishing lines of telegraph, and communication will soon be had between the capitals of every State on the European Continent.

In India, a line has been laid between Calcutta and Kedgeree, 71 miles, and an extensive system is projected for that country.

The following interesting description of the telegraph in India is given for the instruction and encouragement of those interested in the prosecution of telegraph lines through somewhat similar regions of our own country.

From Calcutta to Rajmoole, the conductor is laid under ground, in a cement of melted rosin and sand. From that village through the remaining distance to Kedgeree it is carried over ground on bamboo poles, 15 feet high, coated with coal, tar and pitch, and strengthened at various distances by posts of saul wood, teak and iron wood from America. The bamboo posts are found to resist the storms which have uprooted trees, the growth of centuries. Though the bamboo soon decays, its amazing cheapness makes the use of it more economical than that of more durable and more costly materials. The branch road from Bishlopore to Moyapore passes through a swamp; the country is little less than a lake for five months; the conductor runs on the foot paths between the island villages, and for some miles crosses rice swamps and creeks on which no road or embankment exists.

The most difficult and objectionable line was selected to test the practicability of carrying the conductors through swampy ground, and it has been perfectly successful. The Huldee River crosses the Kedgeree line half way, and varies in breadth from 4,200 to 5,800 feet. A gutta percha wire, secured in the angles of a chain cable, is laid across and under the river, and the chain is found to afford perfect protection from the grapnels of the heavy native boats which are constantly passing up and down.

The overground lines differ totally from those in use in any other country in this important respect. No wire is used. Instead of wire a thick iron rod, ⅜ of an inch diameter, weighing one ton to a mile, is adopted—the heaviest wire elsewhere used being only one cwt. to the mile. The advantages of these substantial rods are these: they possess a complete immunity from gusts of wind or ordinary mechanical violence; if accidentally thrown down they are not injured, though passengers and animals may trample on them; owing to the mass of metal, they give so free a passage to the electric currents that no insulation is necessary; they are attached from bamboo to bamboo without any protection, and they work without interruption through the hardest rains; the thickness of the wire allows of their being placed on the posts without any occasion for the straining and winding apparatus, whereas the tension of wire exposes them to fracture, occasions expense in construction and much difficulty in repairs; the thick rods also admit of rusting to take place without danger to an extent which would be fatal to a wire; and lastly, the rods are no more costly than thin wire, and the welding occasions no difficulty.

The importance of this discovery of the superiority of rods over wire will be fully appreciated in a country like India, where the line must often run through a howling wilderness, tenanted by savage beasts or more savage men. The lines must therefore protect themselves, and this is secured by the use of thick rods.

The entire expenditure on this line was about 450 rupees a mile, and it is estimated that the future overground lines will be at the rate of 350 rupees a mile for a double line, river crossings and erection of offices being a separate charge. The pecuniary returns from the Calcutta and Kedgeree line were originally calculated at about 200 rupees a month, but they have been more than three times that amount. A rupee is about 56 cts. U. S. currency.

Tunneling the Allegany Mountain.—One of the Tunnels on the Pennsylvania Railroad, now constructing, is to be 3,570 feet in length. Its area at the widest space within the lines of the masonry will be about 24 feet, and the spring of the arch will begin 16 feet from the crown of the arch. The arch itself of the Tunnel will be rather of an oval form, one of the most beautiful curvatures which Conic Sections can afford. The greatest part of the vast arched excavation will be inlaid with strong and substantial masonry. More than half of this masonry will be composed of sandstone well laid in hydraulic cement; and the remainder will be hard burnt brick. This whole masonry will be 22 inches thick. The Tunnel passes the Allegany Mountain in Sugar Run Gap, and lies partly in Blair and partly in Cambria County. Taking into account the length of the Tunnel and its interior of breadth, and the quantity and solidity of its masonry, it may be regarded as the largest work of the kind in the United States. About 400 men are employed upon it.

A Model County.—A gentleman living in Coudersport, Potter county, Pa., the shire town of the county in which Ole Bull has located his Norwegian colony, thus writes to the Independent in a letter of business:—

"In 1841 I first came to this county, and that year gave my first liberty vote for Dr. Lemoyne. He had about six votes in the county. At the late election the vote stood, Pierce, 670, Hale, 225, Scott, 272. At least 100 of the Pierce votes, and nine-tenths of the Scott votes, would be given to Hale, if the election were to be held over again. Another thing; we have no house in this county licensed to sell liquor, and in this village we have enacted the Maine Law. Peace and good order are the fruits, for which we give thanks. It required much labor to bring this state of things about, but it was done cheerfully, and we shall labor for the Maine Law for the entire State. Liberty and Temperance is our motto."

Destruction of Dr. Peck's Library.—We are pained to learn (says the Watchman and Reflector) from a letter which we have received from the Rev. Dr. John M. Peck, of Illinois, that the Rock Spring Seminary has been consumed by fire, and that his library, consisting of some thousands of volumes, a vast number of newspapers carefully preserved, reports of benevolent societies of all denominations, and many rare and valuable historical pamphlets, was involved in the destruction. Such a loss is a public calamity. We are thankful to learn that Dr. P.'s invaluable manuscripts, and several cases of pampelets, were at his dwelling-house, and are safe. Dr. Peck has resided in the Mississippi Valley for a third of a century, and has accumulated more materials illustrative of its progress, than any other man of whom we have knowledge.

A Cherokee Chief.—Speaking of the death of George Lowrey, the Cherokee Chief, the Fort Smith Herald says: "We have known Mr. Lowrey for better than twenty-five years, and he was at the beginning of our acquaintance an old man. He was an exemplary Christian, and aided in the translation of the New Testament into the Cherokee language, in which he was always considered the most proficient Cherokee scholar, and was the Noah Webster to that nation in giving the correct definition of words, meaning, &c. Mr. Lowrey was upward of eighty years of age, and has seen the third generation of his posterity. No man among the Cherokees enjoyed universally the confidence and respect of his people like George Lowrey. He has gone, and we have no doubt he rests from his labors. 'Let me die the death of the righteous, and may my last end be like his.'"

Cat Hospital.—Bayard Taylor in his last letter, dated at Aleppo, estimates at a rough guess the population of that city thus: Turks and Arabs, 70,000; Christians, 15,000. Jews, 10,000; dogs, 12,000; cats, 8,000. He mentions hospitals for cats, founded long ago, by a rich, cat-loving Mussulman, which is one of the best endowed institutions in the city. An old mosque is appropriated to the purpose, under the charge of several directors; and here sick cats are nursed, homeless cats find shelter, and decrepit cats pur away their declining years. The whole category embraces several hundred, and it is quite a sight to behold the court, the corridors and terrices of the mosque swarming with them. Here, one with a bruised limb is receiving a cataplasm; there is a cataleptic patient tenderly cared for; and so on through the long concatination of feline diseases.

Preserving Grapes.—We find no difficulty in preserving grapes in a very simple way. This year we had fine Isabellas in abundance as late as the 20th of April. We pick the grapes on a dry day, cut out with scissors any imperfect or bruised berries, and then spread the bunches on the floor of a vacant room, or on shelves, first covering the floor with paper. We let them lie in this way about a week, and then pack them away in boxes, puting a layer of cotton batting between each layer of grapes. The boxes we put in a cool, dry place. Last year, we appropriated a closet in the upper part of the house for the purpose; and a party of friends who "tasted" our last dish of grapes, unanimously declared they were as when first taken from the vines.

The Hudson Gazette says: Last week Mr. Henry Hollenbeck, of this city, having seen a statement in the papers of the wonderful performance of an English marksman, concluded to try his hand. He accordingly took his gun, loaded and laid it upon the ground: he then took up a potato, threw it into the air, turned a somerset, took up the gun, fired, and hit the potato before it reached the ground. This feat he performed four times.

Mr. Atkinson, of the Ohio Senate, has introduced into that body a bill to establish something like the Sub-Treasury system in the State. The attempt to procure the passage of a law to collect and disburse the public revenues in coin of gold and silver will doubtless be made at this session.

VARIETY.

An English barber claims to have invented a new touch in the hair restorative art; not any of your lotions, &c., but a true-blue mechanical operation. It consists of a machine containing combs and brushes, so arranged and constructed as to produce a galvanic current when used. The teeth of the combs are made of copper and zinc, alternately, and continued back to a chamber in the after part of the comb, in which is placed a flannel saturated with salt water as an excitant. The object of the invention is to excite an electric current when the combs or brushes are used. The bristles are made of fine copper and zinc in place of bristles.

Gen. Crosby, of Chautauque, is well known to the lumber world, as the inventor of several useful improvements in the sawing departments. His last invention is a long-sought desideratum—a circular saw for sawing clapboards and panel stuff; or, in other words, for splitting plank or boards to any desired thinness. The process, now in general use, is cumbersome and slow, comparatively; three hundred feet an hour being deemed fast work. This saw will do a thousand feet per hour, straight or beveled; and is, in its construction, neat and compact.

Ex-Senator Benton said recently, in conversation with a gentleman who spoke of his being the last of the group: "Clay, Webster, and Calhoun are gone; years ago Dr. —— told me, 'When these men are dead, you will be fresh and vigorous as ever.' My habits of living do it. Until I was thirty, I drank nothing, sir! Since then I have drank only what circumstances made it fit I should drink. Temperance and moderation keep me in health and strength. Besides, I adopt the Roman regime—bathe with cold water, and rub dry. That's exercise. None of your common flesh-brushes, but such as they rub horses' legs with, sir!"

The reported sales of Barley in Albany for the season just closed, amounted to 1,620,300 bushels. This is exclusive of the sales reported for which no quotations were given, and of lots sold to arrive, which were not reported. The average price for the season is 73c.; the highest price paid was 84c.; and the lowest 64c. The greatest quantity sold at any one price was 184,100 bushels, at 68c. The aggregate value of the 1,620,300 bushels was $1,184,161.

The Baltimore and Philadelphia Railroad Company have recently placed upon their road a very simple and effiacious mode of preventing accidents to passengers and the officers of the company, by falling between the cars while in motion. It consists of a stout leather apron being buckled from one platform to that of the adjoining car, thus effectually guarding against the consequences of a misstep.

The construction of a "Model Lodging House" is in contemplation in Boston, for which a plan has been prepared, of a brick building five stories high, with accommodations for thirty-six families, and twelve or more single men, together with an office and rooms for a superintendent. The basement contains a store room, kitchen, eating room and reading room, together with many other comforts and conveniences. The estimated cost of establishing the enterprise is $40,000.

The Fayetteville (N. C.) Observer, under the head of "Fortune in spite of one's self," says: We learn that a sale took place in this county, a few days ago, amounting to about $16,000, of lands which would not have sold for half the money until the Plankroads were built through and near them. The owner never subscribed a cent to build the roads, but haggled for damages against the companies for passing through his lands.

Says the Boston Times, the "Spirit Rappings" in this city are doing an immense deal of mischief at this time, and we hear of several cases of insanity produced by belief in this delusion. A very popular actress attached to one of our theaters, has been rendered partially insane on this subject. She imagines that she hears the manifestations when at home and alone.

It is reported and believed in Washington, that a movement exists for placing five millions of dollars at the disposal of President Pierce, the motive being to enable him to resist foreign interference as to Samana and Sonora, and maintain the Monroe doctrine, should a contingency occur to render action necessary during the recess of Congress.

The office of executioner for the "free city" of Hamburgh having become vacant on the 1st of November, the Senate advertised for a person to fill it. On the 11th the authorities had received no less than 604 applications.

In the case of Yarrington and wife against the New Haven Railroad Co., to recover damages for personal injury received by Mrs. Y. during a collision of cars, a verdict was given for plaintiff, of $3,500.

The controversy about the possession of the Aztec children has been finally settled by compromise—Mr. Morris, who has them in charge, having paid to Raymondo Selva $13,000.

A boy named Henry Gilmore was drowned in Tuckawana Creek Dec. 17. As his mother was taking him to school, he fell from a log, while crossing the creek. His mother leaped in after him, and was with difficulty rescued.

A letter of the London correspondent of the Tribune, contains the intelligence of the disastrous defeat of a Russian army of 30,000 men by the mountaineers of Circassia.

As an evidence of the vast freight business now being done by the Erie Road, it is noticable, that eight extra trains came over the Eastern Division Sunday, Dec. 12.

John Sinott, who was convicted of enticing a slave to run away, was sentenced in the Baltimore County Court to six years and five months' imprisonment.

William L. Mackenzie, M. P. P., will establish at Toronto, in January, a new weekly paper, entitled "Mackenzie's Weekly Message."

Two men, named Clarke and Sullivan, were last Sabbath sentenced by the Supreme Court of New York, to be hanged on the 11th of February.

An American traveler in Egypt called his Arab guide a "son of a gun." "I am not a soldier," was the grave response.

Two lots on Tenth-st., near Fifth-av., New York, with the two in the rear, on Ninth-st., were recently sold for $20,000.

No. 14—Delaying Obedience. 4 pp.
No. 15—An Appeal for the Restoration of the Bible Sabbath, in an Address to the Baptists, from the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference. 40 pp.

The Society has also published the following works to which attention is invited:—

A Defense of the Sabbath, in reply to Ward on the Fourth Commandment. By George Carlow. First printed in London, in 1724; reprinted at Stonington. Ct., in 1802; now republished in a revised form 168 pp.
The Royal Law Contended for. By Edward Stennet First printed in London, in 1658. 60 pp.
Vindication of the True Sabbath, by J. W. Morton, late Missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. 64 pp.
Also, a periodical sheet, quarto, The Sabbath Vindicator. Price $1 00 per hundred.

The series of fifteen tracts, together with Edward Stennett's "Royal Law Contended for," and J. W. Morton's "Vindication of the True Sabbath," may be had in a bound volume. Price 50 cents.

These tracts will be furnished to those wishing them for distribution or sale, at the rate of 15 pages for one cent. Persons desiring them can have them forwarded by mail or otherwise, on sending their address, with a remittance, to George B. Utter, Corresponding Secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

The Sabbath Recorder,

Published Weekly.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in Advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

The Sabbath-School Visitor,

The Sabbath Recorder.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

No change was made in the obligation of the Law upon the believing Jew by the death of Christ. The symbols in which the blood of the victim pointed to that event, received thereby confirmation, as they received a perfect exposition. The Saviour foretold, indeed, as the prophets had done before Him, the coming desolation, not of the sanctuary only, but also of the city. To his disciples, especially, was the prediction given; but they did not regard it as an abrogation of the Law, for the myriads of believing Jews, when they had so multiplied, were “all zealous of the law.” Acts xxi. 20. Paul, although the Apostle of the Gentiles, and himself converted to the truth long after the death of Christ, walked orderly, keeping the law. (Acts xxi. 24.) He joined in sacrifice openly, and in company with others, to prove even to all that he did so—for neither he nor James would have their brethren to suppose that either he himself forsook Moses or taught others to do so. (Ver. 21—26.) He had indeed expressly come “up to Jerusalem for to worship;” and by the way had indicated this as his purpose, “having shorn his head i Cenchrea, for he had a vow.” (Acts xxiv. 1 xviii. 18.) His Lord, at an an earlier pe had graciously condescended to appear vision, unto him in the temple. To himself refers: “And it came to p when I was come again to Jerusale ven
while I prayed in the temple, I was in a trance, and saw Him saying unto me, Make haste, and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem; for they will no receive thy testimony concerning me.” Acts xxii. 17, 18. When the Jews laid many and grievous complaints against him, “he answered for himself, Neither against the law of the Jews, neither against the temple, nor yet against Cesar, have I offended any thing at all.” Acts xxv. 7, 8. And still later, when brought prisoner to Rome, “Paul called the chief of the Jews together; and when they were come together, he said unto them, Men and brethren, though I have committed nothing against the people or customs of our fathers.” Acts xxviii. 17.

How any can suppose that Paul was teaching that the Sabbath was abolished at the death of Christ, and indeed that all the customs of their fathers had thereby been abrogated, it seems difficult to understand. Had it been true that the apostle, either practically or theoretically, stood in opposition to the myriads of his believing brethren, who were “all zealous of the law,” he was not the man who would dissemble or shrink from the avowal of a faith differing so materially from theirs.

Observe, also, the ground of charge brought against the proto-martyr, and the means used to maintain it. When the Jews opposed to Stephen “were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake, THEN they suborned men which said, We have heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses and against God. And they stirred up the people and the elders and the scribes, and came upon him, and caught him, and brought him to the council, and set up false witnesses, which said, This man ceaseth not to speak blasphemous words against this holy place and the law; for we have heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us.” Acts vi. 10—14. As these were “false witnesses,” it is plainly to be inferred, that Stephen had not so taught. With double emphasis is this put before us in the very fact that in their circumstances there could have been the least occasion for suborning men to state that which, had it been true, they could have produced thousands of zealous truthful witnesses to certify. But, like the assertion concerning Paul, that he taught the Jews to forsake Moses, the allegation that Stephen spake the blasphemous words that Christ Jesus was to change the customs Moses had delievered, was wholly without foundation, the invention of perjured persons.

What seems greatly to have tended to erroneous opinions in the Gentile Church on this subject, is the want of discernment that the apostles made an express distinction, on this point, between Jews and Gentiles. The Gentile graft, though, equally acceptable, was to be different from that of the natural branches of the good olive tree, which were not broken off by unbelief. So, while Paul, in compliance with this order, “took and circumcised” Timothy, after his conversion, he being “the son of a certain woman which was a Jewess,” although his “father was a Greek,” on which account he had not been circumcised in infancy, he wholly resisted the demand of those who would have had him to impose the same rite on Titus, he “being a Greek.”

This is one of a class of texts oft
as proof that the Sabbath and sacri both been abolished—yet so used mo warrantably. The hypocrisy of an outw service with polluted hearts, is that which is condemned. “To what purpose,” Jehovah indeed asks, “is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me?” Their oblations were “vain,” because they were not truly done unto Him; yet surely they might and ought to have been so done. But their profanation of sacred institutions did not disannul the divine commands. When God says, “Incense is an abomination unto me; the new moons and Sabbaths I cannot away with,” the reason of rejection is not that any change had been enjoined or designed, rendering these ordinances now incapable of serving a right purpose. We are not left to imagine even as a possible cause for the divine dissatisfaction, that these appointments were only temporary; and having fully accomplished the end designed, were now to be discontinued. The cause of displeasure is expressly assigned; “it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting.” It is not that the lapse of time, or the incarnation or death or resurrection of Immanuel, had rendered useless either sacrifice or Sabbath, but that, by their sad perversion, the most important and blessed institutions, instead of being made the occasion of acceptable worship, was become “iniquity.” The evil was not in the ordinances themselves, but in their abuse. They were hateful to the Lord, as exhibitions of sin rather than of faith and love.

But if such a text be supposed to afford the least ground for believing that God's Sabbaths were to cease because they had been abused, they will afford equal reason for believing that prayer will no longer be heard; for among the enumerated rejections is this: “And when ye spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you; yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear.” No one believes that this was because a time had now come when God had ceased to be the hearer and answerer of true prayer, but because that what was presented by the Jews as such was, in reality, no prayer. RELIGIOUS PAPER ON A FIRM BASIS.

The New School Synod of Cincinnati, at its late meeting, adopted a proposition to unite with the Synods of Wabash, Indiana, and Ohio, in raising $15,000, to place the Central Christian Herald “on a firm basis.”

On noticing the above fact, the inquiry arose in our minds, What is “a firm basis” for religious paper? The milit

ADDRESS ON SLAVERY.

On the 26th of November, 1852, a meeting of women was convened at Stafford House, London, to consider the expediency of addressing a Memorial from the Women of England to the Women of the United States on the subject of Slavery. The Duchess of Sutherland stated briefly the object of the eeting, and enumerated some of the reasons movement of this kind should originate so great an event; but, in speaking of in-

Nor can we be silent on that awful system which, either by statute or by custom, interdicts to any race of man, or any portion of the human family, education in the truths of the Gospel and the ordinances of Christianity.

A remedy applied to these two evils alone would commence the amelioration of their sad condition. We appeal to you, then, as sisters, as wives, and as mothers, to raise your voices to your fellow-citizens, and your prayers to God, for the removal of this affliction from the Christian world. We do not say these things in a spirit of self-complacency, as though our nation were free from the guilt it perceives in others. We acknowledge, with grief and shame, our heavy share in this great sin. We acknowledge that our forefathers introduced, nay, compelled, the adoption of slavery in those mighty colonies. We humbly confess it before Almighty God; and it is because we so deeply feel, and so unfeignedly avow, our own complicity, that we now venture to implore your aid to wipe away our common crime and our common dishonor.

Mr. Fry's Lectures.—Large and intelligent audiences continue to attend the deeply instructive and entertaining lectures of this philosopher in the science of Music. Mr. Fry has evidently added to a highly cultivated intellect and finely attuned musical ear, all that art or science could furnish, in the past or the present, to increase the value of his lectures. There can scarcely be any one who will deny the moral influence of music, or who is not sensibly alive to the deep pathos of the Church Rates in England.—The following paragraph from the London Patriot, shows what kind of legal robbery is resorted to in England to make those who conscientiously dissent from it support the "church established by law:"—

"The amount originally claimed from the firm of Messrs. Brown & Sons, (members of the Society of Friends, in North Shields,) was £1 9*s*. 7½*d*., and the costs were £1 16*s*. To meet these charges, eight sacks of flour, value, including the sacks, £13 6*s*., were carried from their premises, showing an excess of £10 above the legal demand. We understand that for claims against this firm, originally amounting to £7 3*s*., goods to the umount of £54 have been distrained. For a claim of 2*s*. 1*d*. against a lady, which was run up with expenses to 12*s*., a sitting-room table, a clock, and a mahogany dinner-tray and stand were seized; and some chairs were about to be removed, but the neighbors compelled the party to desist. How long, one is led to exclaim, shall such an iniquitous system be allowed to have the sanction of law in a country boasting of its civil and religious liberties?"

Dismissing a Foreign Minister.—Senor Don Jose de Marcoleta, the Nicaraguan Minister at Washington, has been dismissed by our Government. A letter from Mr. Everett, Secretary of State, dated Dec. 30th, informs him that no communication can be received from him as Nicaraguan Envoy. This proceeding grew out of Mr. Marcoleta's course pending the negotiation of the famous treaty of mediation and settlement between England, the United States, and Costa Rica, which Mr. Marcoleta utterly opposed, and Nicaragua afterwards rejected. During this time, it is alledged, that finding himself crowded, and the interests of Nicaragua likely to be sacrificed to England, and Costa Rica, the protegee of England, he indulged in some rather ndiplomatic language with respect to Mr. Webster and the Administration, and also unlomatically made public the date of the tiations through the journals of this country. For this Mr. Webster demanded his recall.

Important Decision on a Liquor Law.—The People of the State of Rhode Island elected a Legislature expressly to pass a law prohibiting and punishing the sale of Alcoholic Liquors to be used as a beverage within the limits of that State, and the Legislature obeyed the popular mandate. The Rumsellers resisted the law in the State Courts, and were beaten; but they have carried a peculiar case (where a non-resident of the State claimed to be owner of the confiscated Liquors) up to the U. S. District Court, and have there obtained a sweeping verdict from Mr. Justice Curtis of Boston. The case, we presume, will be carried up to the Supreme Court now sitting at Washington.

No Sunday Trains in Connecticut.—The foreign mails by the steamer Canada reached Boston on the evening after Sabbath, Dec. 25th, and lay there until the next afternoon, when a special train brought them on to New York. In answer to complaints of the New York press, that they were not sent on Sunday morning, it is stated, that railroad trains are not allowed to move in Connecticut during day light on Sunday.

The Madiai.—The case of Francesco and Rosa Madiai, now imprisoned in Tuscany for reading the Bible and teaching the pure Gospel, excites much sympathy in this country. A meeting is to be held on Sixth-day evening, Jan. 7th, at Metropolitan Hall, New York, to consider the subject, and decide what action ought to be taken in relation to it.

N. Y. State Government.—Horatio Seymour took the oath of office as Governor of the State of New York on the 1st inst. The Legislature was to convene on the 4th inst., when a long Message was expected from the new Governor.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

We have looked over the proceedings in Congress last week, and find that they were of a decededly "holiday" character, scarcely an item of business worthy of record having been done.

The SENATE did manage to adopt a resolution calling for information in relation to the violation of the Treaty of Washington, of July 4, 1850, by the establishment of a new British Colony in Central America.

The HOUSE, on Third-day, listened to rather a spicy discussion, which occurred on this wise: It seems that Mr. Smart, of Maine, offered a resolution in relation to two vessels seized and confiscated by the Spanish Government, and published in the Globe a long speech upon it, attacking the Administration, not one word of which he had spoken in the House. Mr. Stanly brought up the matter in a resolution forbidding the regular Reporters to publish these silent, unspoken orations, for the future, which was discussed and passed. On Fifth-day, just before adjourning over to Second-day, Mr. Little, the new member from Massachusetts, marched up to the Speaker's desk, with his hat on—he is a Quaker—and was qualified by affirmation.

California News.

California dates to Dec. 5, and over three million dollars in gold dust, were received in New York last week. The news is not important. We give a summary of it, such as it is.

Demonstrations of respect and mourning were universal on learning the death of Mr. Webster.

At Camp Yumas, Nov. 1, a fire occurred, which destroyed $200,000 worth of U. S. Government stores.

The Apaches were troublesome, as usual. The Yumas friendly. What to do with the Indians is a question on which they are beginning to be seriously exercised.

The miners had pretty nearly deserted the mountain diggings on account of the snow, but at the placer diggings they were doing well; many were building houses, and living more "after the fashion of folks" than in previous years.

On the 4th of Dec. Acapulco was visited with a severe earthquake; the shocks were continuing on the departure of the steamer. It had thrown down many of the finest buildings, and done much damage.

Capt. West, of the Isaac Howland, April 15, in N. lat. 31, and E. long 150, about 300 miles N. N. E. of Guam, fell in with a Japanese junk. It was small and destitute of cargo. Only four persons were found on board; it did not appear that any had died. They had evidently been a long time without much food, being very much emaciated; their only remaining food was a little oil. As near as could be ascertained, the vessel had been out of her reckoning forty-nine days. At the time of the discovery, the tiller was lashed, and the ship's company seemed to have given themselves up to die. Capt. West took them on board his vessel, judiciously administered nourishing food, and they soon recovered their strength and spirits. Having taken from the vessel a few spars, Capt. W. set her on fire. It is not yet determined what will be done with the Japanese; two of them Capt. W. would be glad to take to America, and if some vessel about to cruise in the vicinity of the Japan Islands, will take the other two, it will be a good and satisfactory arrangement.

THE BROOKLYN FEMALE ACADEMY BURNT.—On New Year morning, about six o'clock, a fire broke out in the Female Academy, in Jerolemon-st., Brooklyn, which resulted in the total destruction of that building, together with the contents. The fire originated from a furnace in the basement, which, from long use, had become defective. A dense fog prevented the flames from being seen for the distance of a black, and by the time the Fire Department arrived, it was evident that any attempt to save the building would be useless; so they exerted themselves chiefly in protecting the neighboring houses, one of which—that of Mr. Alonzo Crittenden, the Principal of the Academy—had caught, but by the united exertions of the firemen and police, escaped with slight damage. About one hundred young ladies of the Institution reside with the Principal, and, as might be supposed, the greatest confusion prevailed among them during the fire. The Academy was a splendid building, four stories in hight, chiefly of brick, and was erected about ten years since by an incorporated company. It was valued at $23,000, the furniture at $5,000, and the library at $1,500, upon all of which there is an insurance of $24,000. The loss sustained by Messrs. Crittenden and Matthews is estimated at about $1,000. Previous to the holiday vacation the number of scholars attending the Academy was 530, the majority of whom are residents of this city, while about 159 are from a distance, and boarded in the vicinity of the Institution.

REMARKABLE CATASTROPHE.—On Friday, Dec. 24, a main gas pipe in Broome-st., New York, opposite the house of E. B. Clayton, broke in some manner, and the escape of gas was so great as to force its way through the vault into the lower part of the house, and nearly to unfit the servants for the performance of their duties. The family, supposing it to proceed from alterations that were being made in the neighborhood, thought it would soon pass away. About dark that evening, coal being wanted, Mr. Clayton took in his hand a small lantern, with an oil lamp burning, and preceded the girl to the vault. He entered in advance, and when about three steps down, the whole volume of gas, with which the place was filled, ignited, exploding with a report like that of the heaviest artillery. So tremendous was the concussion, that three doors, one outside, and two many feet within the dwelling, were torn from their hinges, and thrown upon the basement floor. Mr. Clayton was unconscious until he found himself in the street, with his head, face, and hands very considerably burned. The unfortunate girl, directly behind him, from the inflammable nature of her clothing, was instantly enveloped in flame, in which dreadful condition she ran back into the kitchen, where it was extinguished by water thrown upon her by her affrighted fellow-servants. Her injuries were so extensive that she died the next day.

THE CHOLERA IN CUBA.—A letter to the N. Y. Tribune, dated Baracoa, Dec. 17, 1852, says: The cholora has diminished considerable in the City of St. Jago. The deaths, which had at one time increased to 110 daily, now number from 8 to 10. In the surrounding country the epidemic still prevails, making fearful ravages. At the mines of Calve, and in the village of the same name, also at the village of Caney, its violence has been unprecedented. In the beginning it attacked only the negroes, but since then it has spared neither color nor condition. It has extended to Santa Catalina, and is there decimating the population. We have accounts of its presence at Tenamo, to the westward of Baracoa, and the reports of mortality attest its violence in this unfortunate Province. We have not only to lament the malady, but also the distressing situation of its inhabitants—whole families are dying destitute of medicine or medical aid.

AUSTRALIAN GOLD.—The arrivals of gold in England from Australia continue to be large. The Dido is reported on her way with 280,000 ounces, equal to 12 tuns, worth over five and a half millions of dollars. Several other vessels with smaller amounts are on their way. The ascertained yield of the Melbourne Mines, to the 31st July, amounted to 53 tuns weight, or in exact Federal value to $25,312,800; and at the Sydney Mines to $12,500,000. A further sum of $5,000,000 is set down to Adelaide, South Australia, though taken thence, for the most part, by miners from the Melbourne District. The aggregate, therefore, stands thus:

At Melbourne,	53 tuns,	$25,312,800
Sydney,	26 tuns,	12,500,000
Adelaide,	11 tuns,	5,000,000
Grand total,	90 tuns,	$42,812,800

EXPENDITURE OF NEW YORK CITY GOVERNMENT.—The Controller estimates the expenses of the City Government for 1853 as follows, and asks for the appropriations named in the list:—

For expenditures exclusive of Police, Lamps and Gas,	$2,539,938 00
For Police,	615,000 00
For Lamps and Gas,	325,000 00
For installment on building loan stock, No. 2,	50,000 00
For installment on Washington Square iron railing stock,	5,096 00
For Common Schools for City purposes,	569,036 08
For Common Schools for State,	225,670 80
For State Mill Tax,	100,000 00
For deficiency of tax 1852,	752,157 91
Total.	$5,171,802 78

UNLUCKY MARRIAGE.—Mrs. Farnham, the former Matron of Sing-Sing Prison, seems to have had bad luck in her second marriage in California, if we may judge by the following paragraph from the San Francisco Herald of Nov. 27:—

Mrs Fitzpatrick (formerly Mrs. Farnham) charged her husband, before the Recorder this morning, with attempting her life. It appears her husband abused her yesterday at the house in which they are boarding, on Bush-st., near Montgomery, and struck her in the face, causing a bleeding from the nose. While in the kitchen attempting to stanch the bleeding, her husband came and presented a pistol at her head, and pulled the trigger, the cap, however, only exploding. He was bound over by the Recorder in the sum of $3,000 to keep the peace for six months.

SMALL POTATOES.—The N. Y. Agricultor says that no doubt farmers wonder what we want with so many small potatoes in the city, and that they can find sale for such as they used to feed the pigs, at six shillings per barrel—about half-price of good ones. We will tell them. They are bought by the bakers, and after being washed clean, are boiled or steamed, then mashed and mixed with water and passed through a sieve, leaving the skins behind, and mixed with flour and baked into "warranted pure Genesee flour bread." Very good bread it is, too, notwithstanding one-third of the superfine flour is made of cheap potatoes. We are not informed whether the stale loaves, after being roasted and ground, are sold as pure coffee or not. Our impression is, it is sold as mixed—say one-fourth.

SUMMARY.

A correspondent of the Boonsboro Odd-Fellow, writing from Shirleysburg, Huntington County, Pa., states that a young man named Woods, while at the anxious bench at a camp-meeting in that County, on being told that he must confess his sins, confessed to one of the preachers that he had been implicated in a murder. Upon this confession, he was arrested and taken before a magistrate, where he was examined. He stated that he and two other individuals (the names of whom he refused to give) were offered the sum of $1,500 to murder a drover then on his way home from the East to Cleveland, Ohio, and that the two men did murder the drover near Chambersburg. The magistrate for some reason did not commit the prisoner, but discharged him, since which time he has left the County, and has not been heard of since.

We find the following in the Boston Courier: Extract of a letter from Louisville, Ky., Dec. 22, "I have to inform you of a most distressing domestic calamity, experienced by Mr. H. N. Newcomb, of this city. Mrs. Newcomb having been indisposed for several weeks, and (though up and about most of the time) occasionally manifesting mental flights, became deranged last evening, and in the absence of Mr. Newcomb, (at a club meeting) threw their four children from an attic window. Two of them fell upon the pavement fracturing their skulls; one (the second boy) died shortly after, and the little girl, the youngest, died this morning. The third boy, it is thought, may survive; and the eldest (falling upon the grass) is apparently not much injured—he was sleeping quietly when I left the house an hour since."

A gentleman at Dayton, Ohio, in a note to the Dayton papers, says: "While at the supper table, a little child, which was seated in its mother's lap, suddenly grasped hold of a cup full of hot tea, severely scalding its left hand and arm. I immediately brought a pan of flour, and plunged the arm into it, covering entirely the parts scalded with the flour. The effect was truly remarkable—the pain was gone instantly. I then bandaged the arm loosely, applying plenty of flour next to the skin, and on the following morning there was not the least sign that the arm had been scalded—neither did the child suffer the least pain after the application of the flour."

Dispatches from New Orleans say that in Tamaulipas and the Rio Grande Country of Mexico the insurgents are carrying the day. They have taken the Governor and nine of his leading friends prisoners, while the State of Tamaulipas is said to have declared for the Provisional Government of Mexico, but for what one, we are not informed. The War steamer State of Mexico, and a war schooner, had also come into the hands of the insurgents, which gives them command of the national Naval forces in the Gulf. Matamoros still held out against them on the 18th ult., and the commander was preparing for a desperate resistance.

A San Francisco paper mentions a distressing case recently witnessed in that city. A lady who came passenger on the steamer Tennessee, to join her husband in Sacramento, learned, to her inexpressible horror, upon her arrival, that her husband had perished in the late disastrous conflagration, and that his fortune had been swept away at a breath. What must have been the feelings of a fond wife upon the receipt of such intelligence, words cannot portray. Her situation became known to several humane individuals, who immediately started a subscription for her relief. A large sum of money was raised instantly.

About twenty years ago, a young man left Providence to seek his fortune in the "wide, wide world." He visited London, where he succeeded in obtaining an engagement in a mercantile house. He labored diligently and faithfully, and remained abroad. A brother visited him some time since, and this was the first of his family he had seen during all this period. About seven weeks ago the senior partner of the house in which he was engaged died, and left him the snug little sum of £50,000 sterling, or $250,000. The fortunate legatee has a mother and other relatives residing in Providence.

Mr. G. R. Booth, of Wandsworth, has patented some improvements in the production of gas, which consist in manufacturing of vegetable gas from seeds, leaves, fruit, and stems of plants, instead of employing the oils, gums or resins obtained therefrom in such process. Any seeds, or parts of plants, capable of yielding oils or gums from which gas may be produced, may be used in this manner, and the form of apparatus or retort employed may be very much varied.

There now resides in New York City a man, who, with his wife, was convicted in 1847 of arson, in causing the destruction by fire of 48 dwelling houses in Fehrigen, Prussia. He was sentenced to the State Prison for five years, and his wife for three years. In the year 1850 he managed to break prison and escape to this country. Previous to their being arrested upon the charge on which they were convicted, they had been tried for firing their own residence, but the proof being found insufficient to warrant a conviction, they were discharged. He is a blacksmith by trade, and thus far has been unmolested by our authorities.

Thirty likely negroes, recently emancipated by Hon. W. E. Kannedy of Marcy Co., Tenn., sailed from Nashville recently for Liberia, via New Orleans. The Nashville Gazette says: "It is the intention of Judge Kennedy to manumit more than forty negroes next year, who will follow those now en route for the coast of Africa. His object in adopting this course is, that the first company may make preparation for the second, in Liberia. It is an important fact, that several of his negroes refused to be manumited, and prefer to live with him during his life."

Gov. Johnson of Virginia has addressed a communication to the legislature of the old dominion in respect to the decision of Judge Paine in the case of the Lemmon negroes. In that document the Governor declares that the decision in question is "contrary to the spirit of all law, opposed to the established principles which regulate intercourse between foreign nations, at war with the relations which should subsist between the sister States of this Union, and with the spirit, if not the letter, of the constitution itself."

The bills of the Farmers' Bank of Onondaga, and the Merchants' Bank of Oswego, were last week refused by the New York banks and brokers, and sold in the street for 62½ a 75c on the dollar. The bills are secured by bonds and mortgages in part, and the reason for discrediting them is, that the mortgages are on farms which are occupied by Anti-Renters. An arrangement to restore the banks to their former standing has been talked of. Meanwhile bill holders, should not sacrifice on them.

An interesting correspondence in the Lexington Express, in recounting the natural products of Australia, says: "The climate is first rate, but the flies almost eat a fellow up. I have not seen a tree, plant, herb, animal or bird, like any in the States, except domestic ones. Plenty of kangaroos and kangaroo rats, and the like; the birds in this country are beautiful. Every kind of parrot, roalloas, cockatoos, magpies, and the like."

Thirty-two Indians, from the State of Arkansas, passed up the Mississippi, not long since, in canoes. They were dressed mostly in furs, and painted as only an Indian knows how to paint. It was truly a rare sight to see those half-tamed redmen gliding past the thickly settled banks of the Mississippi, gazing and wondering at the change a half century had wrought in the old hunting grounds of the tribes to which they belonged.

The St. Louis Intelligencer, referring to a statement which went the rounds not long since, that the hired girls of Pittsburgh had sent home $35,000 to their relations in the Old Country within the six months previous, states that within twelve months, the immigrants from Ireland in St. Louis have purchased and transmitted home $110,000.

Cairo, Ill., contains six dry goods stores and eleven drinking establishments, which annually retail stuff to the amount of $200,000. The permanently located population, enumerating men, women and children, and even cats and dogs, will not reach 200. You can judge now what the transient custom is.

The Stamford (Conn.) Advocate informs its readers that since the opening of the Railroad to New York, some three years since, property in that village has advanced in price not far from 100 per cent., and during the same time population has doubled. Business of all kinds has improved.

The whole number of deaths in New York City during the year 1852, was 21,558. Of these, 1,398 were infants still born, 5,296 were children one year old or under, 2,895 under two years old, 2,488 under five years old.

An exchange paper states that a well has been sunk in Hocking Valley, Ohio, to the depth of six hundred feet, for the purpose of obtaining salt water. The object of the enterprising individuals has been fully accomplished, a supply of water having been reached which requires but fifty-three gallons to make a bushel of salt of fifty pounds. The water rises spontaneously to the surface, and flows at the rate of 4000 to 5000 gallons per day.

The schooner Advance, of New Orleans, arrived at Norfolk, Sunday morning, from Port Praya in 30 days, in charge of Sailing Master Walker. Her capture by Commodore Gregory has been formerly published. She had on board when captured, what is generally termed a slave cargo, which consists of all the implements used in the traffic. The mate and 4 seamen of the Advance have been brought home, but the Captain made his escape at Port Praya.

The amount of gold deposited in the mint at Philadelphia during the month of December was $3,330,000, and the amount of gold coined during the same period was $5,770,705. The total deposits of gold for the year 1852 have been $51,059,295. And the coinage for the year, $51,505,638. The number of three-cent pieces coined during December was 3,590,900, and the total number during the year, 18,363,500.

Bridget Scanlin, a beautiful young girl, aged about 16 years, attempted to commit suicide on Sunday evening, by leaping into the river from one of the ferry boats which ply between East and West Troy. She was rescued by a young man on board the boat. When taken from the water she was unconscious, but recovered in the course of an hour.

Chicago, it appears, has a 'considerable sprinkle' of business in carriage building. It seems that there are 25 coach and wagon factories in that place, employing 233 men, and turning out 2,625 vehicles in the course of the year. Their aggregate value amounts to $210,445, and the capital employed is $127,000.

M. Gaillardet, in the Courrier des Etats Unis, gives currency to the report, that the Pope has decided to come to Paris, at the end of May next, to crown their majesties, the Emperor and Empress of the French, and that he will afterward bestow the same consecration upon the Emperor of Austria, at Vienna or Milan.

The Sheboygan (Wis.) Mercury learns from a friend who has just returned from the Upper Wolf River, that the Menomenee Indians, numbering 2,200, have lately been removed to the land selected for them on the Wolf River in Wisconsin. They were very desirous to be located on the present tracts, and hailed the announcement of their removal with joy.

It is stated that Mr. Gisborne has put down a submarine telegraph from Cape Tormentine in New Brunswick, across Northumberland Strait, a distance of fourteen miles, to Cape Traverse in Prince Edward's Island, and that it works perfectly well. It is intended to form a part of his line to connect New Foundland with the continent.

Charlestown, Mass., is the smallest township, as to territory, in the Commonwealth. It has an area of only 620 acres. In other respects it is the largest place in the country—it has Bunker Hill, with its towering monument; and Breed's Hill, with its soil red with the blood of patriots.

The Ashtabula (O.) Sentinel says: Mr. Damon, of Lake, has introduced a resolution requiring a provision by law for appropriating a portion of the earnings of the convicts in the penitentiary for the benefit of their families, if they have such, or themselves after their term of service expires.

A gentleman named John W. King has recently written a pamphlet in the form of a memorial to the Kentucky Legislature in relation to a change in the mode of electing the President of the United States. He proposes to choose the Executive from the members of the Senate by lot.

The latest news from China announces the discomfiture of the rebels, by the capture of their chief, Tien-teh, and his sentence to be hung on the 15th of June. From a confession made by this chief, it appears that the imperial dynasty has never been seriously endangered by the rebellion.

A man named William Haywood, living seven miles beyond Lexington, N. C., got drunk on the 17th, went home and laid down near the fire. One of his hands dropped into the fire, and not having sufficient power to remove it, was burnt off nearly to the elbow.

In the Court of Common Pleas at Dedham, on Friday, the jury in the case of Deacon Hollis, of Braintree, tried for selling two quarts of cider in violation of the liquor law, returned a verdict of guilty. The jury were out twelve hours.

The Schoharie Patriot announces that subscriptions are being raised for rebuilding the Richmondville Seminary, recently destroyed by fire. It was insured for $8,000, and subscriptions to the amount of $1,500 had been raised.

A boy named William Smith has been convicted in the Police Court at Boston, as a common drunkard, and was sentenced to the House of Correction for five months. Though scarcely eighteen years of age, he has served two terms in the House of Correction on a similar charge.

The Annual Report of the Ten Governors of the Alms House shows that during the past year (1852) relief was afforded to 80,357 poor persons in this City. During the year, the sum of $686,651 34 was expended in purchasing supplies.

Judge Stanley Mathews, one of the Common Pleas Judges of Hamilton Co., Ohio, has resigned his office. The reason assigned is that the salary will not support his family and educate his children. This is the second resignation in that county for the same reason.

A dispatch dated Syracuse, Wednesday, Dec. 29, 1852, says: A fire broke out this evening in Britnall's block, on Fayette-st., and destroyed several private residences, a hotel, stables, &c. The loss is estimated at $60,000, partially covered by insurances.

The East India Company have determined to renew their important attempts at introducing tea into the Himalayas, and Mr. Fortune is again charged with the operations.

The rivers in the neighborhood of Cincinnati recently overflowed, causing great destruction of property.

The statistical returns for the month of October, which have just been published by the Prefecture of Police, give the number of deaths in Paris as 2,249, being 52 more than in the preceding month; of these 519 were from pulmonary disease.

The offer of $606,000 by Messrs. Clark & McGrillis for the Maine Lands owned by Massachusetts has been unanimously accepted by the Commissioners, and they have reported accordingly to the Governor and Council.

The Cincinnati Commercial says that the estate of the late Fanny Wright [Darusment,] who died in that city on the 18th ult., is estimated at one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Alburtis Ringo, a Revolutionary soldier, died in Flemung County, Ky., on the 7th ult., at the advanced age of 96 years. He was an eye-witness of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis to Gen. Washington.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses; Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

An Edition for the Million.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN FOR 37½ CENTS!—We have yielded to the repeated and urgent solicitations of numerous friends of humanity, and now offer to them, and to the public generally—TO THE LIVING MASSES—an edition of Mrs. Stowe's unrivaled work, at a price so low as to bring it within the means of every person. It seems a work of supererogation to speak in complimentary terms of a book,

ONE MILLION COPIES OF WHICH

have been printed, in this country and in Europe, in a little more than six months—a sale which has no counterpart in the world's history. Yet, notwithstanding this immense sale, there are hundreds of thousands in our own country, who have not yet perused the glowing pages of UNCLE TOM'S CABIN, many of whom have been prevented from doing so, from inability to purchase. To remove this obstacle, we have issued this edition

☞ FOR THE MILLION. ☜

And millions will now read it, and own it, and drink in its heavenly principles, and the living generations of men will imbibe its noble sentiments, and generations yet unborn will rise up and bless its author, and thank the God of Heaven for inspiring a noble woman to utter such glowing, burning truths, for the redemption of the oppressed millions of our race.

To Booksellers, Philanthropists, or Societies, who wish to purchase the above by the thousand, for sale or distribution, a liberal discount will be made. The edition is very neatly printed, in a large octavo pamphlet of 166 pages, double columns, thick paper covers, and firmly stitched. We now offer to the public the following editions:

Magnificent New Illustrated Works.

ALEXANDER MONTGOMERY, No. 17 Spruce-st., New York, has now in press, and will issue 1st of January, 1853, three of the most superb works of the class which have ever appeared in any country.

THE ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE OF ART.—In monthly parts. Price 25 cents each.

Every arrangement has been made to produce a work of unparalleled magnificence, regardless of cost. The first literary and artistic talent in America and Europe has been engaged upon its various departments. In addition to highly-finished engravings, from the choicest works of the most eminent Painters, it will include a Gallery of Portraits of the most distinguished Men and Women of all countries, with accompanying memoirs, collected from authentic sources; scenes from remarkable passages in history; choice specimens in Architecture and ornamental design; illustrated descriptions of manufacturing processes; objects of curiosity, &c.; forming altogether a work of surpassing beauty and interest.

THE HISTORY OF THE PAINTERS OF ALL NATIONS.—In monthly parts. Price 50 cents each.

The leading feature of this work will be combining specimens of the most celebrated pictures of each great master, with his portrait, and such particulars of his life and works as will be of equal interest to the Student or Professor, and to the public generally.

CASSEL'S NATURAL HISTORY will appear in monthly parts. Price 25 cents each.

Each number of this beautiful work will be embellished with four splendid engravings, printed separately on plate paper, and about thirty engravings incorporated in the letter-press. It will present a full account of all that is known as to the animals at present inhabiting the earth, with the results of the researches of the most distinguished Naturalists on fossil remains, each division of the animal kingdom in the order laid down by Cuvier, and followed by the most eminent Naturalists of the present day.

Terms for the above Publications.

Magazine of Art.—Three Dollars per annum, or 25 cents each number.

History of Painters.—Six Dollars per annum, or 50 cents each number.

Natural History.—Three Dollars per annum, or 25 cents each number.

The above will be sent postage FREE to any part of the Union, if paid in advance for 12 months. Clubs of two or more supplied on liberal terms.

Agents wanted in every town throughout the Union. Any person receiving the first number, and canvassing with the same, will be certain of securing a large number of subscribers. No just conception can be formed of the elegance and beauty of these works from merely reading a printed prospectus.

Miscellaneous.

Truth in a Well.

Once at mid-day toiled a youth
In the bottom of a well,
Delving for no mystic truth
Down where sunlight never fell.

All he sought was the revealing
Of some stream from living fountain,
Through Earth's hidden arteries stealing
From the heart of yonder mountain;

Which should spring, a well of joy
To the sacred homestead ever;
Sweet and pure without alloy,
Bounteous as the all-bounteous Giver.

Upward looked he to the light
And the span of sky afar,
And, behold, as at midnight,
Shone at noon a sparkling star!

Then first learned he that the sun,
And the glare and stir of day,
Were but shrouds and darkness dun
To the high and far away;

That the light, so prized, which made
The near palpable around us,
But the tyrant with us played,
And to dust with short chain bound us.

Only when the darkness falls,
Vailing all the objects nigh,
Look we freely o'er these walls
To the the glorious spheres on high! [Knick.

A Boston Notion.

Boston is a city of notions, everybody knows. America can show no other city so full of matured systems, useful contrivances, and odd conveniences as this same Boston. The city maxim seems to be, that "there's a best way of doing all things." In public and in domestic affairs the "solid men of Boston" are not content with simple achievement, but they must have achievement by the best methods.

The latest illustration of this is their scientific way of giving a fire alarm, and calling out and guiding their fire department. A very simple matter, one would think, to raise the window sash and shout fi-er two or three times, and leave the alarm to spread. Every villager knows how to pull a bell-rope, and ring till he's tired. Every New Yorker knows how to count the booming strokes of the big bells as they tell of the district number. A very simple thing! One way just as good as another, so long as a rousing alarm is started.

By no means. These Boston men have found out a best way.

If your house takes fire, and gets past domestic control, and you feel it necessary to appeal to the municipal authorities for help, do not be at all excited or alarmed. Do not make yourself red in the face, and hoarse with shouting. Put on your hat and run to yonder corner, where you see that little iron box fastened up against the wall; step into the store, ask quietly for the key, adding, "My house is on fire," by way of apology for the intrusion; now unlock the little iron door, and, remembering that the longest way round is sometimes the shortest way home, obey the inscription and "turn six times slowly." Your responsibility is ended. You've done all you need to. Boston will take care of your house. Hurry home or the engines will be there before you!

Every bell in the city, and several more across the water, are telling people where you live, and that your house is on fire. In other parts of the city men with glazed hats and brass trumpets may be seen running to these same little iron boxes; they seem to whisper a moment, then they listen, and then they look very knowing, and slap the door to; and here they come, all pell-mell to your help. How much time has elapsed since you needed help? Perhaps three minutes. There is a best way of giving an alarm, that's a fact.

But how was it done?

That little iron box you opened was a telegraph station; you can see the wires where they come down through those two iron pipes into the box. The crank you turned is merely a contrivance that enables an inexperienced person to send the only message ever sent from this box—its own number. Just so a hand-organ enables the grinder to play one tune well, even though he be no organist. You turned it six times. Once would have been enough, but six times over, and every time the same number, there could be no mistake. The central office knew in an instant of your distress.

Yes, but how did that make the bells ring all over the city, and East Boston too? Do they keep a sexton at every bell rope all the time, ready to pull when anybody telegraphs?

No. That would be full as bad as the New York plan of keeping watchmen up in the fire towers, on a perpetual look-out. That would not be scientific enough for a "BEST" way. But you know a church clock strikes the hours without any help from the sexton except to wind it up. Just so the bells are rung for fire; in every steeple there is a machine like the striking train of a clock. These machines will strike several hundred blows each with their heavy hammers by, being wound up once. When you sent off your dispatch, it went direct to a third story room on Court Square and was read by a man whose business it is to attend to such messages. From this same room he can, by touching a key, send by another set of wires a current of galvanism to every steeple in the city. If you look you can see these wires entering every steeple that holds a good bell. When this galvanic current passes into the several steeples, it circulates in each around a bar of soft iron, which instantly becomes a powerful magnet, strong enough to lift the detent that keeps the striking machines from running. Now these machines are made so that they would strike one blow and stop, unless the magnet keeps the detent back and leaves the wheels unlocked and free to run. So the man in the third story room by the Court House, (he'll show you how it is done if you call upon him, for he is very courteous to visitors,) can, by pressing the proper knob or key, make these heavy bell hammers strike any number he chooses. And he made them strike the number of your ward.

But how happened the engines and firemen to come straight to my house? There are two or three thousand houses in the ward.

The foreman of every company has a key to those useful little iron boxes and so when he has got to the ward signified by the bells, he runs to the nearest box, and sends a private signal to the man in Court Square, asking just "where is the fire?" and then he listens while the answer comes back in little taps, one, two, three, four, &c., till he learns the number of the very box you opened when you gave the alarm in the first place. Every box has its own number. The bells tolled the firemen what ward, and the telegraph taps whispered what station box the alarm came from.

I see. But is it worth all this trouble of wires and machinery and boxes and batteries?

Yes, indeed. Five minutes at the beginning of a fire are very precious. But oftentimes, so rapid is this system, an alarm will be given, bells rung, boxes consulted, fire found, hose procured and screwed to a Cochituate fire plug, and the fire extinguished, ere the family in danger are well awake. Many a time, the first thing a man knows of his danger by fire, is that his room is flooded with water.

But this municipal telegraph is used for more purposes than one. In case of riot, the police captains can send for help to headquarters. To catch an absconding thief by setting guard at every railroad and steamboat, can be done in five minutes. Then, too, very soon all the city clocks will be hitched together by these wires, and all of them go by one central pendulum, accurately, five hundred clocks alike to a second. [Independent.

Liquoring at New Orleans.

N. P. Willis, in one of the sketches of travel he is now publishing in the Home Journal, describes as follows the magnitude and splendor of the New Orleans groggeries, and the habits of their patrons:—

"The Hotel St. Louis, (the principal one after the burning down of the St. Charles,) is an immense structure on the scale of the Astor House of New York, but built around a lofty rotunda, that was once, I believe, the City Exchange. The towering dome of this imposing architectural center reaches to the roof, and is surrounded with corridors and a gallery; and the hotel, (an excellently kept, and highly luxurious one,) seems quite secondary to it, in its magnificent use as a 'bar-room.' It is paved with marble, a marble counter extends around one-half of its circular area, and so vast is the interior, that the half-moon of busy bar-keepers, seen from the opposite gallery, as they stand and manipulate behind their twinkling wilderness of decanters, looks like a julep-orama, performed by dwarfs, the murmur of the gliding ice and the aroma of fragrant mint betraying their occupation, but their features quite undistinguishable in the distance.

"New Orleans is studded all over with these temples of drink—none quite as architecturally imposing as the St. Louis dome, but all suptuously splendid and costly. The walls are hung with costly paintings, and all that damask and velvet can do for comfort, and gilding and mahogany for splendor, is lavishly done. Of the amount of frequentation of these resorts, some idea may be formed by what a friend mentioned to me as the history of one of them, which he had chanced to learn in the way off profession. This one ("The Gem") cleared its rent of $3,000, paid for its decorations and furniture, and made a net profit, besides, of $20,000 in the first year of its operation. The average receipts of any one of the fashionable drinking saloons may be set down at $200 a day. A gentleman's expenses, for the inevitable drinks with friends and acquaintances, average from two to three dollars per diem. A sumptuous lunch of turtle-soup, etc., is furnished gratis, at noon, to attract customers—a man getting more than the worth of his money, of course, who lunches and drinks for sixpence; but, the proprietor, finding his profit in the few, who eat, in comparison with the many who drink, at that hour, and in the policy of any thing which will add to the repute of the place, and draw a crowd. The rivalry of these drinking palaces makes a yearly increase of magnificence in their luxuries and appointments, which seems to promise that the arts shall be tributary, and the city be largely indebted to them for its splendor."

A Thrilling Incident at Sea.

The N. Y. Tribune has been kindly favored with the following extracts of a private letter from Marcus Spring, Esq., of this city, giving an account of the saving of the crew of the Scotch bark Jesse Stevens, by the steamer Pacific, on her last passage from here to Liverpool.

One morning, while lying wrapped up in blankets, overcoats, &c., on the sofa, the wind and sleet and snow roaring round the heaving ship, one of the passengers came down and reported that a wreck had been seen in the midst of the storm, and men clinging to it, and calling out, "Save us! Save us!" Though so nearly stupefied as to care for nothing, even if we had been the wrecked ones ourselves, and hardly believing, at first, it could be so, I roused myself; and, sure enough, all my own stupid and selfish feelings, all nausea and headache, and all murmuring spirit in view of our own condition, were instantly dissipated, and gave place to the heartiest sympathy and earnest prayers for sixteen poor fellows in a shattered bark, with sails torn and streaming in the wind, masts all wrenched off and swept away, and the water rushing through the sides of the vessel, as she rose now and then on a high wave, the sea rolling over her, a perfect flood, every minute.

Our ship had stopped her engines, and was hovering about; coming near enough, in the brief intervals of the storm, for Capt. Nye to speak through his trumpet a word of encouragement. The Captain had been sick with a violent cold and inflammation of the lungs, but this had called him from his bed, and, dressed in his great tarpaulin coat, with his hat drawn down over his ears, a sailor holding him from falling, as he stood on the steep deck, the ship tumbling almost over on its sides at every roll, his fine face flushed with excitement, as the wind and sleet dashed into it, and against him as if they would take him off his feet; his trumpet in his hand, and rushing above the war of the storm, his voice of command to engineers, sailors, &c., to go on or stop, or go to the other side of the wreck, trying to keep near it, and avoid dashing against it, to the certain ruin of all.

All this lasted for an hour or more, while we passengers on the upper deck, holding on to ropes to keep from being dashed overboard, and watching the poor fellows, when the mists, and clouds, and spray, gave us opportunity to see them climbing the waves in their shattered bark, all looking anxiously toward us, and waving hats and hands. The rolling of the sea, some movements on the deck, and something I heard the Captain say, made me fear it was a hopeless case, and we should have to go and leave them, when all at once a gleam of light broke from above, and a splendid rainbow appeared on a dark background of clouds behind us. It seemed indeed a heaven-sent sign of hope and promise, and I eagerly scanned the upturned faces of the wretched crew, to see if they did not hail it as such, but I since learn they interpreted it according to the sailor's adage:

"A rainbow in the morning
Is the sailor's warning;
A rainbow at night
Is the sailor's delight."

While I supposed the bow of promise was filling their hearts, as it was mine, with joy and gratitude, the Captain seized the moment of a lull in the storm to say to Tompkins, his third officer, (blessed be the noble-hearted fellow!) "Are you willing to risk going in the life-boat to their rescue?" "Ready and willing," was the prompt reply; and soon the beautiful boat, with Tompkins and three sailors, was bounding over the foaming waves. They had a rope soon drawn from ship to bark, passing through the life-boat. The brave little company were soon under the stern of the wreck, receiving with open arms, as they were dropped or thrown down (for some were so stupefied with wet and cold they had to be thrown into the boat) the dripping sailors of the "Jesse Stevens." The waves ran so high it was unsafe to lie near the wreck, so the boat was hauled up by rope, at intervals, near enough for them to drop in one or two men—then they would slacken the rope and let the boat recede before the returning wave should come and dash them together, then they would return, in like manner, for one or two more; and, finally, all were safe in the boat, and we only hoped they would get it back to the ship with its freight of saved lives. Proudly again it bounded over the billows with its heavy load, as if it had been a swan or a sea-bird, and though several times, when it went out of sight in the trough of the seas, we trembled lest we had seen it for the last time, it still mounted the top of the next wave and dashed down the watery hillside towards us, again to rise and descend till they reached our ship's side, when a hundred men, with boisterous shouts and ropes let down, with nooses at the ends, soon hauled up every man of them. And so sixteen nice, respectable Scotchmen, from Augustine, on their way home from Canada, with a load of lumber, are fellow passengers with us, with thankful hearts only and no lumber, and will reach home before they are looked for, to tell of their marvelous escape.

Since this incident, certainly the most heart-thrilling and sublime it has been my lot to witness, and well worth, we all say, all the sufferings of the voyage, we have all been in better spirits, and have slept, I imagine, with more grateful and happy dreams. We had a meeting of passengers and raised five hundred dollars as a purse for Tompkins and the three men who aided him. Tompkins looks very happy as he walks the deck, and is a great favorite with us all.

How the Continentals stood in Arms.

"To a man, they wore small clothes, coming down and fastening just below the knee, and long stockings, with cowhide shoes ornamented with large buckles, while not a pair of boots graced the company. The coats and waistcoats were loose and of huge dimensions, with colors as various as the barks of oak, sumach, and other trees of our hills and swamps, could make them, and their shirts were all made of flax, and like every other part of the dress, were homespun. On their heads was worn a large round-top and broad-brimmed hat. Their arms were as various as their costume; here an old soldier carried a Queen's Arm, which had done service at the conquest of Canada twenty years previous, while by his side walked a stripling boy, with a Spanish fuzee not half its weight or calibre, which his grandfather may have taken at the Havana, while not a few had old French pieces, that dated back to the reduction of Louisburg. Instead of the cartridge-box, a large powder-horn was slung under the arm, and occasionally a bayonet might be seen bristling in the ranks. Some of the swords of the officers had been made by our Province blacksmiths, perhaps of some farming utensil; they looked serviceable, but heavy and uncouth. Such was the appearance of the Continentals, to whom a well-appointed army was soon to lay down their arms. After a little exercising on the old Common, and performing the then popular exploit of 'whipping the snake,' they briskly filed off up the road, by the foot of the Kidder Mountain, and through the Spafford Gap, toward Peterboro', to the tune of 'Over the Hills and far away.'"

[History of New Ipswich.

Minnesota.

A gentleman who has been engaged in surveying for a Territorial road from Lake Pepin to the most southern bend of the Minnesota, sends the Minnesotian the following sketch of the country which he traversed:—

The extreme length of the road is 113 miles. A tangent would make it about 105, thus losing 8 miles in avoiding swamps, &c.

The country near the lake is very broken, being cut up by ravines descending from the highlands to the lake. In many of these ravines may be found some of the richest farming lands in Minnesota. Hardly a ravine but has its 'trout brook,' shaded with a luxuriant grove of all kinds of timber. At your near approach to the highlands, you continually encounter springs; and it is not an frequent occurrence to find at the very hight of some ridge, a spring of limpid water. We made it a point to search the highest lands for water.

After you leave the lake, say five or six miles back, you will find a different country, the soil of which would be hard to analyze. It is what I would call poor, or rather none of the best, being sand intermixed with numerous small flints. Timber is scarce, and what there is is scrubby bur oak of the leanest kind. But remember we are on the dividing ridge between the Cannon on the north, and the Waze Ozu, on the south, so that while bareness presents itself in your immediate vicinity, an hour's travel either to the right or left brings you to Eden-like valleys. When some 18 or 20 miles back, again there is a sudden change from sterility to rich prairies, abounding in water and groves of fine timber; such a country as would make a farmer's eyes water, and if covetous, would make him wish to own all that joined his farm. The soil is a loam, slightly sandy, abounding in small hazel brush.

The greatest enemy the farmer will find here is the gopher; the ground is literally ploughed by them, so much so, that in many places their excavations made it difficult for us to proceed on horseback, as we were constantly breaking through, even where the ground appeared smoothest. We traveled about 40 miles over this undulating prairie, when we struck the woods that skirt the Cannon near its head, on the east side—'woods as is woods,' too, consisting of the largest kind of oak, ash, walnut, elm, sugar maple, &c., many trees of which were four and five feet in diameter, sixty feet to a limb, and straight as a reed. The woods are from two to five miles wide, and extend in length, I know not how far.

When you reach the Cannon, which here runs north, you will find yourself in one of the lovliest of countries—an embryo Eden. The Cannon, at the time we were there, was some 80 feet wide and about a foot deep, with fall enough for an immense water power. It does not overflow its banks at this point, rising only some five or six feet. This may be attributed to several large lakes above, which act as reservoirs. On the west side is a prairie which extends some four miles back, to Lake Tepe Tonka; so level is it that a good sized dog might be seen on any part of it.

Selling at Half-price.

A shopkeeper, in a small town, one day marked some handkerchiefs in his window with the tempting words, "Selling at half-price." Shortly after, a lady, who had traded with him before, entered the establishment, and having examined the handkerchiefs, inquired the price.

"Fifty cents apiece," politely replied the shopkeeper.

"Very well," said the lady, "you may do me up a dozen."

The handkerchiefs were cut off and delivered to the lady, who gave the shopkeeper a three dollar bill.

"Beg pardon, ma'am; but I—ah—told you the handkerchiefs were fifty cents apiece; that is—ah, six dollars per dozen."

"To be sure, I understood as much arithmetic as that. Six dollars is the price; half of six is three; that is half-price. I think they are cheap enough. Good day, sir."

The lady shut the door. The shopkeeper opened his eyes. For five minutes he stood still as a stump, gazing vacantly at the window; then, biting his lips, and coloring very red, he gently removed the card pinned to the handkerchiefs, and resolved to announce no more goods as "selling at half-price."

The Niagara Suspension Bridge.

The Lockport Journal says that laborers are busily employed in pushing the Niagara suspension bridge to completion. It says:—

"Imagine a span 800 feet in length, forming a straight hollow beam, 20 feet wide, and about 18 feet deep, with top, bottom, and sides. There will be an upper floor to support the railroad and cars, 20 feet wide between the railroads, and suspended by two wire cables, assisted by stays.

"The lower floor, 19 feet wide and 15 feet high in the clear, is connected to the upper floor by vertical trusses. The cohesion of good iron wire, when properly united into cables or ropes, is found to be from 90,000 to 130,000 pounds per square inch, according to quality. The lime-stone used in constructing the towers will bear a pressure of 500 tons upon every square foot. The towers are 60 feet high, 15 feet square at the base, and 8 at the top. When this bridge is covered with a train of cars the whole length, it will sustain a pressure of not less than 405 tons. The speed is supposed to add 10 per cent. to the pressure, equal to 61 tons. The weight of superstructure added, estimated at 782 tons, makes the total aggregate weight sustained 1,273 tons.

"Assuming 2,000 tons as the greatest tension to which the cables can be subjected, it is considered safe to allow five times the regular strength, and providing for a weight of 10,000 tons. For this, thirteen thousand miles of wire are required. The number of wires in one cable is three thousand. The diameter of cable about 9¼ inches. The bridge, we believe is the longest between the points of support of any in the world."

New Machine to Facilitate Joiner's Operations.

Mr. Dudley, from America, has exhibited before the Philosophical Society of Liverpool an improved mode of applying the power of driving bands to machinery. The inventor was Mr. Parker, a house carpenter, and a very ingenious mechanic. This principle not only economizes power, but expense in pulleys and belting, and also in space. He then exhibited a model of the machine, with one of which size, he said, with a stout man to turn and a boy to feed, more sawing could be done, of the character generally done in a joiner's shop, than any eight men can do by the present mode of operation. The machine was also equally applicable to all descriptions of machinery that required rotary motion as it was to the saw. By the present mode of banding pulleys, friction increased in a greater ratio than velocity. By the new method, a saving of three-fourths was effected in the friction, and, as friction did not increase with the speed, the saving of power was more apparent and greater the higher the speed or velocity of the machinery; so that, supposing, on driving a spindle by the old method of belting, say at the speed of 1,000 revolutions in a minute, the power consumed in friction was 20 per cent., and to raise that to 2,000 revolutions, upward of 40 per cent. of power would be used; they would, therefore, save 35 per cent.

LARGE LAND SALE IN MAINE.—The State of Massachusetts owns near two millions of acres of wild land in Maine. At the last session of the Massachusetts Legislature the Governor and Council of that State were authorized to offer the lands for sale, by advertising for sealed tenders to be made on or before the 20th ult. On the day appointed the tenders were opened, when it was found that the Governor and Council of Maine had made an offer of $400,000. and that individual speculators had gone as high as $606,000. From some cause the authorities of Massachusetts declined to consummate the transaction, and no action has been taken by them upon the bids. Massachusetts has already received a million and a half of dollars for the lands in Maine, which were allotted to her, at the time Maine was erected into a State (in 1820.) Yet the entire body of her lands in Maine were offered by Massachusetts to that State, at the period alluded to, for $100,000. Maine now offers $400,000 for the moiety that remains. The cause of this advance in the price, is their enhanced value as timber lands.

The Boston Bee adds to the "Uncle Tom" statistics the following important fact: "Since the first rage of Uncle Tom's Cabin, over three hundred infants have been christened Eva, in this city."

DRILLING WHEAT.—Edward Stabler, in his essay on the advantage of drill seeding, states that after examining its results on some 800 or 1,000 acres, besides large experience on his own land, he finds there is not a single instance where it has not proved the most profitable, first, in the saving of seed, and secondly, in the increased product of the grain, amounting to from one to six or seven bushels per acre. He has known the increase, in one case, by careful comparison of the two modes, to amount to nine bushels per acre in favor of drilling. He relates an interesting incident: A vender offered a drill for the increase in a crop of fifty acres of wheat, to be determined by sowing a few strips broadcast for comparison. But before harvest the farmer preferred paying the hundred dollars, the price of the drill, with interest. On carefully ascertaining the increase, he found it to be one hundred and fifty-three bushels. [Albany Cultivator.

EXECUTION IN CHINA.—A Chinese merchant named Hiamly, accused and convicted of having killed his wife, was sentenced to die by the total deprivation of sleep. The execution took place at Amoy. The condemned was placed in prison surveillance of three gurdians, who relieved each other every alternate hour, and who prevented him from taking any sleep night or day. He lived thus for ninetee days, without having slept for a single minute. At the commencement of the eighth day, his sufferings were so cruel that he begged, as a great favor, that they would kill him by stangulation.

VARIETY.

The directors of the Crystal Palace have decided on constructing an extra gallery 250 feet long, and covering an area of 10,000 square feet; the gallery will be constructed of the same materials as the building itself, will run along the open space between the reservoir and the Palace. This gallery is designed to hold all the machinery in motion, and what other matters are considered too large and cumbrous to be placed in the building itself. This will relieve the interior of the Palace from the din and vapor emitted by a number of machines worked by steam, and enable those who have no interest in such things to enjoy the sights of the main building undisturbed.

The Jarden des Plantes at Paris is at present the object of great attraction; there is a very remarkable phenomenon of vegetation in its rich conservatory. On the fourteenth of October, a bamboo put forth a stem, which has already reached the enormous height of nineteen feet, having grown seven or eight inches each day during a month. What is also equally admired by the numerous visitors who frequent the garden, is a superb carica papaya, laden with fruit, of which some has arrived at maturity; and a plumeria, covered with blossoms, which will flower toward the end of the winter.

The Commons Hall of South Carolina College being obnoxious to most of the students, one hundred and eight from the different classes entered into a pledge to leave the college provided the trustees did not abolish the hall at their meeting in December. The trustees having not abolished the hall, the one hundred and eight students applied for and received dismissals. They leave without the least unfriendly feeling existing between themselves and the Professors of the college; and many will apply for admittance next May, should the Commons Hall be then done away with.

The Parisian Boulevards were the scene of great animation a few days ago. A large chariot, drawn by twenty horses, carrying the carcase of a whale, was proceeding in the direction of the Jardin des Plantes. Strange to say, it was caught near the coast of Normandy, and is supposed to have lost its way from its native waters. Six republican guards-men on horseback marched in front of it, to keep off the crowd. The sailor who harpooned it was standing upright on the back of this huge fish, with the harpoon in his hand. It was a novel sight, and created quite a sensation.

A late number of the Scientific American states that the smoke in the factories of large cities in England and Scotland, is now consumed, it having been made a penal offense by act of Parliament for any factory to allow the smoke to escape. The smoke is all burned by simple contrivances of furnaces. A Committee of Government first established that the burning of smoke was perfectly practicable, and Parliament then enforced the fact by law. The factory and mill owners soon found out how to fulfill the conditions of this law, and the result is, that they save a great deal of fuel by the operation.

In East Greenwich, R. I., which contains a population of about 2,500, the town agent has sold, since August last, two hogsheads of New England rum, fifteen casks of brandy, besides other liquors. The Providence Journal says the people are not extensively engaged in any mechanical pursuit requiring any great amount of alcohol, and the inference is, that nearly all the liquor sold must have been for medicine. Another inference is thot the town must be a very sickly one!

The North River steamboats have nearly all been laid up for the winter, and there are no boats running above Kingston in consequence of the river having frozen over and the ice being too strong for the boats to make progress.

A bill has passed the Senate of Florida, by 14 Yeas to 2 Nays, prohibiting retailing liquor in any district when a majority of the votes are opposed thereto. The Floridian expresses the opinion that it will certainly pass the House.

At Liverpool, the other day, some sixty grocers and other trafficers were hauled up before the Mayor and fined for selling with false weights and measures.

The advices from Europe have been followed by a rise of 18¾ a 25c. in Flour, and 5c. in Wheat, with considerable transactions. The orders from the other side are large.

The Ladies' Association, in a recent Fair at Metropolitan Hall, N. Y., for the benefit of the Shirt-Sewers and Seamstresses Union, received eighteen hundred dollars.

A man named Scates, 82 years of age, was hung in Jefferson, (Miss.,) recently, having been convicted of the murder of his own son.

Dr. S. Hume, of Lancaster, Pa., who died lately, bequeathed $2000 towards erecting an asylum for the reformation of drunkards.

A new Bank is to be established in Albany, the first in twelve years.

American Sabbath Tract Society's Publications.

THE American Sabbath Tract Society publishes the following tracts, which are for sale at its Depository, No. 9 Spruce-st., N. Y., viz:—

No. 1—Reasons for introducing the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment to the consideration of the Christian Public. 28 pp.
No. 2—Moral Nature and Scriptural Observance of the Sabbath. 52 pp.
No. 3—Authority for the Change of the Day of the Sabbath. 28 pp.
No. 4—The Sabbath and Lord's Day: A History of their Observance in the Christian Church. 52 pp.
No. 5—A Christian Caveat to the Old and New Sabbatarians. 4 pp.
No. 6—Twenty Reasons for keeping holy, in each week, the Seventh Day instead of the First Day. 4 pp.
No. 7—Thirty-six Plain Questions, presenting the main points in the Controversy; A Dialogue between a Minister of the Gospel and a Sabbatarian; Counterfeit Coin. 8 pp.
No. 8—The Sabbath Controversy: The True Issue 4 pp.
No. 9—The Fourth Commandment: False Exposition 4 pp.
No. 10—The True Sabbath Embraced and Observed. 16 pp.
No. 11—Religious Liberty Endangered by Legislative Enactments. 16 pp.
No. 12—Misuse of the Term Sabbath. 8 pp.
No. 13—The Bible Sabbath. 24 pp.
No. 14—Delaying Obedience. 4 pp.
No. 15—An Appeal for the Restoration of the Bible Sabbath, in an Address to the Baptists, from the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference. 40 pp.

The Society has also published the following works to which attention is invited:—

A Defense of the Sabbath, in reply to Ward on the Fourth Commandment. By George Carlow. First printed in London, in 1724; reprinted at Stonington, Ct., in 1802; now republished in a revised form. 168 pp.
The Royal Law Contended for. By Edward Stennet First printed in London, in 1658. 60 pp.
Vindication of the True Sabbath, by J. W. Morton, late Missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. 64 pp.
Also, a periodical sheet, quarto, The Sabbath Vindicator. Price $1 00 per hundred.

The series of fifteen tracts, together with Edward Stennett's "Royal Law Contended for," and J. W. Morton's "Vindication of the True Sabbath," may be had in a bound volume. Price 50 cents.

These tracts will be furnished to those wishing them for distribution or sale, at the rate of 15 pages for one cent. Persons desiring them can have them forwarded by mail or otherwise, on sending their address, with a remittance, to GEORGE B. UTTER, Corresponding Secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

The Sabbath Recorder,

Published Weekly.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in Advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

The Sabbath-School Visitor,

Published Monthly.

Terms per Annum—Invariably in advance:

One copy	$ 25
Five copies to one address	1 00
Twelve copies to one address	2 00
Twenty copies to one address	3 00
Twenty-eight copies to one address	4 00
Forty copies to one address	5 00

The Seventh-day Baptist Memorial,

Published Quarterly.

Terms—$1 00 a Year, 25 Cents a Number.

Each number of the Memorial will contain a lithographic portrait of a Seventh-day Baptist preacher, together with a variety of historical, biographical, and statistical matter, designed to illustrate the rise, progress, and present condition of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Wood-cuts of meeting-houses will be introduced from time to time in connection with the history of the churches.

☞ Orders and remittances for the above should be addressed to the General Agent, GEORGE B. UTTER, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

Postage.

The postage on the Sabbath Recorder is 13 cents a year in the State of New York, and 26 cents in any other part of the United States, payable quarterly or yearly in advance.

The postage on the Sabbath-School Visitor is 3 cents a year in the State of New York, and 6 cents in any other part of the United States, payable in advance.

The postage on the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial is 2 cents a year in any part of the United States when paid in advance, or 4 cents a year when not paid in advance.

WESTERN EMIGRANT SOCIETY.

The following document comes to us in the Canton Weekly Register of Dec. 25, 1852. Presuming that its authors will be glad to have it circulated, and that our readers will be interested in its perusal, we copy it.

Whereas, a number of families who observe the seventh day of the week, the Sabbath of Jehovah, are desirous of emigrating to a suitable tract of land on the great public domain, where they can provide for their families and assemble in society with others of like observance—

Therefore, we deem it our duty and interest to form a society for mutual aid and encouragement in this matter, and for this purpose adopt and agree to support the following articles, with such amendments and additions as may be agreed upon from time to time.

The Constitution.

ARTICLE 1. This Society shall be called the Western Emigrant Society of Sabbath-keepers.

ART. 2. The objects of this Society shall be to look out, locate and settle a tract of land in the great public domain, in the Valley of the Missouri, suitable for a farming, a mechanical, artisan and trading community; and to erect such public buildings as are requisite for worship and the public instruction of the children of the community, in strict accordance with the principles of Sabbath-keeping.

ART. 3. The conditions of membership in this Society shall be, subscription to the Preamble and Constitution of the Society, and payment to the stock of the Society of not less than three dollars. All such members shall have an equal vote in the election of the officers of the Society, and in the discussions and decisions of the public measures of the Society, and a proportionate stock share in the privileges and immunities of the stock of the Society.

ART. 4. This Society shall annually elect a President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than Six Directors, who, together with the President, Secretary, and Treasurer, shall constitute a Board of Trust and Management, by whom the business of the Society shall be conducted in the interims of the annual and special meetings of the Society. The President, Secretary, and Treasurer shall be chosen annually. The Directors shall be divided into three classes, of which, at the organization of the Society, the first class shall be chosen for one year, the second for two years, and the third for three years, and at each subsequent election one-third shall be chosen for three years.

ART. 5. The officers of the Society shall be chosen at the annual meeting of the Society by a majority of ballots, and absent members may, by a well certified written appointment, ballot by proxy in the election of officers; but all other measures shall be decided by a majority vote of the members present.

ART. 6. This Society shall meet annually to elect its officers and directors, to hear reports of the Secretary and Treasurer, and to transact any other business that may come before it, connected with its legitimate objects. The time and place of the anniversary shall be determined by the Board, and notice thereof sent to all the members of the Society at least eight weeks before the meeting.

ART. 7. A special meeting of the Society may be called at any time by the President, at the request of the Board; provided eight weeks' notice be sent to all the members previous to the meeting.

ART. 8. The Board shall have the power to fill all vacancies that may occur in their own body, and to require security of the Treasurer whenever they judge it necessary.

ART. 9. The Board shall meet quarterly, and may adjourn to meet oftener if business require it, and they shall have the power to employ such agents, and order such labors performed, as they shall judge requisite to the interests of the Society, and fix the compensation for the same. Two-thirds of the members of the Board present at any regular meeting shall be deemed a quorum for the transaction of business.

ART. 10. At no time shall the Board incur any liabilities beyond the actual available assets of the Society.

ART. 11. It shall be the duty of the Board to carry out as nearly as possible the instructions of the Society as adopted at its stated meetings; and in no case whatever shall it proceed in any measures contrary to the adopted instructions of the Society.

ART. 12. It shall be the duty of the President to preside in all the meetings of the Society and of the Board, and to perform such other duties as are provided for by the Constitution and the rules of order which may be adopted by the Society or the Board. In case of the President's inability, or at his request, any member of the Board, except the Secretary, may preside and perform all other duties of his office.

ART. 13. It shall be the duty of the Secretary to keep a record of all meetings of the Board and of the Society, and the doings and orders of the same, accessible at all times to any member of the Board; carry on the correspondence of the Society, and perform any other writing connected with his office, as it may be required by the Society or the Board; for which he shall receive a just per diem compensation.

ART. 14. It shall be the duty of the Treasurer to keep the moneys of the Society, promissory notes and other valuable documents belonging to the same, and disburse the moneys, and dispose of the notes, and obligations belonging the Society, upon the order of the Board, certified by the Secretary. He shall report to the Board, at all its stated meetings, the state of the treasury, and present to the Society, at its annual meeting, a report of all the receipts and expenditures of the year, duly certified by auditors appointed by the Board for the examination of his accounts.

ART. 15. The Board shall report, through the Secretary, at the annual meeting, giving an account of all their transactions during the year, and laying before the Society such other matters as they may think proper and important for the attention of the Society.

ART. 16. The Society and the Board shall each have power to adopt such By-Laws and Rules of Order as may be necessary for the regulation of their own proceedings; provided they do not conflict with any part or principle of this Constitution.

ART. 17. This Constitution may be altered at any annual meeting of the Society, by two-thirds of the members voting for the same; provided such alteration do not conflict with the objects of the Society as at present organized, nor mar the interests or privileges of any member or members of the Society.

The Address.

To such Christian Observers of the seventh day—the Holy Sabbath of Jehovah—as are scattered abroad without the advantages of sabbath day meetings; and to such others as are desirous of benefitting themselves or their families by emigrating to new settlements, these presents are sent greeting:

DEAR FRIENDS,—Having been made painfully sensible of the many difficulties and disadvantages which conscientious Sabbath-keepers and their families suffer in the present state of society, and in your and our situations; and viewing the vast national domain now opening in the great Missouri Valley as a public patrimony equally open and eligible for us and our children to settle and enjoy, as for any other class of our fellow men; we have deemed it our interest, and our duty, to form a society for concentrating our families in such settlements as shall secure to them and ourselves all the advantages of civil and religious society, without the usual drawbacks attendant upon an isolated residence among the observers of the first day of the week; to which we invite your candid attention. The principles we have adopted, the objects we contemplate, the measures we have projected, you will see briefly set forth in the Constitution under which we have ranged ourselves, and which accompanies this address.

We wish, however, in this address to give you a more particular account of the policy by which we are actuated, the objects we have in view, and the measures by which we hope to accomplish them.

It is ours policy as a people, as much as possible, to lighten each other's burdens, and draw off our children and friends from temptations.

In a country like our, with the vast opening for enterprise presented to every class of its inhabitants, and with the spirit of progress which moves American society from center to circumference, it were impossible—if it were undesirable—to prevent numerous changes in the circumstances and residences of every class of its inhabitants. The observers of the Sabbath are just as susceptible of these impulses, and as liable to these changes as any other class; and, in proportion as they are intelligent and enterprising, will they push off from the old stands to secure the ripening advantages of progressive society. To attempt to restrain them, is as futile as to build a fence against the east wind. Go they will, where superior advantages offer; and all that can be done in this matter by the more stable and discreet of the older part of society, is to direct and foster such undertakings as will open to their emigrating friends the advantages of religious institutions, side by side with the openings for enterprise and wealth. It is our confident conviction that a lack of this policy among the observers of the Sabbath of Jehovah has been the occasion of the loss of many estimable persons from among us, who might have been saved to the Sabbath observance, had the sympathies of their friends followed them in their otherwise commendable endeavors to improve their circumstances. It is easy for such as enjoy lucrative situations in the bosom of well established societies, to say of these banished ones, They ought to have had more principle than to have sacrificed conscience to worldly policy! But there are often many considerations that make up the necessity that urges the step that ultimately cuts them off from their first religious convictions. Honesty among men is as necessary a part of godliness as religious observances, and the sympathies and other influences of society are as necessary to the inculcation and maintenance of religious principle, as the first demonstrations of truth; and to insist upon the maintenance of a single sentiment or observance of truth, in the absence of all these, and in opposition to constantly proffered advantages and Christian sympathies, is to fight against the order of nature and of God. The whole history of progressive Christianity shows that the sympathies and domesticated or local institutions of society are as requisite to the progress and maintenance of religious principles as are the demonstrations of truth. A head of a family who cherishes the recollection of all these kindly influences of his youth, in connection with his first convictions of truth, may maintain his integrity in the observance of these; but his children, in those circumstances, must reverse the order of nature to stem all the influences of popular society, and continue to adhere to an institution like the Sabbath, which separates them from the best sympathies of religious associations. We therefore deem it indispensable to the maintenance of the Sabbath in our families, that we should locate them in concentrated communities, where its observance can be enjoyed amidst the cultivation and sympathies of Sabbath-keeping society.

The same causes operate powerfully to prevent many worthy persons from embracing the Sabbath observance, who are convicted of the validity and truthfulness of its claims; hence we frequently hear the remark, "If other people kept the Sabbath, we should do so too." Every thing in our history appears to us to make it apparent that our true interest as a people is, in the present state of society, to originate and foster compact settlements on the public lands of the West. Had this been done as a denominational policy from the earliest settlement of the Western States, it is our firm conviction that many strong and vigorous communities of Sabbath-keepers, would now have been lifting up their testimony for truth in all the Western States. It were easy to show that all the progress that Sabbath-keepers have made as societies, has been done by the accumulating force of private enterprise—despite of the policy and prepossessions of the larger part of the older settlements! Let it but become the policy of the denomination, and our increase will most surely follow.

The settlement of the public lands is a policy fostered by our national government, and inculcated by Revelation and Providence. It is a pursuit alike virtuous, honorable, and lucrative. The Government of the United States knows no religious preferences in this matter, and shows none. All the great denominations of the land are using their utmost instrumentalities to bring the growing communities of the West under their denominational influences; if the Sabbath-keepers of America have little or no share in it, the fault lies with themselves—they do not use the proper measures. God, who said, 'Subdue the earth, and replenish it,' follows with the blessings of Providence and Grace those who heartily engage in it. If we do not raise flourishing communities in this great field of nature, under the protection and encouragement of human and divine government, it is because of our own supineness and imbecility!

Within the year 1853 it is expected that more than a hundred millions of acres of the finest class of lands in the world, will be thrown open to honorable competition of settlement, in the valley watered by the Missouri river and its tributaries. What part of this rich patrimony we, as Sabbath-keepers, shall possess, what religious interests we shall establish there, are questions for us to decide to-day. That these lands will in a few years be settled, is as certain as that the States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Illinois, are settled now! and that with prosperous families and flourishing churches! That some of our children and our friends will be there, who now keep the Sabbath, is as certain as that many families are settled in these States, who once kept that day, but are now lost to our denomination; and without some concentrated effort to save them, it is morally certain that as many more will be lost to us in the States and settlements yet to arise! If, then, our principles are worth maintaining, there is a solemn responsibility resting some where to direct aright the migration of our children and friends, and so to concentrate their settlements as to enable them to maintain the principles we inculcate, and bear an efficient testimony for truth in the swelling population that is certain to occupy those lands. The proper observance of the Sabbath involves the almost entire reconstruction of society, and without one of those great revolutions that Providence alone can bring about, it is hopeless to expect a general restoration of that holy observance; but, by a timely and well directed effort to concentrate the moving part of our people, we can raise up respectable communities, who shall bear witness for the truth, and illustrate the happiness of the principles we advocate, when carried out to their legitimate results. The great question for us to-day is, shall we attempt it?

After several informal meetings of friends of this enterprise, a committee was appointed to draft a constitution and address, to report to a subsequent meeting then appointed, and which was held as reported in the commencement of this paper. At that meeting this constitution and the address—to the close of the last paragraph—was adopted, and the following statements ordered to be added, and the whole printed and distributed at the expense of the Society.

The Object

Of this society is not to interfere with any other interest or existing institution among the Christian observers of the Sabbath, but to supply an agency for an object which appears to us of much prospective importance to our families, and many others who are known to be similarly situated with ourselves. With such we wish to open a direct correspondence, and propose to furnish them with all the information in our power respecting the progress of our undertaking, and the advantages that may accrue. We ask the coöperation of all friends of the undertaking, whether they ever become members of our projected settlements or not. Many have children and friends who may be benefitted by it, whose years and circumstances make it no way desirable on their own account; besides, we hope to see it result in great good to the cause of truth. We invite such as say, "We would keep the Sabbath if we could," to come and join us, whatever may be your occupation. Our plan is to select a tract of land not yet in market, but where we can make our claims legal, so as to secure ample room for all to follow their own chosen occupations, and lay off a village plot, to be sold in lots, of the usual size of town lots, to be appraised, and in classes ranging from three to thirty dollars, first to members and subscribers of the society only; afterwards the unsold to others; every subscriber or contributor to the stock of the society is to be reimbursed to the amount of his subscription in his own choice of a lot or lots in the village plot. All the expenses of the society are to be paid out of the proceeds of these subscriptions and sales, and a sufficient sum set apart for entering the appropriated village plot, and the surplus to be applied, under the direction of the society, to the building of a meeting house and an academy, the laying off of a public cemetery, and such other public improvements as shall be needed and authorized.

Our Measures,

As they are at present proje[illegible] as follows, viz: A meeting is to be [illegible] Farmington on the first Sunday in March next, 1853, as the first anniversary, when the constitutional officers of the Society are to be elected, commissioners appointed and furnished with means for exploring the Western field already named, and to look out and fix upon a suitable location for the first settlement. At the same time it is expected that a number of families will be ready to start with covered emigrant wagons, who will keep up a correspondence with the commissioners, and be ready to go on to, take possession of, and make and hold the claims that are determined on. In the meantime we shall endeavor to collect all available information upon the subject.

At the meeting in March next, a small draft will be made upon all subscribers to meet the current expenses.

SAMUEL DAVISON, Pres.
L. G. MAXSON, M. D., Sec.

P. S.—A very respectable subscription for stock was made at the close of the meeting, which the meeting was assured would be much increased so soon as other friends could be waited upon. Persons desirous of taking an interest in the Society may send in their names and money, or notes payable to the Treasurer of the Western Emigrant Society of Sabbath-keepers.

N. B.—Persons wishing to correspond with the Society, are requested to address Dr. L. G. Maxson, (post paid) Farmington, Ill.

A section of land, one mile square, or 640 acres, may be laid off into 144 blocks of building lots, each containing four acres—each block may be divided into twelve township or village lots, containing eight quarter acre lots, and four half acre lots, which would give 1728 lots, and leave sixty-four acres for roads or streets, that is, eight miles of roads or streets four rods wide. If these lots were sold, averaging $10 per lot, it, would produce $17,280. Allowing $1,280 for purchase money, and locating and plotting it, there would remain a fund of $16,000 for building a meeting house and college.

ONE SIN TOO MANY.

There is an old Grecian legend, which teaches that there was once a diver who boasted of his skill to bring up treasures from the sea. To test his powers, the people threw many a silver cup and many a golden coin into water nine fathoms deep; and the bold diver brought them to the surface with triumph. But one day a disguised fiend threw a tinsel crown into a whirlpool, and challenged the confident diver to bring it up; promising him, if he succeeded, the power to wear it, and to transmit it to his children. Down he sprang after the bauble; but the NEREIDS of the sea, hearing the clangor of the crown when it fell upon their grottoes, closed around him as he was grasping the prize, and held him fast until he perished.

Thus reads the legend. Its moral teaches that the most daring may dare once too often—that folly, though long successful, will plunge its victim into ruin at last. A lesson worthy of the careful study of partilly awakened sinners, as may be seen by the following fact:

A young man, of fine talents, was present one evening at the house of God in —— during an interesting revival. Several of his companions had already given their hearts to Christ, and he had been deeply moved by their experiences. He was therefore prepared to receive strong impressions, and he did. The truth went home to his conscience. He wept to see himself so vile, as he now beheld himself mirrored in the word of God. He felt a motion, almost irrepressible, to submit to Christ, and to join the band of penitents who bowed before the altar. But the pride of his heart revolted at so public and humiliating an avowel of his sinfulness. He dreaded the scorn of the wordly! He kept his seat, therefore, soothing his conscience by a resolve—firm and irrevocable, as he persuaded himself—to return home at the close of the service, and seek the pardon of his sins alone, in the solitude of his chamber. With this purpose, he left his pew at the close of the services, and passed with the thronging but grave multitude out of the church.

On the door-steps he found some gay friends awaiting him. They had planned a scheme of pleasure for an hour or two that night; they begged him to join them.

"No," said he, faintly; "I think not, to-night."

They gazed in his face earnestly, and one of them, detecting an unusual seriousness in his aspect, which was discernable, even in the pale moonlight of that beautiful evening, exclaimed in a taunting tone of voice. "What! are you going to be religious too?"

That speaker was his fiend in disguise. In that speech he threw the bauble of human approbation into the whirlpool, and the half-awakened youth plunged in desperately to seize it. Throwing off his gravity, he burst into a loud laugh, assured them he was not serious, accepted their invitation, and lost his convictions. Henceforth his sins held him in bondage and in chains. In a few months, he died an impenitent sinner!

How fatal was his one act of resistance to the Holy Spirit. Had he yielded and taken his place at the altar, the invitation of his sinful friends at the door would have been powerless to attract him. But he resisted once too often. The tinsel crown of human approval led him like the diver, to a fatal leap, and he perished. Awakened sinner, beware! You too may sin once too often! [Zion's Her.

BE THINE OWN EXECUTOR.

A brother, whose signature is Zaccheus, sends $500, "as an appropriation for the extension of the knowledge of Christ among men." This he has done repeatedly before, under an impression that whatsoever his hand findeth to do, he should do quickly; and with a conviction that a man ought as far as practicable to be his own e[illegible]or. He assigns two wise and sufficient reasons for this course; first, the pleasure of seeing the fruit of one's own benevolence; and, secondly, to be sure that his intentions will take effect. This last reason has acquired great weight wit[illegible]ently, by seeing several, (he mentions [illegible]equests for benevolent purposes set aside by courts, and thus the obvious intent of the testator failed to take effect. There is much good sense in these views of Zaccheus, and we commend them to the prayerful consideration of those who have good hearts and worldly wealth al[illegible] [Methodist Paper.

KEEP TO THE RIGHT.

"Keep to the right," as the law directs;
For such is the rule of the road;
Keep to the right, whoever expects
Securely to carry life's load.

Keep to the right, with God and his Word,
Nor wander, though folly allures;
Keep to the right, nor ever be hurled
From what by the statute is yours.

Keep to the right, within and without,
With stranger and kindred and friend;
Keep to the right, and harbor no doubt
That all will be well in the end.

Keep to the right, whatever you do,
Nor claim but your own on the way;
Keep to the right, and hold to the true
From morn till the close of the day.

MR. WEBSTER—IMPORTANT THOUGHT.

A correspondent of the Rochester American adds the following to the host of anecdotes of the great statesman, which his decease has called forth:—

When Mr. Webster was Secretary of State, some years ago, under another administration than that of Mr. Fillmore, he wrote to one of the proprietors of the Astor House in New York, saying that he would reach that house on such a day, and begged that some of his friends should be invited to dine with him the same evening.

There were about twenty or so at the table, and Mr. Webster seemed wearied by his travel and speaking but little, if at all, plunged into a darksome sort of reverie, not well calculated to enliven his friends. This at length became so apparent, and the situation of all so unpleasant, that one of the company urged upon a very distinguished man present, a warm friend of Mr. Webster, to get him into conversation. He only needed to be jogged to become as lively as they wished.

This friend consented, and spoke aloud to Mr. Webster, asking him some question that, in ordinary circumstances, and with ordinary men, would have led to conversation, but it failed in the present case. The dark Secretary of State merely raised his head and answered simply, and crept into his cave again.

Again the gentleman, frightened by his failure, was urged to renew the attempt to draw him out. He summoned courage and said, "Mr. Webster," (Mr. Webster looked up out of his cave,) "Mr. Webster, I want you to tell me what was the most important thought that ever occupied your mind." Here was a thumper for you, and so every body thought at table. Mr. Webster slowly passed his hand over his forehead, and in a low tone said to a friend near him, "Is there any one here who does not know me?" "No, sir, they all know you—are all your friends." Then he looked over the table, and you may well imagine how the tones of his voice would be upon such an occasion, giving answer to such a question. "The most important thought that ever occupied my mind," said he, "was that of my individual responsibility to God!"—upon which, for twenty minutes, he spoke to them there, and when he had finished he got up from the table and retired to his room, and they, without a word, went into an adjacent parlor, and when they had gathered there some of them exclaimed, "Who ever heard any thing like that?" What Mr. Webster said in advocacy of his sublime thought I do not know—no one has ever repeated it, and I presume no one can.

HE WAS MY DEAR SON.

So said a mother to me, not many weeks since, when weeping with overwhelming grief for the death of her oldest son. I have seldom seen deeper anguish; and perhaps few parents are ever called to part with just such a son. Though but a youth, his manners were those of a gentleman; his judgment sound; his conscience tender; his reverence for the truth profound; his respect for the gospel and its ordinances uniform; his obedience to his parents habitual, prompt and cheerful; his affection for the younger members of the family pure and abiding; he was not simply a son and brother, but already the companion, counsellor and friend of father, mother, brothers and sisters. His mind, too, was of a fine order, and well cultivated for his age; the promise of his future was most encouraging. But with all this, death marked him for his prey. During the Christmas recess from school, and while on a visit to the family of a friend, he contracted a severe cold. Bronchial consumption followed, and laid him, in a few months, in the silent grave.

His sick chamber exhibited much of meekness, patience and cheerfulness. Though without an external stain upon his character, a sense of sin, of ill desert in the sight of God troubled him; he sought relief in the peace-speaking blood of the Lamb; he found it not suddenly, but by slow degrees; he read, he prayed, he loved to have his pastor, his friends, the elders of the church pray with him. At first he spoke tremblingly, but when Jordan rolled at his feet, and the murky shades of its deep valley gathered about him, he knew no fear. "Father," said he, "I am now about to die; but I feel that Jesus is ferrying me over the dark valley. Blessed Jesus, blessed Jesus!" This his weeping mother heard, but she was badly prepared to part with her boy. "O, mother," said he, "do not weep so; I am happy, and will soon be with the Saviour."

Sad, yet precious comfort, these words of her dying boy! Life and death here meet, Life in death, death out of life. His sight fails—his hearing also—his lips cease to speak—and—now—a few long, slow heavings, and all is quiet—all is over—he is gone.

The death chamber was filled with wailing, and when the voice of the pastor would speak peace and calmness to that grief-stricken mother, this was her answer: "He was my dear son;" "he was my dear son; I could not give him up, for I expected him to preach the gospel."

Surely, the death of a son, and such a son, is cause of grief. We admit it; but should it be hopeless, despairing, unsubmissive grief? Has not God taken him? and had not God a right to take him—a better right than a mother to retain him? Will he not take better care of him, and exalt him to higher degrees, both of service and joy, than could be conferred upon him here?

Weeping mother, have you really lost your son? Is he not still your son? Is he not your son in heaven? God lost not his dear Son when he gave him up for us all; he gave him up that he might receive him forever. So your jewel has been taken; but to be purified, and brightened, and reset in your crown, never more to be removed. Is that a cause of grief? He is now in God's family in heaven. Would you call him thence? Do you grieve that he is happy? O, let it not be. What sweet comfort was afforded in his death! And what an honor to have a son in the court of heaven! He was your dear son, true; but God loved him also, and has provided for him better than you can. Is your best earthly treasure too valuable to be given cheerfully to the Saviour when he asks it? What has he not done for you? Dry then your tears. Look up and say, and feel, "Even so, Father;" "Not my will, but thine be done." You may yet rejoice with your son among the glorified at God's right hand. Will you weep then? Weep not now. Mothere, weep not; grieve not for your children, even for a dear son dead in the Lord. [Presbyterian.

JOHN OWEN.

An elaborate and deeply interesting article in the North British Review, upon this prince of Puritan divines, contains the following account of his closing days:—

The retirement into which he was forced by the restoration of Charles II. to the throne, was attended with most of the hardships incident to an ejected minister, to which were added sufferings and sorrows of his own. He never was in prison, but he knew what it was to lead the life of a fugitive; and, after making a narrow escape from dragoons sent to arrest him, he was compelled to quit his rural retreat, and seek a precarious refuge in the capital. In 1676 he lost his wife; but before this, they had mingled their tears over the coffins of ten out of their eleven children; and the only survivor, a pious daughter, returned from the house of an unkind husband, to seek beside her father all that was left of the home of her childhood. Soon after, he married again; but, though the lady was good, and affectionate, and rich withal, no comforts and no kind tending could counteract the effects of by-gone toils and privations, and for the brief remainder of his days, weakness and anguish made many a mournful deduction. Still the busy mind worked on. To the congregation, which had already shown at once its patience and its piety, by listening to Caryl's ten quartos on Job, and who was afterwards to have its patience further tried and rewarded in the long but invalid incumbency of Isaac Watts—Dr. Owen ministered as long as he was able; and, being a preacher who had "something to say," it was cheering to him to recognize among his constant attendants, persons so intelligent and influential as the late Protector's brother-in-law, and son-in-law, Col. Deaborough and Lord Charles Heetwood, Sir John Hartopps, the Hon. Roger Boyle, Lady Abney, and the Countess of Anglesia, and many other hearers who adorned the doctrine which their pastor expounded; and whose expectant eagerness gave zest to their studies, and animation to his public addresses.

Besides, during all his interval, and to the number of more than thirty volumes, he has given to the world those masterly works which have invigorated the theology, and sustained the devotions of unnumbered readers in either hemisphere. Among others, folio by folio, came forth that Exposition of the Hebrews, which, amidst all its digressive prolixity, and with its frequent excess of erudition, is an enduring monument of its author's robust understanding and spiritual insight, as well as his astonishing industry. At last, the pen dropped from his hand, and on the 23d of August, 1683, he dictated a note to his like-minded friend, Charles Heetwood:—

"I am going to him my soul has loved, or, rather, who has loved me, with an everlasting love, which is the sole ground of all my consolation. I am leaving the ship of the Church in a storm; but while the Great Pilot is in it, the loss of a poor under-rower will be inconsiderable. Live, and pray, and hope, and wait patiently, and do not despond; the promise stands invincible—that he will never leave us nor forsake us. My affectionate respects to your lady, and to the rest of your relations, who are so dear to me in the Lord. Remember your dying friend with all fervency."

The morrow after he had sent this touching message to the representative of a beloved family, was Bartholomew day, the anniversary of the ejection of his two thousand brethren. That morning, a friend called to tell him that he put to press his "Meditations on the glory of Christ." There was a moment's gleam in his languid eye, as he answered:—

"I am glad to hear it, but, O! brother Payne! The long wished for day is come at last, in which I shall see that glory in another manner than I have ever done, or was capable of doing in this world."

A few hours of silence followed, and then that glory was revealed. On the fourth of September, a vast funeral procession, including the carriages of sixty-seven noblemen and gentlemen, with long trains of mourning coaches and horsemen, took the road to Tinsbury; and there, in a new burying-ground, within a few paces of Goodwin's grave, and near the spot where, five years later, John Bunyan was interred, they laid the dust of Dr. Owen. His grave is with us to this day; but in the crowded Golgotha, surrounded with undertakers' sheds and blind brickwalls, with London cabs and omnibuses whistling past the gate, few pilgrims can distinguish the obliterated stone which marks the resting-place of the mighty nonconformist.

One who, in early years, will not look forward with virtuous forethought and resolution along the path which he is to travel, will be forced, it is probable, in maturer years, to look backward on it with compunction and sorrow.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, January 13, 1853.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.

A large and enthusiastic meeting was held at Metropolitan Hall, in this city, on Friday evening, the 7th inst., for the purpose of expressing sympathy for the Madiai Family and others, now imprisoned in the Grand Duchy of Tuscany for possessing and reading the Holy Scriptures. His Honor the Mayor was Chairman, and among the speakers were the Rev. Drs. Kennedy, Hague, Murray, Bethune, and Cox.

A statement of facts was read by Rev. Dr. Baird, showing that, during the reign of those liberal views and measures which the revolution in 1848 gave birth to in so many parts of Italy, many thousands of copies of the Scriptures, in the Italian language, were put into circulation among the people in Florence, who received them with great avidity. At first this was done with the consent of the Government, and in accordance with the laws of Tuscany. Many were led to see the errors of the Church of Rome; little meetings for reading and expounding the Word of God were held in private houses; and, for several months, faithful young men, from among the Waldenses in the valleys of Piedmont, preached the Gospel in the Italian language at the Protestant Swiss Chapel in Florence.

At length a reäction set in. One privilege after another was abolished, together with the Constitution which had been adopted in 1848. The preaching in the Swiss Chapel was interdicted, and stringent measures were adopted to arrest the spirit of inquiry. In the spring of 1851, Count Piero Guicciardini and five others were thrown into prison, for the sole offense of possessing and reading the New Testament. Other imprisonments soon followed, and numbers were banished, until it was believed that, in the autumn of 1851, as many as twenty of the most prominent persons in this religious movement were either in prison, among common felons, or in exile.

In the succeeding winter, Francisco Madiai, and his wife Rosa, both persons in the middle period of life, or rather passing out of it, were arrested and thrown into a loathsome prison, among the vilest criminals, where they languished many months, and their health was, it is feared, permanently affected. At length, in June last, they were brought to trial. The only charge was, in the language of the indictment, literally translated, that of "impiety, shown in making proselytes to the so-called evangelical or pure-gospel confession." In other words, it was a charge that they had possessed and read Word of God, and, having found the blessed peace which it gives, desired to make their neighbors and friends partakers in their joy. The trial lasted from the 4th to the 8th of June, 1852, and ended in their being condemned, by a vote of three Judges against them to two in their favor. They were defended with great ability by Sig. Maggiorani, a talented Florentine advocate, who deserves the greatest credit for his intrepidity in that trying moment, and for his subsequent kind and considerate attention to his unfortunate clients.

It is proper to add, that the argument of this able advocate was fully sustained by the opinions of some of the most distinguished jurists in Tuscany. The noble confessors so deported themselves on the occasion as to command the deepest sympathy of all who were present. Pale and exhausted by their long and miserable imprisonment, they answered with meekness and firmness to the interrogatories of the court. At the commencement of the trial, Signor Madiai was asked if he was born in the bosom of the Holy Mother, the Roman Catholic Church. "Yes," he replied, "but now I am a Christian, according to the Gospel." "Who has made you such, and does there exist an act of abjuration among those to whom you are united?" "My convictions have existed for many years, but have acquired strength from the study of the Word of God. It has been a matter between God and my own soul, but which was outwardly manifested when I took the communion in the Swiss Church." His wife also testified that the change in her views and feelings had been the result of years of prayerful inquiry, and that she had made a public profession of her new faith at a time when the laws gave religious liberty to the citizens.

But every defense was in vain. They were condemned; Sig. Madiai to fifty-six, and his wife to forty-five months imprisonment at hard labor; and both have already passed more than six months of the term of their sentence, not in the same penitentiary, but in establishments fifty miles apart—the husband at Volterra, and his wife at Lucca.

Deputations of distinguished Protestants from England, Holland, France, Germany, and Switzerland, have gone to sue for the clemency of the Grand Duke in behalf of those sufferers, but were refused a personal interview! Recent ordinances or decrees of the Government denounce the punishment of death (by the guillotine) against certain offenses, and among them, anything that is contrary to religion (contra religione)—the very offense charged upon the Madiai. And at the latest intelligence from that unhappy country, Signor Guarducci, one of the individuals who were exiled with Count Guicciardini, in 1851, has been arrested and thrown into prison a second time for the crime of Protestantism! His house was searched at the hour of 3 o'clock in the morning, and a copy of Diodati's Bible, the Protestant version, found in it. Very serious apprehensions are entertained lest, either by the sword and the faggot, or by confinement in unhealthy prisons, amid marshes, men may soon be called to suffer death for reading the Scriptures and following their convictions. And these things are done in the nineteenth century!

The Earl of Roden, one of the deputation from Great Britian, obtained permission to visit Sig. Madiai and his wife in their respective prisons; and while he bears honorable testimony to the civility of the keepers, as well as to the circumstances of comparative comfort in which they are—not being at work in the galleys, as was reported, nor shut up with felons—he describes their health, particularly that of Sig. Madiai, as such as to render it certain, humanly speaking, that he cannot much longer endure the imprisonment which he is undergoing. Neither of them is allowed to have the religious instruction and consolation of a Protestant pastor or teacher, nor even a Protestant version of the Bible, nor (we believe) a Protestant book; but are both subject, by way of discipline, to the attempts, oft-repeated, of priests, monks, and nuns, to convert them back to the Roman Catholic Church.

A series of resolutions, setting forth the views of the meeting, and the kind of interposition which it was desired that the President of the United States should employ, to induce the Government of Tuscany to pursue a milder policy, was presented, in the perusal of which our readers will be interested.

Whereas, This meeting has learned with profound sorrow that Sig. Madiai and his wife, together with other worthy persons in the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, have been torn from their homes and thrown into prison, subject to coërcive discipline, or otherwise persecuted, for possessing and reading the Bible; and whereas it is believed that general manifestions of public opinion have been found in all civilized countries to exert a happy influeuce upon Governments as well as upon those who suffer—

Resolved, That this meeting would express its deep sympathy for these sufferers for conscience sake in their severe trials, and offer its prayers to Heaven that they may be sustained by God's grace under them, and that these persecutions may have a speedy termination.

Resolved, That his Excellency the President of the United States be, and hereby is, requested to exert his kindly influence in such a manner as he may deem most judicious and most compatible with the duties of his official position, in behalf of these people, in the hope that the Government of Tuscany, in compliance with a respectful expression of the personal wishes of the Chief Magistrate of a nation which welcomes all who comes to its shores, whatever may be their creed, and gives them equal and complete religious liberty, may at least allow Signor Madiai and his wife to quit their prisons, and emigrate, if so disposed, to our country, at our expense.

Resolved, That this great meeting, convened without distinction of sect or party, and composed of friends of Religious Liberty, avails itself of the occasion, in this solemn and formal manner, to declare to Europe and to the whole world that an experience, running through many years, has demonstrated to our unanimous judgment the safety, harmony and prosperity which entire religious liberty secures both to the State and to Religion.

Resolved, That this meeting firmly believe that it is the duty of the Government of the United States to protect all our citizens in their religious rights while residing or sojourning in foreign lands; approves in the fullest manner of the noble attempt of a distinguished Senator from Michigan (Gen. Cass) to call the attention of the Government and the Public to this important subject; and entertains the confident hope that this Government will speedily secure to its citizens, by the express stipulations of international treaties, the right to worship God according to the dictates of their conscience in every foreign land.

Resolved, That this meeting is of the opinion that the benevolence which the Gospel teaches and inspires should lead the Government of these United States and the Governments of other countries which enjoy the blessings of religious liberty and have experienced its adantages, to exert a judicious, proper and peaceful influence to secure these blessings and advantages to all nations which do not possess them.

Resolved, Finally, that whereas the Bible is acknowledged by all Christians to be from God, and to contain a revelation of His will concerning men, and lies at the foundation of Christianity, this meeting affirms in the most emphatic manner its unwavering conviction that, as every man is responsible to God alone for his religious belief, that no government, civil or ecclesiastical, has the right to forbid any man to possess and read that sacred volume for himself, or to read it to his family, to his neighbors, to his friends, and to all who desire to hear it.

That, inasmuch as we have learned that several of these persecuted people are in exile and in want, and others in prison, and that their families are reduced to great distress, and some of them to utter destitution, this meeting recommends that contributions be made by the benevolent without delay for their relief, and that a Committee be appointed to receive and expend the funds which may be raised.

The speeches on the occasion were of a highly interesting character. We should be glad if we had room for them in the Recorder. That of the Rev. Dr. Bethune, of Brooklyn, is worth the perusal of our readers. We give it as we find it reported in the N. Y. Tribune:

MR. PRESIDENT: This is to me a most solemn occasion. The sublime words of that creed which I trust we all believe, are ringing in my ears and my heart: "I believe in the Holy Ghost, in the Holy Catholic Church, in the communion of Saints." There is, Sir, but one body as there is but one Head; there is but one spirit and one life. That body and that creed are all in all. There is no limit to the Church of Jesus Christ—to the will of Him whose goodness would that all men be saved. And wherever there is found any one who believes in the truth of that Book which tells us that Christ came into the world to save sinners, there is a member with us of the body of our Lord; and if one member suffer, the whole body should suffer. [Applause.] If we have the Holy Ghost in our own hearts and have become vitally united to the living God by a real faith, there is no one of us whose heart is not bleeding with these beloved Christians who are now crushed beneath the foot of the oppressor; and before God we must speak the sympathy of our hearts that are swelling to have vent. If it reached no further than to give relief to this pent-up sympathy, this meeting is a blessing.

Sir, I said I felt as though I were called before past centuries. We read of the sufferings of the early martyrs; of those of whom the world was not worthy; who stood amid the smoke of their fires, who perished within the dungeons. But we had thought these days were past. Yes, we had thought that these persecutions of past ages were past. Persecution was a thing necessary in the Dark Ages—a thing necessary for the establishment of the Church of Christ in the beginning. The blood of the martyrs was necessary to water the seeds of the church. But, as I said before, we thought these days were now past. It is but a little while since we were permitted to welcome those who were persecuted for Christ's sake; those strangers who came to us from the Islands of the sea. And now that same spirit is persecuting these Madiai. Yes, we are now told that in the Nineteenth Century—in the very face of Europe—two obscure individuals are looked upon as names which are to be treated as rebels, and immured in prison. Sir, I sympathize with those two persons; but I see here the working of that spirit of Rome which exalteth itself above the Scriptures. I see the primitive spirit of persecution again revived in this martyrdom of Florence; and it proves that the spirit of that power is yet alive and unchanged. In this country, I contend that it is impossible for the Americans to conceive of the oppression which exists in the old world; and when we tell them of the power which the priesthood is exerting there, they tell us that we are calumniating our brethren—that the growing light of science and the spirit of liberality in the Church ought to prevent our speaking thus of our brethren. But the spirit of persecution, which of old raged in Italy, is yet ready and rampant as it was five hundred years ago. The spirit of anti-Christ is always the same; and this spirit forbids the searching of the Scriptures.

We know that this oppression exists; and does it not become us, as the free people of this land—in this great metropolis of this free country—whence goes forth a voice and opinion and authority of the United States—does it not become us to give to these oppressed people our warmest sympathies? And what are we of this country but a nation of Republicans? the only nation on the face of the earth, except Liberia, where religious liberty is entire—[applause]—where man's censcience is free to worship God as his judgment declares he should? [Applause.] And since we are here as Republicans, bearing our testimony to Republican principles, free religiously—and as all our churches have flourished and grown strong under this system—I say it is our duty, not as Protestants merely, but as freemen, to lift up our voice in protest against religious oppression wherever it exists. [Applause.] But there is one religious sect of which I wish to speak. Before doing this, however, I wish to read an extract from this pamphlet. [The speaker here proceeded to read from a pamphlet, an extract which he called "an eulogy pronounced upon the Constitution of the United States, by Archbishop Hughes."] He then proceeded as follows: "I am not personally acquainted with Bishop Hughes; but, without waiting for a formal introduction, I call upon him, in the name of that liberty which his Church has ever here enjoyed—in the name of that freedom which is common to us all—in gratitude to the Baltimores' and the Williams' who helped to make that Constitution free—I call upon him to join us in calling upon the Duke of Tuscany to set free these people! [Great applause.] If this oppression be not part of Roman Catholicism, he cannot and will not refuse to join in the extension of that principle over which he rejoices. If he does not join us we shall believe that this oppression is part and parcel of Catholicism; and that if they had the power here, they would act like the Duke of Tuscany. [Applause.] This is the point to which we come. I believe that we may have stronger feelings for one case than for another, but I believe that if I know my own heart—that if this were the religious oppression of a Turk, a Jew, or a Catholic—my indignation would be as strong as it is now, I would lift up my voice in advocacy of the great principle, that let the man be a Turk, a Jew, or a Catholic, let him alone! [Applause.] Let him talk with his God. [Applause.] It is not in any other light than as a citizen of the free land where I dwell, and where I glory to see the Roman Catholic citizen also free, that I call upon these brethren to join me in this call. But ah! it will not come! depend upon it, it will not come. This very Duke is he who, a few years ago, was so liberal, so kind and so obliging that he was called the best beloved prince in all Europe. Indeed, so great was their regard for him they wished to call him to the throne of Italy. I have seen this old man walking about his home, with his hands behind his back, talking with his workmen, and bowing and smiling to the market people as they passed by, a very pattern of a good King. But he is now changed in his old age. His brain has become weak, and his heart is weak. He has been alarmed by revolution. But it is not the Grand Duke of Tuscany, Sir, it is the Priest! The Pope is the Priest! and the Pope is supreme at Rome. Let the Pope decree Religious Liberty! Let him wash his hands of the religious oppression, and then shall I believe that religious oppression is not the act of the priest, but of the Government! [Applause.]

This very night there is in the City of Rome a narrow street, with a gate at either end, into which are crammed, every night, some seven or eight thousand human beings. They are here confined in this miserable street, to drive through which, in the day time, you are obliged to carry a perfume to keep you from fainting—they are confined here, and can come out only in the evening, when the gates are opened—at 8 o'clock in the summer and at 9 in the winter. And who are these people thus degraded and oppresed, almost under the shadow of the Vatican! They are Jews! and the Roman Catholic religion tolerates no religion but its own! If speaking thus seems to any like 'calumny,' let them wash their hands of these things. The Pope should be the champion of liberty throughout the world. Perhaps in a social system, we cannot well conceive of a greater stretch of difference than between a Sovereign on his throne, and the lackey waiting to do his master's bidding.

Rome, whose very foundations are honeycombed with the receptacles of the martyrs—Rome, where they teach you that they have the remains of Peter—courageous, generous, divinity, Peter—whose fault was only that he was too good! And, Sir, but a little while since, when there was danger in the horizon of Rome, the Sovereign Prince, the representative of the Apostles—does he stay to meet the shock! No; he puts on the livery of a servant, mounts on behind a family carriage, and flies like a lackey. [Laughter.] Yes, sir, he fled from the city of the martyrs! [Applause.] From the throne of the successor of the Apostles. Yes, the coward fled! [Applause.] Yes, Sir, and he whose voice had roared like a bull from the Vatican, was [illegible] complaining like a calf on the Moro di [illegible]! And this lackey, (the Madiai) a man paid so much a month to wait upon his master, and pay his bills and do his bidding—did he, when he saw the danger he was in, fly like the Pope? [Laugh[illegible] Sir; that superstition which has degra[illegible] the name of a Hildebrand has raised a lackey to a nobility infinitely higher than the Pope. Now, Sir, we call upon our Roman Catholic brethren to wipe off the sin from the escutcheon of their faith. I call upon them to appeal with us for the principle of religious liberty; and then, so far as as my voice is concerned, they shall [illegible] hear the reproach of persecution. But until then I cannot but believe that if they crontolled you, Mr. President, as they control the Duke of Tuscany, my head would not be worth a sixpence to-morrow. [Laughter.] And, Sir, much as I value my head, (for I could not well procure another,) I believe I should have the courage to lay my head upon the block, and have it chopped off, rather than that one hair of the head of a Papist in the City of New York should be touched on the principle of Religious Persecution. [Great applause.]

ROMISH SUPERSTITION.

The following paragraph from the N. Y. Freeman's Journal (Archibishop Hughes' organ) shows what the spread of Romanism in the United States is to be attributed to. Our readers will be instructed, of course, as well as suitably affected by the kindness of the worshipers of the "heavenly Esther," who will not cease to pray for their "unhappy brethren who either know nothing of her merits or insult her dignity."

"Our Lady of the Immaculate Conception. To-morrow (Sunday) is the day on which the festival of the Immaculate Conception of Our Lady will be solemnly celebrated throughout the American Church. It requires no great stretch of faith to trace to the influence of her powerful intercession the marked progress and prosperity of the Catholic Church in these United States, from that day when, by a solemn act of the Baltimore Council, ratified by the piety of the faithful, she was solemnly proclaimed the special patroness of our people. Since then more copious blessings have descended upon the Church; her tents have been widened, her domain increased and enriched. We cannot discern a tithe of what good has been vouchsafed to us through her intercession; much less can we learn the many evils and calamities which her motherly hand has averted. Let our homage, then, be mingled with gratitude; and whilst in her honor we mingle praises and prayer, let us also be mindful of those, our unhappy brethren, who either know nothing of her merits or insult her dignity. Blind and sinful as they may be, they form a part of "her people." It will be a noble and holy revenge to recommend them to her mercy. Nor can we doubt but this heavenly Esther will supplicate earnestly and incessantly on their behalf, and obtain efficaciously for many the grace of conversion. "Dona mihi populum meum, pro quo obsecro." Esther 7: 3.

PERSECUTION IN TURKEY.

Our readers are generally aware that, by a governmental decree, Protestants are guarantied the free exercise of their own religion in the Ottoman Empire. The following letter from Mr. Van Lennep, a missionary of the American Board, which we take from the last number of the Missionary Herald, shows that the era of persecution has not closed in Turkey, even in districts which are near the capital. Good intentions on the part of the government may be defeated and nullified by its own agents.

A very violent persecution has just broken out in Broosa, or rather at Demirdesh. That great enemy of the Protestants, Halil Pasha, was appointed Pasha or Governor of that district a short time since, and went there about three weeks ago. His arrival was hailed by the enemies of the gospel, and they prepared themselves for a contest. Halil Pasha refused at once to acknowledge the Protestants as a separate people; and when the Sultan's own firman was shown to him, he said that it was nothing to him, for he considered it applicable only to the capital. He refused to protect any of the Protestants, had his men hoot at them and call them by vile names when they came in sight, and said that if the head man of the Protestants should visit the palace, he would have him put in prison. With these encouragements the enemies of the Protestants began their work at Demirdesh.

As one of our Armenian brethren was going out of the village towards Broosa, a mob attacked him, pelted him with stones, and threw him into the river, where he would have been drowned, had not a Turk interfered. A Greek went up to one of our Greek seminary pupils, who was spending his vacation in his native village, and attempted to stab him with a knife which he held in his hand; but the young man parried the blow and escaped. The murderous assailant then accused the youth of having struck him; and he was lodged in prison, in spite of his protestations and the testimony to the contrary. Mr. Constantinides had been spending several weeks in the village, preaching the gospel, when an order was obtained for his expulsion. Armed men were sent to his house, who turned him into the street with his effects; and he owed his preservation and safe arrival here, under God, to his perseverance in making them responsible for consequences, and saying that he would not stir without a guard. As it was, his enemies endeavored to induce the guard to let them do to him what they pleased, but he refused. Accusations of an entirely groundless nature were laid against several other Protestants in Demirdesh. Guards were sent by night to their houses; and they were aroused from their sleep, severely beaten, bound, and thrown into prison. Those who remained fled immediately to the mountains, and subsequently crossed the plain through by-paths, and fled to the chapel house, where they now are.

In a letter of still more recent date, Mr. Van Lennep continues the history of the persecution as follows:—

After most of the events mentioned in my letter of October 14, the Pasha of Broosa sent an officer to Demirdesh to inquire respecting the violence done to the Protestants, and bring the offenders to justice. He went to the place of the gathering of the chief men of the village, and informed them of his errand. They then treated him to a good dinner, made him almost [illegible], and offered him money to give a sou[illegible] to each of the Protestants. [illegible]ht came, men were sent from house to [illegible] to apprehend them; and they were brought to the Turkish officer, stripped, thrown on their faces before him, and while the chief men themselves held their hands and feet, he struck them blow after blow on the bare flesh. He generally asked, before striking, "Are you a Protestant?" And when they made no reply, he struck, and went on, exclaiming at each blow, "This is for being a Protestant," or "Promise that you will be a Protestant no longer." They all witnessed a good confession, and declared their faith to the last. By the time several had undergone this ordeal, some of the others heard what was going on, and escaped to the mulberry fields. One man, the father of one of our oldest students, climbed up to the roof of his house, and hid himself under it upon a beam. When it was found that they were gone, the people turned out to search for them, on horseback and on foot, with lanterns, guns and pistols, as if they had been criminals escaped from justice. The brethren who had been beaten were put in irons; and the next morning the officer took them to the city. When near the Governor's palace, however, fear of the consequences seemed to flash into his mind, for he took off their chains. They then went in to the Council, and accused the officer. He at first denied it; but the bleeding wounds on their bodies were too strong an evidence of his guilt. He cast the blame on the chief men of the village. They were shut up in a room for two days, and then the Council ordered the Greek Bishop (by whose order all these things had probably been done) to excommunicate them! In fine, though the whole Council declared that the Protestants had been greatly maltreated and unjustly abused, yet they gave them no redress. There is no doubt that the Pasha himself is the cause of all this, for he is a bitter enemy of Protestants.

It is cheering, however, to know that the gospel is making progress in spite of all these efforts of the enemy to suppress it. Several of the people of Demirdesh have requested to have their names written down on the list of Protestants. One man who has long been on the list, but has been rather backward in asserting his adherence to the doctrines of the gospel, in distinction from the tenets of the Greek church, is now very bold.

REGENERATION.

ALMOND, Jan. 2, 1853.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

After hearing several discussions on the subject of Regeneration, I at length determined to request a statement of your views. Some hold to the opinion that it is a work which we bring about in ourselves; that is, when we resolve in our hearts to do the will of God, we are regenerate. Others believe that it is a work which God has to bring about in us.

It would give me pleasure to see a piece on this subject in the Recorder.

Yours, A. YOUNG TEACHER.

Reply.

"Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth." James 1: 18.

"Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." John 1: 13.

"But God—even when we were dead in sins—hath quickened us together with Christ," &c. Eph. 2: 5.

We cannot write any thing more to the point than these passages of Scripture.

LOTTERIES.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Does it conflict with the Word of God for a professed follower of Christ to engage in lotteries as allowed by the laws of the land?

INQUIRER.

Reply.

Certainly it does. The Word of God says, "Thou shalt not steal;" and any act, by which one possesses himself of another person's property without rendering him a fair equivalent for it, is stealing, no matter what sanction may be given to it by human legislation. One who buys a lottery ticket, does so hoping to secure a prize; should be drawn a blank instead, he has lost his money, and got nothing for it. A real Christian cannot engage in such things. He will never consent to grow rich at other people's expense. We trust that the censure implied in our correspondent's question, does not fall upon any of the readers of the Sabbath Recorder.

T. B. B.

DR. ACHILLI.—Referring to the celebrated Libel case of Drs. Achilli and Newman, and to the fact that when Dr. Newman came before the Court for sentence a few weeks ago, his counsel moved for and obtained a new trial, which of course will bring this celebrated case again to the attention of Christendom, the Watchman and Reflector aptly remarks:

If Dr. Achilli is an innocent man, then has the Romish Church, in the very center of its power and influence, been guilty of the foulest conspiracy to crush and destroy individual character, which has ever been recorded in the annals of jurisprudence. Its chief men in England, in the Italian cities, and even in the Vatican itself, have conjured up the vilest tissues of crimes never committed, and sustained them by perjury so wholesale and unblushing, as to be shocking beyond all precedent. This is one horn of the dilemma. If, on the other, Dr. Achilli is guilty, then has the Romish Church, according to its own showing, in the full knowledge of his crimes, and with only feeble and ineffective reprimands and penances, carried him along step by step in ecclesiastical promotions, to high dignities, and has never denounced him to the world till he has added heresy, and the abandonment of Rome, to his personal immoralities. It seems to us that under the evidence adduced, there is no escaping one or the other of these conclusions, and that the Romish Church suffers terribly under her own hands.

THREATENED FAMINE IN MADEIRA.—Recent accounts represent that fearful destitution prevails in the island of Madeira. The annual vintage, which has afforded for many years past an average of from twenty-five to thirty thousand pipes of wine, has this year been a failure. A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune says that there has not been produced this year one hundred pipes of saleable wine on the whole island. The wealthy curtail their expenses; those of sufficient means heretofore, practice a stringent economy; persons of more cramped resources sell day by day whatever ornaments they may have of better days, at ruinous prices, while the poorest classes fill the streets and beg. The most apalling famine threatens the population, unless relief is extended to them.

VISIT OF BOYS TO THE TRACT HOUSE.—About two hundred boys, attendants at the Sixth-street Boy's Meeting, visited the American Tract House a few days since, on the invitation of Rev. Mr. Cook, one of the Secretaries of the Society. This gentleman not long ago gave the boys an account of how the Child's Paper was made, and concluded by asking them to come and see for themselves the operations of the Tract House. A sight at the boys was quite as curious to grown persons as a sight at the printing was to the boys. The exclamations of surprise and delight, the inquiring looks, and the droll speeches of one and another as they passed through the press-rooms, binders' rooms, the folding-rooms, the stores of stereotypes and other portions of the building, were curious enough. After going up and down stairs, through all the immense establishment, they were collected in the square court-yard of the establishment, where they joined in singing the childrens' hymn, "There is a Happy Land," with the excellent Police Captain of one of the up-town Wards as chorister. From the four walls of the building which surround this court-yard, the numerous operatives of the establishment, men and girls, looked down upon the motley crowd below, some of them joining in responses with the shrill sounds which arose from these untrained boys. After singing, each boy received a copy of the good old "Divine Songs" of Dr. Watts, and also another book, and the company separated, the boys delighted and instructed by what they had seen, and their friends rewarded for their efforts by the good behavior and evident gratitude of these interesting visitors.

WICLIF'S DEATH.—Four hundred and sixty-eight years ago, last Friday, that day being the 31st day of December, John de Wiclif died of paralysis, in Lutterworth, England, not far distant from Leicester, near the center of the realm, where Richard III. armed himself for the battle of Bosworth—where Cardinal Wolsey breathed out his troubled spirit—where Anne Boleyn headed Protestantism, and where John Bunyan often preached. Wiclif was born on the banks of the Tees, in Yorkshire, A. D. 1345, and became pastor at Lutterworth in 1375. He died December 31, 1384, at the age of sixty-nine years. Forty-three years after his death, the Council of Constance concluded that the rector of that parish had lived and died an obstinate heretic; —decreed that his body should be disinterred, and thrown upon a dung-hill. Thirteen years after the decree was voted, Wiclif was exhumed—his bones burned to ashes, which were cast into the river Swift, which runs along not far from the church where he ministered. "Then the brook," says Fuller, "conveyed his ashes into Avon; Avon into Severn; Severn into the narrow seas; they into the ocean. And thus the ashes of Wiclif are the emblem of his doctrine, which was dispersed the world over."

"SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES."—The following extract from The New Orleans Picayune of 16th August, 1841, shows that the Grand Duchy of Tuscany is not the only Christian country in which the laws interpose obstacles to the possessing and reading the Holy Scriptures. The incident, however, took place upwards of eleven years ago; if the people of Louisiana have become more enlightened and tolerant since that time, we should be glad to know it.

"Chauncey B. Blake was brought before Recorder Baldwin, charged with tampering with slaves. It was proved that he was seen conversing with a number of them in the street; that he asked them if they could read and write, and if they would like to have a Bible. This was the amount of the testimony against him. In palliation of his conduct, it was shown that he was a regular appointed agent of the Bible Society in New Orleans, to distribute the Bible to such as would accept it. The Society, however, disclaimed having the most distant intention of giving the Scriptures to Slaves, and it was said Blake had exceeded his commission in offering it. But, as it appeared to be a misunderstanding on his part, and not intentional interference, he was discharged with a caution, not to repeat his offense."

ROMISH PRIESTS IN ENGLAND.—A correspondent of the London Record writes as follows:—

"On leaving the chancel of the cathedral of ——, after the services of the day, I observed a Romish priest in the costume of his order in the nave. After leaving the chapter-room, I still found him in the same position; and going up, I civilly reminded him that his appearing in that dress was contrary to the laws of this country. He contemptuously disowned any respect for our laws. I reminded him of the Queen's proclamation. He snapped his fingers, and said he did not care for the Queen's proclamation. After much insolent and abusive language, charging me with being no gentleman, &c., &c., reminding me that I ought to have informed myself first whether he was subject to the laws of this country or not, before I accused him of breaking them; and yet he boasted of being an English priest —I asked what he meant? He said he was a priest of the English Church. Being requested to explain this assertion, he merely reiterated, with much emphasis, I am a priest of the Church of England. I urged again an explanation, but without effect, till I said, Not of the Protestant Church of England? He replied, No, with great energy, and turned away. I was afterwards told this individual was a prevert from the University of Oxford."

"THY NEIGHBOR."—Will Bro. Brown please give his opinion on what our Saviour meant by the term "Neighbor" in Luke 10: 27?

P.

The Pharisees restricted the term to those of their own nation; but the word is almost invariably used in the Scriptures in the sense of fellow creature—one connected with us by the common bonds of humanity.

T. B. B.

An attempt was recently made by two Mormon preachers to introduce their religion into Norway. The magistrate gave them notice that as they belonged to no sect of Christians acknowledged by the government, they would not be allowed either to hold public worship or to baptize. [illegible] they paid no attention to the warning, [illegible] were arrested, and taken to the jail.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JAN. 3.

In the Senate, the question of a national compensation to the family of Dr. Wells for his discovery of the use of ether as an aesthetic agent was debated and laid on the table. Mr. Cass presented a memorial from the Maryland Baptist Union, asking the interposition of the Government to secure religious liberty for American citizens temporarily residing in foreign countries. Mr. Cass made a speech in support of the memorial. Mr. Hale approved of the objects of the memorial, but feared the effect of advocating a 'higher law' than the Governments of Europe see fit to adopt in regard to matters of conscience. It might reöpen the agitating questions which had been so happily settled by the Fugitive Slave Law and the Baltimore Platforms. The resolutions of Mr. Mason, calling on the President for information in regard to Cuba, were adopted. Several private and unimportant bills were passed.

In the House, Mr. Venable made a speech in opposition to the annexation of Cuba, whether by violence or negotiation. Mr. Stephens was equally opposed to violence in the premises, but would not say absolutely that he would resist annexation under all circumstances. The House passed the bill for payment of Navy and Invalid pensions, and adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, JAN. 4.

The Senate adopted a resolution to continue the employment of a clerk to the President of the Senate; also a resolution calling for the report of the Board of officers appointed to examine the various projects for an enlarged Canal at the Falls of the Ohio. Mr. Cass introduced resolutions in regard to European Colonization on this Continent. A bill appropriating $19,500 to discharge the judgment obtained against Col. Fremont in England, for liabilities incurred in California, while acting in a military capacity in the service of the U. S., was passed. A bill granting pensions to the widows of the soldiers of the War of 1812, was also passed. Mr. Hale's resolution, calling for information as to the conduct of Com. Morgan while in the Mediterranean, was taken up and discussed at some length by Messrs. Hale, Shields, Macon and others.

The House took up the Military Academy bill in Committee of the Whole, and Mr. Polk made a speech on the subject of Cuba and in reply to Mr. Venable. Mr. Carter opposed the Lieutenant-General project, and Mr. Gorman favored it—when the committee rose and the House passed the Military Academy bill and adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, JAN. 5.

In the Senate, a message was received from the President in reply to Mr. Mason's resolution, and inclosing the correspondence relative to the Tripartite Treaty respecting Cuba. The Senate adopted a resolution allowing mileage and pay, as a Senator from Kentucky, to Mr. Merriwether, up to the time when Mr. Dixon was admitted to his seat. The bill providing for a retired list of army officers was so amended as to provide for a retired list for the navy and marine corps, and then postponed. A resolution ordering the purchase of 10,000 copies of Hickey's edition of the Constitution of the United States was adopted, and the Senate, finding itself without a quorum, adjourned.

The House granted a pension to the widow of Gen. Worth and then went into Committee on the Deficiency bill. The bill for the relief or sundry railroads by extending, for four years, the time for payment of duties on Railroad Iron, was called up, and an amendment was proposed to include all other railroads. The question was taken on this, and decided affirmatively: Yeas, 74; Nays, 73. The Speaker laid before the House several communications from the Treasury Department in regard to estimates, and the House adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, JAN. 6.

In the Senate, the consideration of Gen. Cass' Menroo 'Doctrine' resolutions was fixed for Wednesday of next week. Mr. Mason gave notice that Wednesday he would move to refer the President's Message in relation to the Tripartite Treaty to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The bill granting extra pay to the workmen on the Capitol was rejected. The bill to provide for a retired list of Army Officers was taken up, and the provision for a retired list for the Navy and Marine corps was striken out. Mr. Mason submitted a resolution calling for correspondence between the American Minister in Paris and the State Department in regard to the Revolution in France of December, 1851. Mr. Houston's Select Committee to inquire into the subject of bribery and fraud in the prosecution of claims against the Government, was revived. Mr. Brooks offered a resolution asking the President to communicate his reasons for dismissing Marcoletta, and the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the Select Committee appointed at the last session to examine into the charges against Secretary Corwin in connection with the Gardiner claim, reported yesterday through Preston King. Mr. K. accompanied his report with a bill to prevent fraud on the Treasury. The House went into Committee on the Deficiency bill, and Mr. Marshall, of California, and Mr. Howard, of Texas, made Flibusterian speeches.

SIXTH-DAY, JAN. 7.

The Senate was not in session.

The House passed thirty-four private bills, including one to relinquish to Ohio the unfinished portion of the Cumberland Road in that State. Adjourned till Second-day.

California News.

By the arrival of the steamship Northern Light at New York, Jan. 9, we have two weeks later news from California.

A disastrous fire has occurred in Shasta, destroying property to the amount of $100,000. Great damage has been caused in the mining regions by extensive freshets.

Honolulu dates are to the 10th November, and give the particulars of a serious riot, occasioned by American sailors, and before it was quelled the station-house and Harbor Master's office were burned down.

The whale ship Bramin, of New Bedford, was lost in the Artic Ocean, on the 25th Sept., with a cargo of 1,500 barrels of oil. Her officers and crew were saved.

Schooner Mary Howard, of Somerset, Mass., Capt. H. Peterson, left San Juan Nov. 28, with about twenty passengers for New orleans. On 6th Dec., struck on the Quita Sueno Bank, about 190 miles from the main land, where, by means of a small boat and a catamaran, the crew and passengers arrived on the 14th. Most of the passengers and crew having arrived at San Juan, a portion of them left on 31st ult., per steamship Daniel Webster, which arrived at New Orleans on the 7th inst. Captain, mate, and others of the crew returned by steamship Northern Light to New York.

European News.

The steamship America, with one week's later intelligence from all parts of Europe, arrived at Halifax, Jan. 9.

In England, the Derby Ministry has formally resigned, and a new one is in formation, headed by Lord Aberdeen.

The Limerick Chronicle understands that Mr. Russel, M. P. for that city, is forming a company, with a prospect of success, for a line of steamers between Limerick and America.

The steamer Oronoco had arrived at Southampton with the South American mails. Several passengers had died of fever, and the ship was in quarantine. The Oronoco reports thirty deaths from fever on board British ship-of-war Dauntless, and there was much sickness generally at Jamaica and St. Thomas.

Australian dates are received to the 29th September from Sydney, which had been declared a free port. The Sydney gold fields were productive.

The news from Paris relates solely to the Emperor's movements. It is believed to be true that overtures of conciliation had been made by the chiefs of the Moderate Republican or Cavaignac party, but they were firmly declined.

Abd-el-Kader sailed Dec. 21 from Marseilles, on board steam frigate Labrador, for Turkey.

The modifications of the Constitution of France are officially published. The Emperor is to grant all amnesties, make treaties, and order the public works. The Ministry is to vote on the Budget. Prince Jerome is to be heir presumptive.

The Emperor of Austria is visiting the King of Prussia at Berlin. The King of Hanover and some small potentates are also there, and great festivities are going on.

Melancholy Shipwreck—Loss of Fifteen Lives.

Capt. Setzer, of ship Annawan, from New Orleans, which arrived at Boston, Jan. 4, states that on 31st of Dec., at 4 P. M., when in lat. 40 25, lon. 71, he fell in with a boat containing a portion of the crew of ship Amulet, of and for Boston, 59 days from Cette, France, which vessel had sprung a leak and sunk, and fifteen of her crew perished in the ill-fated ship! The following are the names of the officers of the vessel, who alone were saved and picked up in the boat: Paul Howes, master; Thos. S. Howes, first mate; Robert B. Folk, second mate; John Williams, third mate. The survivors were in the boat thirty-six hours before they were picked up.

Capt. Howes, the commander of the Amulet, says that the ship had sprung a leak during a heavy northwest gale on the 28th of December. She commenced leaking at midnight, and as the water continued to increase so rapidly that all the pumps of the ship, well manned, could not free her, or prevent her sinking, he gave orders to the crew to save themselves by the boats, and abandon the ship. The captain and his officers took the quarter boat, and succeeded in clearing the ship without damage; but the crew were not so fortunate in their efforts to save themselves. The only two remaining boats were both swamped and stove to pieces, while being got over the side of the vessel, and at six o'clock in the morning the ship went down with all who remained on board, numbering fifteen persons.

The following is a list of those lost: Stephen Miller, John Powers, James McLane, Wm. North, Jesse Marie, Thomas Cuban, Robert Perkins, John Marshall, Thomas Fanning, William West, and John West, seamen; John Constable, steward; John Kenney, cook; and two others, names unknown, who had secreted themselves on board at Cette.

The Amulet was an old ship, and is probably insured in Boston for her full value. She had a cargo of salt consigned to a house in Boston.

Awful Explosion of Powder Mills.

On the morning of the 7th of January inst., the village of Acton, Mass., the next town west of Concord, Middlesex County, was the scene of a terrible explosion, an accident of this awful description having occurred at what are usually called Pratt's Powder Mills, in that place. The explosion, which, at the distance of at least four miles, resembled the discharge of several pieces of large artillery, or of the fall of some vast body to the earth, or the shock of an earthquake, occurred at about a quarter before 10 A. M.

Pratt's Powder Mills are situated near the Assabett, the North Branch of the Concord River, on a canal. The powder is manufactured in several buildings, situated, unfortunately, at a small distance from each other, with the exception of the drying-house, in which is kept the only fire on the immediate premises, it is placed at a greater interval than the rest from each other. This, however, is not more than ten or a dozen rods off.

Some workmen in the kernel-house—the fifth building from the main road and from the dwelling-house—were employed in work upon a cylinder, when, doubtless [for no one is left to tell the tale] a spark from the chisel falling upon the combustible material, an awful explosion took place, instantly killing the men, whose names were Hudson, Balcombe, and Hanscom, two of whom were married and leave families. The kernel-house is usually considered the most dangerous of the several houses, and it contained, at this time, as commonly, a considerable amount of powder. The occurrence of this tragedy was, of course, instantaneous, and its consequences quite inconceivable to those who have never witnessed a scene of this description.

The bodies of the unfortunate workmen were driven into the air, and there being trees near, their clothing was in great part torn from them, and hung in shreds in the branches. The appearance of these men, a few moments before strong and active, now completely mangled, burned, blackened, and otherwise awfully disfigured, cannot be imagined. Next to the kernel-house was on the west side a mixing-house, and this quite near; the explosive force forming a vacuum, the sides of the mixing-house from the pressure of the air inside were instantly driven out, and the atmosphere, full of fire and cinders, entering at an interval of some three or four seconds, as it is said, this house also exploded. The press-house (as it is called) is placed further off from the kernel-house than the last named, towards the east, and this distance doubtless saved the powder in it from exploding, though the boarding is mostly forced from its sides, and it is in fact a nearly complete wreck.

Of the kernel-house, it may be said, it is swept absolutely clean off from its very foundation; the water-dam, timbers, and all the machinery scattered to the four quarters of heaven. The mixing-house is not so utterly and entirely dispersed, but its timber and machinery (or what is left of it) lies a heap of smoking and blackened ruins.

This is the third frightful catastrophe connected with these same powder mills. At the last blow-up, some ten years since, four persons were killed, the explosion originating in the same house.

Erection of the Jackson Statue.—An equestrian statue of Gen. Jackson has just been erected in Lafayette Square, in the city of Washington. The ceremonies came off on Sabbath, the anniversary of the victory at New Orleans. An imposing military and civic procession was had, and in the square was congregated a vast multitude of citizens and strangers, variously estimated at from ten to twenty thousand; while at the windows, and upon the balconies and house-tops of the dwellings around, were numerous groups of spectators.

The orator, (Hon. S. A. Douglas,) in an allusion to the statue, remarked that it was the products of the genius of Clark Mills, who had never even seen a statue of the kind before. The statues of Peter the Great and the Duke of Wellington presented no such admirable arrangement, the horses being maintained in rampant attitudes by being bolted to their pedestals at the tail, whereas this was self-poised.

After the oration, Clark Mills was introduced, and received with much cheering. He waved his hand to his assistants, and instantly the veil parted, full, and disclosed to the view of admiring multitudes the magnificent bronze statue.

The artist uttered no words; the statue spoke for him, and amid the most enthusiastic cheering he bowed and retired.

The far North-West.—the Lake Superior Journal of November 3d says: Rev. Peter Jacobs, Obijah missionary, returned to this place yesterday on his way to Toronto, from York Factory, situated on Hudson's Bay, a short distance this side of the North Pole. He came to the Saut on his way to that place on the first boat last spring, and since that time, with the exception of about two weeks spent at the Bay, he has been traveling to and from that truly hyperborean region. During this period of about six months he has traversed the vast extent of country between Lake Superior and Hudson's Bay, a journey, going and coming, of not less than four thousand miles, in bark canoes, on foot, and in small vessels. This route lies by the way of the Red River of the North, Lake Winnipeg, Lake of the Woods, and other small lakes in that region; where there was water he traveled in his canoe, where there was none, his canoe was carried over portages on the shoulders of his voyageurs. On his return, in passing across Lake Winnipeg, he had the misfortune to be shipwrecked in his frail birchen vessel, and of losing five hundred dollars in specie, with all his clothes, equipment, and valuables, his men and himself escaping with their lives.

The New French Empire.—A foreign correspondent of the New York Spectator describes the new empire in France as signalizing its beginning with great pomp and extravagance. We clip from his letter the following:—

The luxury and expenditure of the present Government exceed those of any previous Court of France. The coronation robes have cost eight millions of francs, $1,600,000; they are in fact stiff with jewelry of the highest price. Neither the day for the consecration, the betrothal, nor the marriage is yet positively fixed, unless we are to believe the rumor that a letter has been received during the week from Rome, in which the Pope consents to crown the Emperor at Notre Dame, on the 30th of May.

I have not yet learned positively the amount of the civil list of the Emperor, or the salaries titles, and dignities to be conferred upon the members of his family. The general idea is that Louis Napoleon will have twenty-five millions a year, and that the family will also be provided for. Jerome Bonaparte is to inhabit the Palais Royal, which has not been a royal residence for twenty-five years.

Suicide.—Another melancholy instance of mental derangement, resulting in suicide, brought on by the "Spirit Rappings," occurred in this city last week. A man named Matthew Langdon, a printer by trade, had been in constant attendance for the past ten months upon persons professing to have communication with the spirits of the departed, creating such excitement as to cause a complete prostration of his reason. He had lost a daughter, about ten months ago, under peculiarly trying circumstances, and being told by the believers in Spiritual Manifestations that, by pursuing a certain course which they prescribed, he might become a seeing medium, and see his child, he was induced to make the effort. In a fit of despondency, he inflicted a wound in his throat with a knife, which, together with exhaustion, caused his death. The Coroner's Jury reccommend the Grand Jury to take measures for the suppression of circle meetings at the houses named in the testimony.

Upwards of sixty believers, writes Mr. Oncken, have been added to the Hamburg church during the past year. The cause is likewise on the advance in Oldenburg. The Baptist chapel at Felde has been "much improved in appearance." In Elberfeld, many are becoming convinced of the unscriptural character of infant sprinkling. Mr. Oncken states that two religious leaders there had already baptized more than two hundred and fifty individuals, "but for want of knowledge, in a very irregular and unscriptural manner."

Railroad Accident—Gen. Pierce's son Killed.—A terrible railroad accident occurred near Andover, Mass., on Thursday, the 5th inst., resulting in the instant death of the only son of the President elect, and serious injury to several other persons. Owing to the breaking of a wheel, the car was thrown off the track, down an embankment of twenty feet, and landing upon a pile of rocks, was knocked into fragments. Mrs. Pierce and the deceased son had been absent four weeks on a visit to relatives in Boston and Andover. Gen. Pierce went to Boston on Tuesday morning, and with them attended the funeral of Mrs. Pierce's uncle, Hon. Amos Lawrence, on the same afternoon. They remained at Mr. Aiken's in Andover, whose lady is a sister of Mrs. Pierce, and were expecting to return in the evening. The train in which they went left Boston at noon, and the accident happened just after it left the Andover depot, at about one. They had not been in the cars five minutes.

A Dinner without regard to Expense.—We learn, from the Lowell Courier, that the delegation from the city government of Boston, who visited Gen. Pierce, at Concord, a few days since, gave him a dinner at Eagle Hotel. Maj. Gibson had been notified by the Boston committee a few days previous to get up a dinner in the best style he could for eight or ten, without regard to the expense. As the city of Boston was to foot the bill, he furnished every luxury that could be obtained. $75 were spent in boquets of flowers alone. The bill of fare provided for each one was elaborately adorned and printed on very nice satin, and cost two dollars each. The bill for the whole dinner amounted to four hundred dollars, or fifty dollars apiece, and this is said to be exclusive of the wines used on the occasion, which probably amounted to fifty or a hundred dollars more.

SUMMARY.

A Mrs Harvey, of Solon, as we learn from the Courtland Whig, had occasion to go into the yard in front of her house, late in the evening, and being absent some length of time her husband became alarmed, and went out to ascertain the cause of her delay. On reaching the back part of the yard he heard a faint cry and tramping of feet, and immediately started in the direction of the noise, when he saw two men carrying off Mrs. H. The wretches, on seeing the approach of Mr. Harvey, laid down their prize and escaped. The woman was found gagged, and, from the fright caused by the attempt to abduct her, she became deranged, and in that condition fled from her home a few days after, and put an end to her existence by hanging herself. The motives of the scoundrels remain an impenetrable mystery.

While one of the carriers of the Cincinnati Enquirer was serving his papers to his subscribers on the 1st of January, he was caught by two men as he was crossing a bridge over the White Water Canal, at the foot of Fifth-st., and thrown in the canal. It was dark, and they came upon him so suddenly, that he could not defend himself. Fortunately for him, he could swim, and he succeeded in getting out of the water. The men ran off as soon as they had committed the outrage, not caring, of course, whether their victim would drown or not.

Robert Smith, an Irishman, belonging in Quincy, Mass., was fatally injured on the Old Colony Railroad near Neponset, on Thursday last. He stepped from one track to the other to avoid an inward gravel train, when he was run over by the outward Plymouth train. He was very badly mangled, but lived for two or three hours after being carried to Quincy. His age was about 25, and he left no family.

A dispatch dated Binghampton, Monday, Jan. 3, says: The mail train bound east on the Erie line last night, ran off the track near this place, in consequence of the culpable neglect of the switchman. The engine and cars went through the bridge over the plank road just west of the Chenango River. The fireman was killed and the engineer badly scalded, but no passengers were seriously injured. The negligent switchman has absconded.

The steamer Palmetto, arrived at Baltimore from Charleston, came in collision Sunday night, Jan. 2, in the Chesapeake, with the Brig Ohio, from Baltimore for Mobile. The Ohio sunk almost immediately, but all on board were saved except a young child. The Ohio belonged to Barling, Kibby & Co., and was insured for $10,000. The Palmetto was considerably damaged.

A dispatch dated New Orleans, Tuesday, Jan. 4, says: The steamer A. Fusileer, for Attakapas, on Monday, when near Ship Island, exploded both boilers, killing the first mate, second engineer and five or six deck hands. The captain was terribly wounded, and probably will not recover. The steamer Texas, from Galveston, brought the survivors to this city.

The schr. Drigo, of Franklin, Me., from Jacksonville for Boston, with a cargo of ship timber, in beating in the harbor of Newport on Tuesday morning, Jan. 4, during the violent gale, went ashore on the beach between Castle Hill and Fort Adas. The Captain and crew were saved. Wednesday morning she had three feet of water in her hold, and it is supposed she will be a total loss.

The Petersburg Intelligencer states, "upon authority not to be questioned, that the schooner Advance, which was captured at Port Praya (the Azore Islands) by the U. S. sloop-of-war Germantown, and which has just been sent to Norfolk for adjudication, was manned with a crew of free blacks, and was actually fitted in the goodly port of New York."

The San Luis and Potosi (Mexico) papers contain an advertisement signed by Henry May, offering a reward of $500 to any one that will give exact information as to the whereabouts of a silver mine in Rio Verde owned by Dr. Gardiner, and $500 more to any one that will show in the same district a quicksilver mine pretended to be owned by Dr. Mears.

The largest library in the United States is that of Harvard University, numbering in all about 92,000 volumes. Next to it ranks the Philadelphia Library, founded by Benjamin Franklin, and numbering 60,000 vols.

Intelligence of the death of Hon. Thos. J. Marvin, of Saratoga Springs, at Havana, on the 29th December, was received by the last arrival from the Island.

A new locomotive is in course of construction in England, on a novel principle, not disclosed. A trial experiment of one of these engines, is said to establish the principle, Within 45 minutes after the fire was lighted, there was a pressure of steam in the boilers equal 100 lbs. on the inch. The power of this engines when running at high velocity is calculated at not less than 650 horses, and it will attain a long sustained speed of 70 miles an hour!

At Jamaica Plain, on Tuesday morning, four burglars entered the house of Col. Fessenden, by opening a window. They tied his son, considerably injured Col. F. in a scuffle, he being in his night clothes, presented pistols to him and his wife and daughters, and carried off property to the amount of about $150.

Brig Rival, captain Adams, of Plymouth, Mass., from St. Jago de Cuba for Boston, arrived at Norfolk on the 26th Dec., all hands sick and nearly helpless. One seamen named Asaph S. Crowly, of Patterson, Me., died on the 12th off Nicholas Mole. The schooner had lost her jib-boom and flying jib.

The brig John Marshall, of Pittston, went ashore in the gale of Jan. 4, on Long Beach, and will have to discharge her cargo to get off. A schooner from Rockland for New York, with lime, also went ashore at the same place. All hands were saved. The vessel is on fire.

A new Cotton Mill in Burrellville, belonging to Anthony Steere and operated by S. & B. Mory, the owners of the machinery, was destroyed by fire on the night of Jan. 4. It was valued at $35,000. Insured in this city for $24,000.

Among the bequests made in the will of the late John C. Vowell, Esq., of Alexandria, Va., is said to be one of $1,000 to the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of that place, and another of $2,000 for the benefit of that church.

Capt. Anderson, of the ship Vaucluse, was lost overboard on the night of the 28th Nov., off Ortugal. The Vaucluse was from Havre, and arrived at New Orleans on the 30th Dec., in charge of Mr. Howett, first officer of the ship.

The emigration to Western Texas is immense at the present time. Not less than five hundred Germans have passed through New Braunfels within the past week or two. San Antonio is now filled with emigrant strangers in pursuit of locations.

The French government has absolutely prohibited the circulation of the Breton Bible by gift, sale, loan or otherwise. By this decree the People of Brittany are deprived of the Scriptures in their own tongue, and are not likely to read it in any other.

A Baptist church, consisting of colored persons, was recognized at San Francisco, California, on the 11th of October last. Sermon by B. Brierly; charge and hand of fellowship by Wm. Rollinson.

Commodore Morgan died of gout in the spine at Washington, Wednesday, Jan. 5. He was buried with naval honors on Thursday.

James Gillespie has been sentenced to forty years imprisonment in the Penitentiary, for the murder of Wm. Smith, in Cass County, Mo.

Rev. Oren Sikes, of Bedford, Mass., suddenly expired on the 16th ult., aged 47 years. He had been unwell a few days, but was supposed, a few minutes before his death, to be improving.

Governor Hunt has commuted the punishment of James Doyle, sentenced for execution for the murder of Mrs. Connery, in Pearl-st., N. Y., to imprisonment at Sing Sing for life.

MARRIED,

In Watson, N. Y., Dec. 30, 1852, by Eld. E. Robinson, Mr. Joseph F. Stillman, to Miss Susan S. Pierson, both of Watson.

At Milton, Wis., Dec. 22d, 1852, by H. G. Greenman, Esq., Mr. Charles K. Ingals to Miss Caroline Sheldon, both of Lafayette, Walworth Co., Wis.

In DeRuyter, N. Y., on the 11th of December, 1852, by R. G. Burdick, Mr. Schuyler Olin, of Lincklaen, to Miss Amanda Stillman, of DeRuyter.

DIED,

In Truxton, N. Y., Jan. 1st, Elias Irish, in the 71st year of his age. The subject of this notice in early life embraced the Sabbath and united with the church in Hopkinton, R. I. In 1815 he removed to the place of his late residence, and subsequently united with the church there. At times he seemed to enjoy much of the love of God, but at others he allowed his mind to be disquieted by the aberrations of his brethren. The impropriety of this fruit of a sentiment, so common in many of our churches, he saw and deprecated in the strongest terms during his last illness, and died in the assurance of peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ. J. R. I.

In Williamsburgh, L. I., Jan. 7th. Willie M., infant son of Benedict W. and Ann M. Rogers, aged 4 months and 19 days.

Central Railroad Company of New Jersey.

NEW YORK TO EASTON, PA. Fare, $1 75.—Fall Arrangement, commencing November 15, 1852. Leave Pier No. 1 North River daily, for Easton and intermediate places, at 8 A. M., 12 M., and 3.45 P. M., and for Somerville at 4.45 P. M. Returning, eave Phillipsburg at 6 and 9 A. M., and 3.15 P. M.

New York and Erie Railroad.

TRAINS leave pier foot of Duane-st., New York, as follows:

Express Train at 8 A.M. for Dunkirk, connecting with first-class steamboats for Cleveland, Sandusky, Toledo, and Monroe, and railroads to Cincinnati and Chicago.

Mail Train at 8 A.M. for all stations.

Way Train at 3½ P.M., via Piermont, for Delaware.

Night Express Train at 5 P.M. for Dunkirk, connecting with first-class steamboat for Detroit direct, connecting with Express Train for Chicago.

Emigrant Train at 5 P.M., via Piermont.

Light.

THE subscribers invite the attention of all persons who desire a cheap, brilliant, and safe light, to their Safety Phosgene Lamps and materials for burning.

They are also manufacturers of Burning Fluid and Camphene, together with the various kinds of Lamps, all of which they offer, wholesale and retail, on the best terms.

Call and see, at 117 Fulton-street.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses, Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

An Edition for the Million.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN FOR 37½ CENTS!—We have yielded to the repeated and urgent solicitations of numerous friends of humanity, and now offer to them, and to the public generally—TO THE LIVING MASSES—an edition of Mrs. Stowe's unrivaled work, at a price so low as to bring it within the means of every person. It seems a work of supererogation to speak in complimentary terms of a book,

ONE MILLION COPIES OF WHICH

have been printed, in this country and in Europe, in a little more than six months—a sale which has no counterpart in the world's history. Yet, notwithstanding this immense sale, there are hundreds of thousands in our own country, who have not yet perused the glowing pages of UNCLE TOM'S CABIN, many of whom have been prevented from doing so, from inability to purchase. To remove this obstacle, we have issued this edition

☞ FOR THE MILLION. ☜

And millions will now read it, and own it, and drink in its heavenly principles, and the living generations of men will imbibe its noble sentiments, and generations yet unborn will rise up and bless its author, and thank the God of Heaven for inspiring a noble woman to utter such glowing, burning truths, for the redemption of the oppressed millions of our race.

To Booksellers, Philanthropists, or Societies, who wish to purchase the above by the thousand, for sale or distribution, a liberal discount will be made. The edition is very neatly printed, in a large octavo pamphlet of 166 pages, double columns, thick paper covers, and firmly stitched. We now offer to the public the following editions:

	Retail.
Uncle Tom's Cabin. Edition for the Million,	$0 37½
Uncle Tom's Cabin in German, (in press, to be published about the 1st of January, 1853,)	0 50

Magnificent New Illustrated Works.

ALEXANDER MONTGOMERY, No. 17 Spruce-st., New York, has now in press, and will issue 1st of January, 1853, three of the most superb works of the class which have ever appeared in any country.

THE ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE OF ART.—In monthly parts. Price 25 cents each.

Every arrangement has been made to produce a work of unparalleled magnificence, regardless of cost. The first literary and artistic talent in America and Europe has been engaged upon its various departments. In addition to highly-finished engravings, from the choicest works of the most eminent Painters, it will include a Gallery of Portraits of the most distinguished Men and Women of all countries, with accompanying memoirs, collected from authentic sources; scenes from remarkable passages in history; choice specimens in Architecture and ornamental design; illustrated descriptions of manufacturing processes; objects of curiosity, &c.; forming altogether a work of surpassing beauty and interest.

THE HISTORY OF THE PAINTERS OF ALL NATIONS.—In monthly parts. Price 50 cents each.

The leading feature of this work will be combining specimens of the most celebrated pictures of each great master, with his portrait, and such particulars of his life and works as will be of equal interest to the Student or Professor, and to the public generally.

CASSEL'S NATURAL HISTORY will appear in monthly parts. Price 25 cents each.

Each number of this beautiful work will be embellished with four splendid engravings, printed separately on plate paper, and about thirty engravings incorporated in the letter-press. It will present a full account of all that is known as to the animals at present inhabiting the earth, with the results of the researches of the most distinguished Naturalists on fossil remains, each division of the animal kingdom in the order laid down by Cuvier, and followed by the most eminent Naturalists of the present day.

Terms for the above Publications.

Magazine of Art.—Three Dollars per annum, or 25 cents each number.

History of Painters.—Six Dollars per annum, or 50 cent each number.

Natural History.—Three Dollars per annum, or 25 cents each number.

The above will be sent postage FREE to any part of the Union, if paid in advance for 12 months. Clubs of two or more supplied on liberal terms.

Agents wanted in every town throughout the Union. Any person receiving the first number, and canvassing with the same, will be certain of securing a large number of subscribers. No just conception can be formed of the elegance and beauty of these works from merely reading a printed prospectus.

All communications to be addressed to

Miscellaneous.

A Cottager's Lament.

An English laborer, whose child was suddenly killed by the falling of a beam, wrote the following lines, suggested by the melancholy event.

Sweet laughing child!—the cottage door
Stands free and open now,
But oh, its sunshine gilds no more
The gladness of thy brow!
Thy merry step hath passed away;
Thy laughing sport is hushed for ay.

Thy mother by the fireside sits,
And listens for thy call,
And slowly—slowly as she knits,
Her quiet tears downfall;
Her little hindering thing is gone;
And undisturbed she may work on.

A Chinese State Dinner.

The following extract from a letter furnishes a spirited description of an entertainment given in China to an official agent of our government, in a high capacity, by the Governor, Keying, a few years since:—

"The Governor led the way down stairs into a large room on the ground floor, where a table was arranged for dinner. The room, which was the principal one in the house, was a sort of hall, divided into two parts by a row of pillars running across it, and of great height. The division in which we dined was rather narrow, and about large enough to hold the table, with a reasonable latitude for attendance around it. The other division was much larger, contained a good deal of furniture, and had several elegant lanterns suspended from the ceiling. The table was a parallelogram, with rounded ends, and large enough to hold about twenty persons, which was, I think, the number of the party. On one side were two rather long arm-chairs, with seats of red cloth, each large enough to hold two persons. The Governor placed me on one of these and then seated himself on the other, at my right hand; thus giving me the left, which is here the seat of honor. We sat side by side, each of us having a vacant seat between him and the next guest. The rest of the company sat on common chairs. The party consisted, on our side, of the ten persons mentioned above. Among the Chinese were Punting-Kwa, the owner of the house; Jung-Lean; Chou-Chang-Ling, a member of the Hamlin College, or Privy Council, at Peking, and one of the Governor's principal assistants here; She, the mandarin who met us on the way; and three or four others, whose names I did not learn. The space around the table was crowded with attendants. Two Chinese linguists stood behind the Governor and myself for the purpose of interpreting between us; but as they understood only the Canton English, they made but bungling work of it, and I was obliged to rely mainly upon Dr. Parker.

"The table had no ornaments in the way of flowers or plateau. It was laid with porcelain plates, and a knife, fork, and pair of ivoy chop-sticks at each. Upon trying these, I found that I could use them with more convenience than I should have supposed, in conveying to my mouth the contents of the Chinese dishes, which are all either soups, stews, or meats minced into small pieces. The middle of the table was occupied by a course of fruits, contained in twenty or thirty small dishes. It is usual to begin with these; and the first thing the Governor did after we were seated, was to place upon my plate a pear and a carambolo. This is a large fruit, of the size of a pear, much liked by the Chinese, and which has something of the freshness and flavor of a juicy apple. After the fruit was removed, a series of dishes came on, to the number, I should think, of at least fifty, all served in porcelain bowls, holding about a pint each, one of which was placed before each person. It was, of course, impossible even to taste a tenth part of these; and unfortunately I had but too good an excuse for not eating and drinking, in the state of my health. Soon after we took our seats, I explained to the Governor, through Dr. Parker, that I was under medical treatment, and was not permitted to eat much, or drink any thing but water. The Governor received the suggestion very kindly, and gave me no trouble. He had had occasion to make the same excuse himself, when he met Commodore Biddle. He was then quite ill with a pulmonary complaint, brought on, as Dr. Parker, who treated him, thinks, by anxiety about the evacuation of Chusan, the retention of which by the British would probably have cost him his head.

"The dish most valued is the bird's nest, of which we had a large supply in two or three different forms. The best sort is the inner coat of the nest, carefully cleaned of all extraneous matter. As it comes to the table, it appears like a semi-transparent, whitish jelly, or the white part of an oyster. It has little or no taste of its own; but, eaten with soy, which is placed by the side of each plate, to be used as occasion requires, has a very good relish. Second only to the bird's nest, in the estimation of the Chinese gourmand, and separated from it by no very long interval, are the sinews of the deer. Dogs are said to occupy the third place; but of these we had no specimen at the Governor's table. It seems, however, from the high value set upon them, that they are not, as they have been sometimes represented, the resource of extreme poverty, but one of the luxuries of the rich. Shark's fins are in great request, and were served in two or three forms. Biche-de-Mer, a large sea-snail or slug, is one of the prime delicacies, and is, in fact, very good; being, as served, much the same sort of thing as an oyster. It is rather remarkable that the Chinese, prizing so highly as they do several dishes very much like oysters, should not value the oyster itself. I do not recollect that we had oysters in any shape on this occasion; and I am told that they are not much used, although they are found in abundance. Shrimps, which are uncommonly large and fine here, were served in several forms. One set of bowls were filled with the tongues of singing birds; others, with meats and game of different sorts, generally minced into small morsels, flavored with various condiments, and sometimes wrapped up in paste.

"Of the dishes that I tasted, nearly all had a good relish, and some were excellent. It appeared to me that I could have dined very well upon almost any one of them. The Chinese cookery, in its general characteristics, strongly resembles the French; and, after a little usage, would, I fancy, be thought fully equal to it.

"The Chinese have no wine, properly so called. The sam-shoo, which Europeans call wine, is a distillation from rice. It is served warm in cups, and has something of the taste of the lighter white wines of Spain. Beside this, we had champagne and sherry in profusion. The Governor drank a great quantity, occasionally mixing the two wines, but without any effect upon his head. The company challenged each other to take wine in the English fashion, which is also, I believe, a Chinese one. After emptying their glasses, the Chinese held them up bottom upwards, to show that they were drained to the last drop, expecting the other party to do the same.

"The plates were occasionally changed; but it did not appear to be thought necessary to go through with this ceremony at every change in the contents. The Governor, when any thing particularly nice was handed, would take a quantity in his chop-sticks, and put it upon my plate, which, before it was changed, generally began to assume the shape of a pyramid. Sometimes, instead of transferring the delicate morsel with his chop-sticks to my plate, he would take it in his fingers and put it into my mouth. This is regarded as the highest possible mark of respect and attention. The patient is, of course, required to acquiesce in it with every appearance of delight and gratitude. The Chinese themselves sometimes employ a rather awkward method of getting rid of the necessity of eating the immense quantities that are served on these occasions. I was told by the French Consul, that the Governor himself, at a dinner given to him by the French Minister, emptied his bowls under the table, as fast as they were handed to him, so that one of the attendants was steadily at work in sweeping the floor.

"After we had been about half an hour at table, I requested Dr. Parker to inform the Governor that I would propose as a sentiment, to be drank standing, the health of the Emperor of China. This suggestion was received with unanimous applause. We all filled our glasses with champagne, and drained them, with the exception of mine, to the bottom. The Governor, then, before we resumed our seats, proposed the health of the President of the United States, which was received in the same way. He then, still before sitting down, proposed my health; and when this was disposed of, I, in turn, gave his. After this there was a general hurra, and we all took our seats. We had now become not precisely exhilarated, but rather good-humored, and the wine circulated pretty freely. Various healths and sentiments were given and drank, some standing and some sitting. Among others, Dr. Parker offered, 'The prosperity of the great Chinese Empire,' to be drank standing. Upon this we all rose, and the Governor, before drinking, added, 'and that of all the friendly foreign powers,' at the same time extending his right hand upwards, and calling heaven to witness the sincerity of his expressions. After drinking this, we all joined in another general hurra, and once more took our seats. I was told by those of our countrymen who had been present on former occasions of the same kind, that there was more of the flow of soul as well as champagne, this time, than there has usually been. I was certainly a good deal surprised at the total absence of formality, and the unrestrained gayety that prevailed at the table, though no one present seemed in any degree to have lost his self-possession.

"While these matter were in progress, a change of scene took place upon the table itself. After we had tasted in succession of the contents of at least fifty different bowls, the table was partly cleared, and another series of dishes of a more substantial character made their appearance. Among these were a small pig roosted whole, a solid joint of beef, and another of mutton; a turkey, fowls, and game roasted whole, and others of the same kind. By the by, a leg of mutton and a turkey are among the most expensive dishes that can be served here; the former costing at the rate of half a dollar the pound, and the latter from five or six to fifteen or twenty dollars. The first quality of bird's nests costs from fifty to sixty dollars the pound.

"When I saw these solid dishes, I thought at first that the Governor had deemed it proper to entertain us, partly, at least, in our own way; and that the second division of the feast was an attempt to imitate the cookery of Europe. This conjecture was, it seems, not quite accurate. He explained the matter by saying, that as the population of the Chinese Empire was composed of two great divisions, the Chinese and the Tartars, he had arranged the dinner in two principal courses, Tartar and Chinese. We had begun with China, and were now to eat our way, with what appetite we might, though the almost boundless extent of Tartary; if we had deemed it necessary to take very copiously from every dish, would have proved, I fear, for some of us, to be not very remote from Tartarus. Be that as it may, the enemy was before us, and we were compelled to face him. After the pig had been taken from the table to be carved, and brought back again, the Governor commenced the dispensation of the Tartar course by seizing in his fingers a nicely crisped morsel of the crackling, with a rich stratum of the cellular membrane under it, and insinuating it with all possible gentleness and decorum between my lips. The incident reminded me of Elia's theory of the origin of roast pig, the scene of which, you will recollect, is laid in China; and I could easily imagine the intense delight with which, in his enthusiastic love of crackling, he would have enjoyed the Governor's civility. As I am not particularly fond of the article, especially with sauce a la Keying's finger, I could willingly have dispensed with the attention, flattering as it was, no doubt, intended to be.

"Finally—for the longest entertainment, as well as the longest epistle, (by this time a cheering truth to you), must have an end—we reached the limits of Tartary, and began to approach the termination of the dinner. Another lot of Chinese dishes, twelve in number, served in bowls, were placed at once upon the table; but it did not appear to be expected that we should eat much of them; for, almost immediately after, bowls of plain boiled rice were handed round to each person. These form the regular and indispensable close of a Chinese feast, and their appearance shows that the dinner is une affaire finie. The Governor now gave me one or two cordial taps upon the back and shoulders; Punting-Kwa put his hand to his throat, to show that he was filled to repletion; and we all rose together, and adjourned to the larger division of the room. Here we took seats again, and tea was handed in covered porcelain cups, without milk or sugar, and the leaves at the bottom of the cup, as before. After sipping a little of this, and sitting a short time, we all rose and prepared for departure. The Governor took me by the arm, and conducted me through the entrance door and along the verandah to the end of the bridge, where he cordially embraced me, and kissed me repeatedly on both cheeks; a civility which I returned in the same way."

The New Steamboat Wheel.

We published some time since a paragraph in relation to an improvement in the paddle-wheels of steamboats, invented by Capt. W. A. Bury, of Michigan. The Detroit Advertiser brings us an account of the trial of the invention:—

The wheel which he has invented is formed in all its parts exactly like the paddle-wheels of a steamboat, with the exception of the paddles or buckets. In the common paddle-wheel the paddle or bucket is a solid oblong board, fastened firmly across the two parallel arms. In this new wheel a paddle or bucket is affixed to each arm by a strong hinge in the inside corner of the arm, the two paddle-wheels being equivalent to one common one. The paddle itself is an oblong piece of wood, shaped like a wedge and hung in the arm, so that the heavy end is between the arms and the light end is outside. But the lightest division of the paddle-wheel has the most surface, and it is upon this fact the utility of the invention depends.

For instance, the wheel revolves, the paddle-wheel strikes the water, but it is so hung on the arm at a certain angle that the outside corner gradually sinks in, and as the wheel revolves the surface of the paddle meets the water gradually, but so as to press it back against the arm, where it is firmly held by the pressure caused by its own motion through the water; as the paddle rises to the surface the angle at which it comes out of the water permits the heavy end to fly back against the inside of the arm, and it thus comes out edgeways, exactly on the principle of feathering an oar. The paddle, by the simple operation of the principle of gravitation, remains with its edge directly in the line of the revolution of the wheel till the arm passes the perpendicular, when the paddle falls into its place ready to meet the pressure of the water again.

It is well known that in the revolution of the paddles of our ordinary steamboats, an immense amount of power is lost by having to lift a heavy weight of water with every turn of the crank. Numerous contrivances and inventions have been tried as a means of overcoming and doing away with this useless weight which the boat is obliged to carry; but we know of none that has not been found too intricate to be useful or available.

We have been told that at each revolution of the wheels of the May Flower the lift of water by the revolutions of the wheels is equal to eight tuns, and the lift is increased in proportion to the speed. If the engine makes sixteen revolutions in a minute, she has also to expend force enough to lift 128 tuns in that time. This is so much dead loss. We do not know that this is precisely the case, but it illustrates in some measure one of the difficulties of steam navigation, which this invention of Capt. Bury is intended to overcome, and the principal one. There are two others of minor importance. The first is, that in the passage of the paddles through the wheel-house it has little or no resistance to overcome from the pressure of the air. The other is, that in river navigation, where snags are met with, there is little or no danger of the paddles being smashed by coming in contact with them. In regard to the lift of water, Capt. Bury stated that he tried this model, which is about four feet in diameter, in the water, turning it at the rate of thirty revolutions per minute, and a person could remain within two feet of where the paddles came out of the water without being wet.

As the working of this model has shown that the principles on which it is constructed are correct, and that his wheel actually gets rid of the causes of the loss of a large amount of power on steam vessels, the whole question is resolved into whether large wheels can be constructed to work equally as well as the model works, and not be liable to get out of order by the immense pressure to which they are subjected. It is thought by those who are used to the making of such wheels that it can.

Oregon.

We recently received (says the N. Y. Tribune) a pressing letter from a country subscriber, asking us for specific information on a great many points connected with emigration to Oregon. We cannot answer so precisely as he wished, and know no work to which we might refer him for all the information he desires; but we will endeavor to throw some general light on the subject of Oregon, founded on considerable reading and conversation with persons who have made the overland journey and spent some time in that far-away region. We shall speak under different heads, as follows:—

1. Climate.—Oregon stretches along the East coast of the Pacific Ocean about 500 miles, from lat. 42° to 49° North, or say from the latitude of Newport, R. I., to that of the Saut St. Marie, or in fact farther. But, owing to the neighborhood of the Pacific, and the temperate winds thence blowing over it almost constantly, Western and Middle Oregon are far milder in climate than the corresponding section of the Atlantic slope. Its winters are much like those of North Carolina—or rather those of the Mountain region of South Carolina, Georgia, and Tennessee; while the abundance and altitude of the mountains in like manner modifies the heat of summer. Cool nights are general, and frosts quite common, even in summer, while snow rarely lies more than a few days, except on the mountains, or far inland, where the changes of temperature are very great and sudden. An early explorer of Oregon (Hall J. Kelley) saw the mercury in his thermometer rise to 100° during the day, though water froze during the night following. This was of course far inland, where neither ocean nor mountains exert so signal an influence as near the shore.

2. Soil.—Generally, the soil of Oregon, so far as cultivated, has proved very fertile. True, the best has been tried first, and there is very much waste land—mountains, ravines, &c.—but the prairie and forest lands are generally good. Of course, we refer to that half of Oregon lying nearest the Pacific. That which stretches thence to the Rocky Mountains is in good part composed of broken volcanic rock, generally barren, and not likely to be ever of much value, unless for pasturage.

3. Productions.—The belt of land lying between the Pacific and the Coast Range of Mountains is in the main heavily timbered with trees of gigantic size and nature. Between that and the next Range stretch the valleys of the Willamette, Cowelitz, &c.—partly timbered and partly prairie, having a generally fertile soil. (Here the bulk of the emigration hitherto has settled.) Further East, the land is barren and less inviting. The Grass of Oregon is good, and cattle can live the year round without feeding, almost any where. Wheat, Rye, Oats, Barley, &c., grow luxuriously almost throughout Oregon. Indian Corn suffers severely from frosts, and is a poor, uncertain crop. 'Oregon Corn,' so called, has a husk over each kernel to protect it from cold. For all other grains, and for Grass, Western Oregon is hardly exceeded by any country. To Fruit, we apprehend, it is poorly adapted, because of its frosts; though there is as yet little experience on this subject.

4. Minerals.—Coal in abundance has been found on Vancouver's Island, (British,) off the coast of Oregon, and it doubtless will be found in our territory. Gold exists to a considerable extent in the South-east; but whether it is generally distributed, and will justify extensive working, are questions not yet conclusively answered. Doubtless, other ores will be discovered as the country is cleared and cultivated.

5. The way to get there.—Practically, there is none for the poor except by the Overland Route. To double Cape Horn is an expensive and tedious voyage, and there is seldom a vessel sailing direct for Oregon. Our trade with that region is mainly by way of San Francisco. By taking either of the Isthmus routes, the time may be reduced to six or eight weeks, but the cost is from $300 to $500 per passenger. The Overland Route is a hard one, but it is not impracticable. Whoever would take this route should start so as to be at Independence, Missouri, on the first of May, though a late Spring may postpone his start thence to the middle of that month. It is a four months' work to travel thence to the valley of the Willamette; rather more, with a family. We consider mules the best animals, though the trip is oftener made with horses or with oxen. Light, strong wagons may be taken the greater part of the way. It is madness to take anything but provisions for the journey and clothing. Load as lightly as possible—not over five hundred pounds to each draft animal. Take along new milch cows, especially if you have children. You ought to have at least $100 in money to start with; for, though your lodgings will be cheap and you must carry nearly all your own food, you will find money come in play. We should say a hundred persons in a company, (thirty or forty of them strong, fearless, inoffensive, well-armed men,) would be about the desirable number. Avoid short-cuts, when not thoroughly proved, and keep the most traveled route. Pass the Maine Law before you start, and rigidly enforce it. Keep a sharp look-out for pasturage.

—This is about the substance of the counsel we should give a personal friend setting out for Oregon. It may involve some mistakes; but we give it for whatever it may be worth.

Disasters on the Lakes in 1852.

Capt. S. W. Rounds, agent of the North-Western Insurance Company, furnishes The Buffalo Express with a list of disasters on the Great Lakes during the year 1852. We copy the recapitulation, and Mr. Round's closing remarks:—

Whole amount of loss by collision,	$261,950
Whole amount of loss by other casualties,	730,709
Loss by steam vessels has been,	633,620
Loss by sail vessels has been,	359,039
Loss by American has been,	907,487
Loss by British has been,	85,172
Loss on Lake Ontario by steam,	49,350
Loss on Lake Ontario by sail,	29,589
Loss on Lake Erie by steam,	543,470
Loss on Lake Erie by sail,	197,830
Loss on Lake Huron by steam,	16,000
Loss on Lake Huron by sail,	53,600
Loss on Lake Michigan by steam,	820
Loss on Lake Michigan by sail,	78,000
Loss on Lake Superior by steam,	24,000

Of the two hundred and twenty-nine disasters here detailed, seven occurred in the month of April, nineteen in May, twenty-four in June, fifteen in July, sixteen in August, twenty-one in September, twenty-seven in October, eighty-five in November (55 in one gale of the 11th and 12th,) and fifteen in December. Six steamers, seven propellers, and thirty-five sail vessels have gone out of existence entirely. In many instances the amount of losses as above stated have been matters of estimate, as many must necessarily be; but much pains and care have been taken to procure, in each case, the opinion of competent men who were most familiar with the circumstances. Regarding the loss of life by the steamer Atlantic, there are various opinions; her agents and proprietors contending it did not exceed one hundred and fifty, while many who were somewhat familiar with the circumstances, set it as high as three hundred, and some even higher. The former I deem somewhat under the mark, and the latter much above.

A Tame Trout.

The Kennebec Journal says that Mr. J. G. Phinney, at the dye-house in that city, has a large water tank, of the capacity of several hogsheads, from which he procures a supply of pure water, for use in his business. About six years since he obtained and placed in the tank a brook trout, of a few inches in length, and has since regularly fed it with scraps of meat, until it has attained a weight of six pounds and a length of some eighteen inches. The tank is fed by a spring, and the overflow carried off by a pipe, so that the supply of water is constant, cool and pure, and Sir Trout lives and enjoys life like a philosopher—another Diogones in his tub. This fish, although approachable by its owner, and always coming at his call, is shy in the presence of strangers, and when he sees only strange faces above him usually retires to the bottom of his tub.

We paid a visit to this finny celebrity recently, and approaching his domain alone, we found him suspended mid-way in the crystal fluid, slowly moving his fins to and fro, his beautifully spotted back gleaming in the light. As usual, he took no notice of his strange visitor, although invited to acquaintance by such advances as crumbs thrown on the water; but when Mr. Phinney appeared with some strips of raw beef steak, his apathy gave place to the utmost activity.

He would dart from the bottom and throw himself clear out of the water if a piece of meat was held above, and almost always succeeded in catching it. He is an unsocial fish, and small ones, even of his own kind, are at once devoured if placed with him. His last exploit in this line was killing and devouring a chub eight inches long. A man not long since was drinking from the tank, not knowing that it was tenanted, when the trout made a spring at his face, and severely bit his lip. An old angler cannot view his fine, plump proportions without a desire to throw a fly on the water, and try how he would feel at the end of a rod.

Negro Well-Digger.

The Baton Rouge Vis-a-Vis, of the 1st of December, states that an Artesian well, the first of the kind ever begun in Louisiana, was commenced in that place the previous week by a negro named George Menard. The Vis-a-Vis adds:—

This undertaking, whether successful or not, reflects much credit upon the undertaker, and evinces an indomitable energy of character worthy of imitation. A few years since George Menard was a slave; by industry and fidelity he accumulated funds sufficient and purchased himself. A few months ago George Menard took it into his head that he would go to Alabama, learn something of Artesian wells, come home, dig, bore, or make one. He accordingly, at his own expense, went on, aided in boring three or four, and comes home confident of success; as an evidence of which he now, at an immense cost to himself, commences the first Artesian well in Louisiana, relying upon the liberality of the people to reward him in the event of his accomplishing what seems to him so certain.

CHINESE JUGGLERS.—A correspondent of the Lowell Vox Populi thus describes one of the performances of the Chinese jugglers in San Francisco:—

A plank sixteen inches wide and six feet high was placed at the back of the stage, and the impaler with knives took his stand about fifteen or twenty feet in front of it. The knives were about seven-inch blades, and four-inch handles, strong and pointed. After playing with them for a time, tossing and whirling them in a most wonderful manner, he threw them one after another, fastening them firmly in the plank before him. He then drew them out, and another Chinaman took his stand before the plank, or rather at the side of it, holding out his arm across the same, and the impaler threw one knife above and another below it, as closely as they could have been placed there by the most careful hand, completely fastening his arm upon the plank. The other arm was then reached across and fastened in the same way, the knives sticking firmly and the handles crossing each other. The Chinaman then reached forward his head, and quick as thought two knives were thrown—the one above and the other below his neck, seemingly within one-fourth of an inch on either side. Such precision and daring was truly wonderful, and the whole evening's performance elicited unbounded applause.

ONE WAY TO GET LIQUOR.—The Springfield Republican tells a story of a trick played in a neighboring town, by some extremely thirsty individuals, for securing a drink. The object of the trick was to get some liquor of the town agent, and it was highly successful. They procured an old horse and "stood him" in a barn. One of the number went to the town agent's premises, and he being absent, "a pint of gin for a sick horse" was procured of his wife. This amount was soon exhausted, and the horse grew worse. Another pint was procured, the horse being "very sick indeed." The horse grew worse again, and a quart was wanted. When this was gone after, the agent had returned. He dealt out the quart, and went to see it administered. The thirsty individuals saw him coming, or learned of his approach, and fell to rubbing the poor horse most powerfully. Finally, it was decided to take the liquor to an apothecary, to have some drugs put into it, as it had not done much good thus far, and the individual conveying the treasure made his way to another barn, to which, one after another, the company followed him, the agent at last being left nearly alone. After that gentleman had been led through various adventures, the consciousness dawned upon him that he had been humbugged, and he made his way home. The horse recovered, and the doctors all had the headache the next day.

WASHING A RAGGED-SCHOOL BOY.—"A boy once went to a ragged-school and had his face washed; and when he went home, his neighbors looked at him with astonishment. They said, 'That looks like Tom Rogers, and yet it can't be, for he's so clean.' Presently his mother looked at him, finding his face so clean, she fancied her face dirty, and forthwith washed it. The father soon came home, and seeing his wife so clean, thought his face dirty, and soon followed their example. Father, mother, and son all being clean, the mother began to think the room looked dirty, and down she went on her knees, and scrubbed that clean. There was a female lodger in the house, who, seeing such a change in her neighbors, thought her face and room very dirty, and she speedily betook to the cleansing operation likewise. And very soon the whole house was, as it were, transformed, and made tidy and comfortable, simply by the cleaning of one ragged-school boy."

The Paris correspondent of the St. Louis Republican says that the Monks of Saint Bernard, after exercising so long and so nobly the rites of hospitality among the snows of their lofty solitudes, are preparing to abandon their establishment, which will shortly be rendered useless by the opening of the tunnel of Menouvre; the good brethren will establish themselves beside this tunnel, and again proffer their world-renowned hospitality to travelers on this new route.

The renowned Tristam Burges, of Rhode Island, distinguished for eloquence and ability in Congress, especially in his renconter with John Randolph, is still alive and hearty, though now in his 83d year. He retains his mind, and his pen is busy in prose and poetry. Very few men in our country have produced such speeches and addresses as he delivered when a member of Congress.

At Cincinnati Dec. 21st, after the trial of a prisoner charged in the Criminal Court with grand larceny, it was discovered when the Jury had retired to their room that one of the Jurors was a German, only three weeks from Europe, and unable to speak a word of English. Intimation of the fact being conveyed to the Court, the Jurors were called upon and discharged.

A potato dealer in Salem, New Jersey, has sent to the New York market this season, 32,000 bushels, which yielded the farmer $16,000. Mr. Morgans, in Camden county, raised a 100,000 bushels, which at present prices, 62½ cents a bushel, would yield $62,500.

OPIUM AND OPIUM SMOKING IN CHINA.

From Williams' Middle Kingdom.

The utensils used in preparing the opium for smoking, consist chiefly of three hemispherical brass pans, two bamboo filters, two portable furnaces, earthern pots, ladles, straining-cloths, and sprinklers. The ball being cut in two, the interior is taken out, and the opium adhering to or contained in the leafy covering is previously simmered three several times, each time using a pint of spring water, and straining it into an earthen pot; some cold water is poured over the dregs after the third boiling, and from half a cake (weighing at first about 28 lbs., and with which this process is supposed to be conducted) there will be about five pints of liquid. The interior of the cake is then boiled with this liquid for about an hour, until all is reduced to a paste, which is spread out with a spatula in two pans, and exposed to the fire for two or three minutes at a time, till the water is all driven off; during this operation, it is often broken up and re-spread, and at the last drying cut across with a knife. It is all then spread out in one cake, and covered with six pints of water, and allowed to remain several hours, or over night for digestion. When sufficiently soaked, a rag filter is placed on the edge of the pan, and the whole of the valuable part drips slowly through the rag into a basket lined with coarse bamboo paper, from which it falls into the other brass pan, about as much liquid going through as there was water poured over the cake. The dregs are again soaked and immediately filtered till found to be tasteless; this weaker part usually makes about six pints of liquid.

The first six pints are then briskly boiled, being sprinkled with cold water to allay the heat so as not to boil over, and removing the scum, by a feather, into a separate vessel. After boiling twenty minutes, five pints of the weak liquid are poured in and boiled with it, until the whole is evaporated to about three pints, when it is strained through paper into another pan, and the remaining pint thrown into the pan just emptied, to wash away any portion that may remain in it, and also boiled a little while, when it is also strained into the three pints. The whole is then placed over a slow fire in the small furnace, and boiled down to a proper consistency for smoking; while it is evaporating, a ring forms around the edge, and the pan is taken off the fire at intervals to prolong the process, until it becomes like thick treacle, when it is taken out and put into small pots for smoking. The boxes in which it is retailed are made of buffalo's horn, of such size as easily to be carried about the person. The dregs containing the vegetable residuum, together with the scum and washings of the pans, are lastly strained and boiled with water, producing about six pints of thin brownish liquid, which is evaporated to a proper consistence for selling to the poor. The process of seething the crude opium is exceedingly unpleasant to those unaccustomed to it, from the overpowering narcotic fumes which arise, and this odor marks every shop where it is prepared, and every person who smokes it. The loss in weight by this mode of preparation, is about one half. The Malays prepare it much in the same manner. The custom in Penany is to reduce the dry cake made on the first evaporation to a powder; and when it is digested, and again strained and evaporated, reducing it to a consistence resembling shoemaker's wax.

The opium pipe consists of a tube of heavy wood, furnished at the end with a cup, which serves to collect the residuum or ashes left after combustion; this cup is usually a small cavity in the end of the pipe, and serves to elevate the bowl to a level with the lamp. The bowl of the pipe is made of earthern ware, of an ellipsoid shape, and sets down upon the hole, itself having a small rimmed orifice on the flat side. The opium smoker always lies down; and the singular picture given by Davis, of a "Mandarin smoking an opium-pipe," dressed in his official robes, and sitting up at a table, was probably made to order by some artist who had never seen any body use it. Lying along the couch, he holds the pipe, aptly called yen tsaing, i. e. smoking-pistol, by the Chinese, so near the lamp that the bowl can be brought up to it without stirring himself. A little opium of the size of a pea, being taken on the end of a spoon-handled needle, is put upon the hole of the bowl, and set on fire at the lamp, and inhaled at one whiff, so that none of the smoke shall be lost. Old smokers will retain the breath a long time, filling the lungs, and exhaling the fumes through the nose. The taste of the half-fluid extract is sweetish and oily, somewhat like rich cream, but the smell of the burning drug is rather sickening. When the pipe has burned out, the smoker lies listless for a moment while the fumes are dissipating, and then repeats the process until he has spent all his purchase, or taken his prescribed dose. When the smoking commences, the man becomes loquacious, and breaks out into boisterous, silly merriment, which gradually changes to a vacant paleness and shrinking of the features, as the quantity increases, and the narcotic acts. A deep sleep supervenes from half an hour to three or four hours' duration, during which the pulse becomes slower, softer, and smaller than before the debauch. No refreshment is felt from this sleep, when the person has become a victim to the habit, but a universal sinking of the powers of the body and mind is experienced, and complete recklessness, so be it that the appetite for more be gratified.

A novice is content with one or two whiffs, which produce vertigo, nausea, and head-ache, though practice enables him to gradually increase the quantity; "temparate smokers," warned by the sad example of the numerous victims around them, endeavor to keep within bounds, and walk as near the precipice as they can without falling over into hopeless ruin. In order to do this, they limit themselves to a certain quantity daily, and take it at or soon after meals, so that the stomach may not be much weakened. A "temperate smoker" (though this term is like that of a temperate robber, who only takes shillings from his employer's till, or a temperate blood-letter, who only takes a spoonful daily from his veins,) can seldom exceed a mace weight, or about as much of prepared opium as will balance a pistareen or a franc piece; this quantity will fill twelve pipes. Two mace weight taken daily is considered an immoderate dose, which few can bear for any length of time; and those who are afraid of the effects of the drug upon themselves endeavor not to exceed a mace. Some persons, who have strong constitutions, and stronger resolution, continue the use of the drug within these limits, for many years, without disastrous effects upon their health and spirits; though most of even these moderate smokers are so much the slaves of the habit, that they feel too wretched, nerveless, and imbecile, to go on with their business without the stimulus.

The testimony regarding the evil effects of the use of this pernicious drug, which deserves better to be called an "article of destruction" than an "article of luxury," are so unanimous, that few can be found to stand up strongly in its favor. Dr. Smith, a physician in charge of the hospital at Penary, says, "The baneful effects of this habit on the human constitution are particularly displayed by stupor, forgetfulness, general deterioration of all the mental faculties, emaciation, debility, sallow complexion, lividness of lips and eye-lids, languor and lack-luster of eye, and appetite either destroyed or depraved, sweetmeats or sugar being the articles that are most relished." These symptoms appear where the habit has weakened the physicial powers, but the unhappy man soon begins to feel the power of the drug in a general languor and sinking, which disables him mentally more than bodily, from carrying on his ordinary pursuits. A dose of opium does not produce the intoxication of ardent spirits, and so far as the community and his family are concerned, the smoker it less troublesome than the drunkard; the former never throws the chairs and tables about the room, or drives his wife out of doors in his furious rage; he never goes ruling through the streets, or takes lodgings in the gutter; but contrariwise, he is quiet or pleasant, and fretful only when the effects of the pipe are gone. It is in the insupportable languor throughout the whole frame, the gnawing at the stomach, pulling at the shoulders, and failing of the spirits, that the tremendous power of this vice lies, compelling the "victimized" slave "to seek it yet again." There has not yet been opportunity to make those minute investigations respecting the extent opium is used among the Chinese, what classes of people use it, their daily dose, the proportion of reprobate smokers, and many other points which have been narrowly examined into, in regard to the use of alcohol; so that it is impossible to decide the question as to which of the two is the most dreadful habit. These statistics have, heretofore, been impossible to obtain in China, and it will be very difficult to obtain them, even when a person, who may have the leisure and abilities, shall undertake the task.

Various means have been tried by benevolent natives to dissuade their countrymen from using it, such as distributing tracts showing its ruinous effects, compounding medicines for the smoker to take, to aid him in breaking off the habit, and denouncing the smoking shops to government. A painter at Canton made a series of admonitory pictures, showing the several steps in the downward course of the opium-smoker, until beggary and death ended the scene.

A Chinese scholar thus sums up the bad effects of opium, which he says is taken at first to raise the animal spirits and prevent lassitude: "It exhausts the animal spirits, impedes the regular performance of business, wastes the flesh and blood, dissipates every kind of property, renders the person ill-favored, promotes obscurity, discloses secrets, violates the laws, attacks the vitals, and destroys life." Under each of these heads, he lucidly shows the mode of the process, or gives examples to uphold his assertions. "In comparison with arsenic, I pronounce it ten-fold the greater poison; one swallows arsenic because he has lost his reputation, and is so involved that he cannot extricate himself. Thus driven to desperation, he takes the dose and is destroyed at once; but those who smoke the drug are injured in many ways. It may be compared to raising the wick of a lamp, while it increases the blaze, hastens the exhaustion of the oil and the extinction of the light. Hence, the youth who smoke will shorten their own days, and cut off all hopes of posterity, leaving their parents and wives without any one on whom to depend. From the robust who smoke, the flesh is gradually consumed and worn away, and the skin hangs like a bag. Their faces become cadaverous and black, and their bones naked as billets of wood. The habitual smokes doze for days over their pipes, without appetite; when the desire for opium comes on, they cannot resist its impulse. Mucus flows from their nostrils, and tears from their eyes; their very bodies are rotten and putrid. From careless observers, the sight of such objects is enough to excite loud peals of laughter. The poor smoker, who has pawned every article in his possession, still remains idle; and when the periodical thirst comes on, will even pawn his wives and sell his daughters. In the province of N-gaucohui, I once saw a man named Chin, who, being childless, purchased a concubine, and got her with child; afterwards, when his money was expended and other means all failed him, being unable to resist the desire for the pipe, he sold her in her pregnancy for several tens of dollars. This money being expended, he went and hung himself. Alas, how painful was his end!"

The thirst and burning sensation in the throat, which the wretched sufferer feels, only to be removed by a repetition of the dose, proves one of the strongest links in the chain which drags him to his ruin. At this stage of the habit, his case in almost hopeless; if the pipe be delayed too long, vertigo, complete prostration, and discharge of water from the eyes, ensue, if entirely withheld, coldness and aching pains are felt over the body, an obstinate diarrhea supervenes, and death closes the scene. The disastrous effects of the drug upon the constitution seem to be somewhat delayed or modified by the quantity of nourishing food the person can procure, and consequently it is among the poor, who can least afford the pipe, and still less the injury done to their energies, that the destruction of life is the greatest. The evils suffered and crimes committed by the desperate victims of the opium-pipe are dreadful and multiplied. Theft, arson, murder, and suicide, are perpetrated in order to obtain it or escape its effects. Some try to break off the fatal habit, by taking a tincture of the opium diet in spirits, gradually diminishing its strength until it is left off entirely; others mix opium with tobacco, and smoke the compound in a less and less proportion, until tobacco alone remains. The general belief is that the vice can be overcome without fatal results, if the person firmly resolves to forsake it, and keep away from sight and smell of the pipe, laboring as much as his strength will allow in the open air, until he recovers his spirits, and no longer feels a longing for it. Few, very few, however, even emancipate themselves from the tyrannous habit which enslaves them; they are able to resist its insidious effects until the habit has become strong, and the resolution to break it off is generally delayed until their chains are forged, and deliverance felt to be hopeless. The resolution in their case has, alas, none of the awful motives to enforce its observance, which a knowledge of the Bible would give it; the heathen dieth in his ignorance.

ROBERT CLIVE AND JAMES WOLFE.

The Decrees of Rome, and the Decrees of God.

The facts presented in the following sketch, which appeared in the Independent, illustrate the procedure of Providence in executing the decrees of God:—

A hundred years ago, the Queen of the Seven Hills was saying in her heart, "My dominion shall encircle the globe. Asia, that world of the hoary Past—America, that world of the brilliant Future, shall meet at my footstool. My throne shall overtop the Rocky Mountains and the Himalayas. The Missouri and the Ganges shall float my revenues. The waves of every ocean shall waft the gold and homage of the gorgeous East and the mighty West to this Eternal City. Beyond where Alexander trod—beyond where floated Cæsar's ensigns, shall stand the pillars of my dominion—a dominion to which all heathens and heretics shall submit or perish; a dominion over all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them, and whose glory shall never fade."

Thus Rome decreed,
And why not?

At the middle of the last century, the peninsula of India, containing about one-sixth of the human race, seemed about to pass from the dominion of the Great Mogul to that of "His Most Christian Majesty" of France, "the eldest son of the Church." France had established her empire over thirty millions of people in Southern India, while yet England had only a few trading agents at Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, and these despised and insulted both by French and natives. The idea of an Indo-British empire had occurred to no human mind. The existence of England's commercial factories, even, was in peril. But the idea of an Indo-French empire—to be governed nominally by native rulers, and supported by native armies under European discipline and command—had occurred to the sagacious and aspiring Dupleix, French governor of Pondicherry; and he was marching triumphant and almost unresisted to its fulfillment. The throne of Delhi trembled before this son of the Church. And what a prize stirred his ambition! The realms of the Great Mogul, stretching from the peerless heights of the Himalaya to Cape Comorin—surpassing in extent the twenty-five American States east of the Mississippi, with revenues more ample, and subjects more numerous than belonged to any European State—India, the goal of the merchant, and the conqueror for thousands of years—India shall be a province of France, and the jewels of Golconda and the gold of Delhi shall enhance the magnificence and the power of the Holy Catholic Church. Well might France and Rome exult. The one should see her power forever exalted above that of her Saxon rival. The other might instal her priests and saints in every Hindoo temple, transfer the funeral pile from the window to the heretic, and compel a hundred millions of people to be baptized and saved at once. But India is the heart and crown of Asia, and they who rule in India, rule sooner or later from Egypt to the Yellow Sea. A hundred years ago, Rome might think she almost saw her crucifixes erected by the valor of loyal Frenchmen upon all the mosques and pagodas of Asiatic Infidelity, from Mecca to the Chinse Wall.

But God said to Rome, "Thy counsels shall not stand. India and Asia are not thine."

Sitting by a writer's desk, in an English commercial house in the city of Madras, was a young man twenty-five years of age, who knew not God. Desperation showed itself through his sullen face. A dark soul looked out from under his black heavy brow. His temper is fierce. He cannot bear restraint. He knows no fear of God or man. He loathes his daily duties. His pay is small. No joys of friendship cheer his weary life. His health fails. Of either pleasure, wealth or distinction, he has no prospect. He vows, "I will not live. My pistol shall yield me quick relief." He loads well the deadly thing. With desperate heart he holds it to his head. It snaps! But the instrument will not do the guilty deed. He loads and snaps again, but still in vain.

The name of this young man was Robert Clive, ordained of God (whom he neither loved nor feared) to annihilate the French Empire in India, and blast the purposes of Rome. Circumstances compelled him to lay down the pen and take up the sword. This revealed his talent and his mission. By sustaining the siege of Arcot fifty days, and then repulsing the besiegers with almost incredible skill and valor, he struck the death-blow of French and Papal power in that quarter of the world, and the Indo-European empire, which Duplex had projected for Papal France, was turned over to her great Protestant rival. Again the rising empire, which Clive had founded, was in peril. Its fate depended upon his vanquishing sixty thousand hardy troops from Northern India, rallied by the base Surajah Dowlah. Clive had but three thousand men. For once he yielded to the counsels of fear, and consented not to fight. But he could not rest. One hour of agonizing thought alone made him Robert Clive again, the desperate. One hour of battle more, and the victory of Plassez revealed God's decree, that British dominion in India and Asia should endure. Thus did Jehovah smite the scarlet hand stretched out to grasp the Eastern Hemisphere, a hundred years ago.

But there was another Hemisphere, beyond the Atlantic, and there the purple-clad Lady of the Tiber would have an empire wider than all the world that Cæsar knew. That new world was hers by right divine of discovery and prepossession. Her disciples had threaded the forests from Montreal to St. Anthony, and thence to the great Gulf, scattering names canonical in all their pathway, monuments eternal of their right and purposes to possess the land. And more, her "Most Christian" son of France commanded those avenues of empire, the St. Lawrence, the Lakes, and the Mississippi. Soldiers who invoked the Virgin and adored the wafer, defied the power of Britain and her colonies at Fort Du Quesne, and commanded the Ohio river. The mines, too, of Mexico and Peru, the broad plains of the Amazon and La Plata, were all her own. Indeed, from the north pole to the south, in the New World, none disowned her sceptre, save a few red heathens in the woods, and a few white heretics along the shore. And when the New World should overtop the Old in coming ages, her ensign should wave in glory along the western sky.

But what means that shout, "They fly—they fly!" amid the din of battle, on the heights of Abraham? The expiring Wolfe starts up from the stupor of death to ask, "Who flies?" "The French fly." "Then I die contented," says the soldier, and expires.

But the hero of Quebec little knew the full significance of that shout, "They fly!" It meant that Canada had passed from French Papal rule for ever—that the chain stretched from the Laks to the Gulf, to bind the great Valley to Rome, was broken. It meant that North America was lost forever to the Pope; it meant that the scarlet rider of the ten-horned beast should never control the destiny of the Western Hemisphere; it meant that Roman domination on earth was sinking to rise no more. Thus did Rome project, a hundred years ago, and thus by the sword of the Saxon, did her projects perish, in the farthest East and the farthest West.

How does all history display the glorious Providence of God! How sublime and beneficent is the grand drift of human affairs, as controlled by that Providence!—how dark and deplorable is the world's history, as the designs and character of men are displayed! how bright and blessed as the plans and agency of God are concerned! How adorable the wisdom that uses wicked men unconsciously, or against their wills, like Clive or Hastings, to subserve the Kingdom of Christ! How surely will the roll of ages crush Antichrist and every antichrist!—how delightful that God's decrees will be fulfilled! how sublime Jehovah's march along the ages! How do the grandest schemes, the profoundest policy, the most potent combinations, that are antichristian, perish before Him! Courage, then, ye friends of God and friends of man. The Lord reigneth, and the earth rejoice in the fore-ordained decree, that the splendors of His power, wisdom and love, shall be displayed by means of "whatsoever comes to pass."

THE WORK OF MISSIONS.

The Missionary enterprise is a fixed fact. Its part in the affairs of the world is as much established as are the enterprises of Commerce or the institutions of Science and Art. The occasional embarrassment of one and another Society engaged in this work no more forebodes a failure or a suspension of the work itself, than the embarrassment of a few banks or commercial houses forebodes the total suspension of banking and of commerce. No one association can carry forward the entire work of missions, any more than a single house can have a monopoly of commerce or banking. The occasional causes that lead to the embarrassment of a missionary society have little connection with the great work of missions itself. That work has now called to its alliance many of the commercial, the scientific, and the governmental interests of the world. The evangelical Armenians and the Sandwich Islanders are fast coming into a position where they will not only sustain the institutions of religion among themselves, but will also contribute to support those institutions among the destitute.

The missionary enterprise is inherently progressive. The work already accomplished is a pledge and an argument for the prosecution of the same work in future; and every new success of the enterprise it at once a demand for its enlargement, and an earnest of yet greater triumphs. Though the ordination and the embarkation of missionaries have long ceased to be a novelty, yet to a numerous circle these occasions are as interesting as was the sailing of Newell, Hall, Judson, Nott and Rice, to the churches of New England that had contributed only $1200 for their support. Nobody dreams that the work of missions is to be abandoned. The settled feeling of the churches is that it must go forward; they have no other thought. The decision of any church and of any individual Christian would be that every new field should be occupied as soon as open, and that every missionary applicant of proper qualifications should be sent out under a pledge of support There is no lack of interest in the work of missions, no lack of confidence in its final success, and no lack of disposition to contribute towards it.

HOPE FOR THE AGED.

Mr. L—— was the son of respectable parents, and had in early life married an excellent lady, connected with several of the most influential families in the State. He had indeed begun his career with no little promise. But when we for the first time met, he was sixty years of age, and his appearance gave sad evidence of a long-indulged habit of intemperance. He kept a public house in the village of P——, where I was led by the Providence of God to begin, about four years since, my labors by a monthly service; and the sale of intoxicating liquors had brought with it all those evils which so often follow in its train. He had become a gambler and a horse-racer, and his influence had been very injurious to many, especially the young.

How much his poor wife endured, no tongue can tell—but her trials had been blessed to her, for they had led her to Him who alone can give consolation and support under such accumulated troubles. She spoke to me of her trials, of her husband and his habits, and asked me to bear with him, and come as often as I could, and seek to exert some influence, if possible, to save him; and this, with no little anxiety, I promised to do.

Afraid to go on Saturday evening, which I understood was the worst in the week for him, his bar being then always thronged—I waited till Sunday night, after preaching. All was quiet. Mr. L—— was sober, received me kindly, and gave me a cordial invitation to make his house my home, whenever I came to the village to preach. "The next time you come, ride up, and walk in." As it was late, I soon retired, first reading with them a short chapter, and offering up an earnest prayer for those under whose roof I was about to sleep. The month rolled round. I came again to P——, but afraid to stop at the tavern, I passed on to another house, and went again to see him on Sunday night. He met me with a kind reproof.

"Why did you not come last night? You need not be afraid. For when I ask a minister to my house, I trust I know what is due to his character too well to have him disturbed by the noise of drunkards."

"This was unexpected, and truly encouraging, for he had, indeed, anticipating my visit, closed his bar, and refused to admit one single customer. I apologized, and the next month did as he requested, rode up, and walked in. All was right. His wife greeted me with a warm pressure of the hand, and a tearful [illegible] together again in God's blessed book, and then bending before a throne of grace.

From that moment I had great hopes of his salvation. But months passed without any outward change. He still clung to his evil habits, and exhibited little or no interest in divine things. Yet his wife was constant in prayer for him, and hoped even against hope. At last his health began to decline, and he was evidently uneasy at the thought of dying. He began quietly to read his Bible, and sought at times the company of Christians. Still he seemed to avoid the subject of religion, when with me—and hesitating to introduce it very pointedly, I merely selected at family worship carefully such portions as I thought suited his case, and commended him to God.

The holding of a protracted meeting, in the month of May, now detained me in the village several days. But as he was on his bed, I thought it better not to increase his wife's cares by my presence, and sought a resting place at another house. On the third day, Mrs. L—— came to me, and requested me to go at once to his bedside, as he had asked to see me, and "be faithful." I did so, and found him in great distress of mind, and deeply penitent. He listened to the word read, and to the prayer, but said:

"Oh, sir, how can it be that one so vile can be saved? Oh, this burden of sin! The sins of sixty years!"

And thus he continued in darkness and distress for about two months. At times apparently just ready to lay hold on Christ, and again driven by the remembrance of his past life to the very borders of despair. But at length his cry was heard. He began to indulge a hope. He clung to the promises with trembling, and yet eagerly as a dying man, and soon those promises began to comfort him. He grew somewhat better, and spoke of going up to God's house, and joining in his worship—openly professing his name, and striving to undo some of the evil he before had done. But the Lord had determined otherwise. Suddenly again he sickened, and his end evidently approached. Yet his confidence in God was not moved. There was no noise, no excitement. But he ever exhibited a sweet serenity and peace, which strongly contrasted with his former anxieties, and gave his friends great reason for hope in his death.

His son came; and to him, as to others, he bore pointed testimony to the wickness of sin and to the pardoning mercy of God. He warned him of the evil consequences of unbelief, and besought him with tears to let what he now uttered be in the place of all former instructions and example. Two days before his death, wishing to leave a dying testimony for Christ, he asked his son, if he saw him sinking, immediately to let him know it. The moment came.

"Father," said his son, "do you remember what you asked me?"

"Yes," was the reply—"yes, dear wife, dear son, farewell!"

Then, looking upward, with a peaceful, happy smile, he exclaimed, "Sweet Jesus! sweet Jesus!"—and, without a struggle, fell asleep.

Reader—one word. I have written this for your encouragement. Are you an old and a great sinner? See here a brand plucked from the burning. Repent and fly to Christ. Then you likewise shall be saved. But put it not off. That burden of sin is getting heavier every hour that you delay. You have no promise of a long sickness, and of leisure for reflection. While we tell you there is hope, we also tell you plainly that hope is diminishing every moment. There is no time to be lost.

When Mr. L—— was on his dying bed, all his old companions forsook him. Thus is it always with the wicked. They dread the sight of aught that speaks to them of their own death. Have you such companions? Trust them not. Give them up. "Come with us, and we will do the good, for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel." [Chris. Obs.

A HUMAN MONSTER.

Among the persons concerned in the Rye-House plot, was a man named James Burton. By his own confession he had been present when the design of assassination was discussed by his accomplices. When the conspiracy was detected, a reward was offered for his apprehension. He was saved from death by an ancient matron of the Anabaptist persuasion, named Elizabeth Gaunt. This woman, with the peculiar manners and phraseology which then distinguished her sect, had a large charity. Her life was passed in relieving the unhappy of all religious denominations, and she was well known as a constant visitor of the jails. Her political and theological opinions, as well as her compassionate disposition, led her to do everything in her power for Burton. She procured a boat which took him to Gravesend, where he got on board of a ship bound for Amsterdam. At the moment of parting she put into his hand a sum of money, which, for her means, was very large. Burton, after living some time in exile, returned to England with Monmouth, fought at Sedgemoor, fled to London, and took refuge in the house of John Fernly, a barber in Whitechapel. Fernly was very poor. He was besieged by creditors. He knew that a reward of a hundred pounds had been offered by the government for the apprehension of Burton. But the honest man was incapable of betraying one who, in extreme peril, had come beneath the shadow of his roof. Unhappily, it was soon noised abroad that the anger of James was more strongly excited against those who harbored rebels than against the rebels themselves. He had publicly declared that, of all forms of treason, the hiding of traitors from his vengeance was the most unpardonable. Burton knew this. He delivered himself up to the government, and he gave information against Fernly and Elizabeth Gaunt. They were brought to trial. The villain whose life they had preserved had the heart and forehead to appear as the principal witness against [illegible] sentenced to the gallows, Elizabeth Gaunt to the stake.

Even after all the horrors of the year, many thought it impossible that these judgments should be carried into execution. But the king was without pity. Fernly was hanged. Elizabeth Gaunt was burned alive at Tyburn on the same day on which Cornish suffered death at Cheapside. She left a paper, written, indeed, in no graceful style, yet such as was read by many thousands with compassion and horror.

"My fault," she said, "was one which a prince might well have forgiven. I did but relieve a poor family, and lo! I must die for it."

She complained of the insolence of the judge, of the ferocity of the jailor, and of the tyranny of him, the great one of all, to whose pleasure she and so many other victims had been sacrificed. In as far as they had injured her, she forgave them; but in that they were implacable enemies of that good cause which would yet revive and flourish, she left them to the judgment of the King of kings. To the last she preserved a tranquil courage which reminded the spectators of the most heroic deaths of which they had read in Fox.

William Penn, for whom exhibitions which humane men generally avoid, seemed to have had a strong attraction, hastened from Cheapside, where he had seen Cornish hanged, to Tyburn, in order to see Elizabeth Gaunt burned. He afterwards related that, when she calmly disposed the straw about her in such a manner as to shorten her sufferings, all the bystanders burst into tears. It was much noticed that, while the foulest judicial murder which had disgraced even those times was perpetrating, a tempest burst forth such as had not been known since that hurricane which had raged round the death-bed of Oliver. The oppressed Puritans reckoned up, not without a gloomy satisfaction, the houses which had been blown down, and the ships which had been cast away, and derived some consolation from thinking that Heaven was bearing awful testimony against the iniquity which afflicted the earth. Since that day no woman has suffered death in England for any political offense. [Macaulay's History.

THE ENGLISH BIBLE.

To many, no doubt, it might seem too bold, were we at once to affirm that the English Bible is at present in the act of being perused from the rising to the setting sun. The assertion might appear little else than a figure of speech, or an event to be anticipated; and yet this is no more than the half of the truth. The English Bible, at this moment, is the only version in existence on which the sun never sets. We know full well that it is actually in use on the banks of the Ottawa and St. Lawrence, as well as at Sidney, Port Philip, and Hobart Town; but before his evening rays have left the spires of Quebec or Montreal, his morning beams have already shone for hours upon the shores of Australia and New Zealand. And if it be reading by so many of our language in Canada, while the sun is setting on Lake Ontario, in the eastern world, where he has risen in his glory, on the banks of the Ganges, to the selfsame Sacred Volume, many, who are no less our countrymen, have already turned.

POSTURE IN FAMILY PRAYER.

Nobody will deny that kneeling is a very suitable posture for a supplicant at the Throne of Mercy, with whatever ingenuity it may be argued, that other postures are allowable. The Old Testament says, "O come, let us worship and bow down; let us kneel before the Lord our Maker." Ps. 95: 6. "When Solomon had made an end of praying all this prayer and supplication unto the Lord, he arose from before the altar of the Lord, from kneeling on his knees." 1 Kings 8: 54. Ezra, having rent his garment and his mantle, fell upon his knees, and spread out his hands unto the Lord. Ezra 9: 5. Daniel kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed. Dan. 6: 10. The testimony of the New Testament is, that Jesus Christ, in the time of his agony, "kneeled down, and prayed." Luke 22: 41. Paul bowed his knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Eph. 3: 14. And Stephen, the Martyr, kneeled down to pray for his enemies. Acts 7: 60. Of the suitableness of this posture, then, there can be no doubt; it is recommended by inspired example.

But are other postures allowable? In large assemblies, the people of God anciently seem to have assumed a standing posture. See 2 Chron. 20: 4, 5, 13. And where there are not conveniences for kneeling or where a resort to it would create confusion, standing is a fit testification of our esteem for Him who is the object of our worship. The publican stood afar off, and prayed. Luke 18: 13. Our Saviour says "When ye stand praying," &c. Mark 11: 25.

But for the lazy custom of sitting in time of prayer, we find no sanction in the Scriptures. It is commended neither by precept nor example. We tolerate it, but cannot approve of it. Age, or bodily infirmity, may justify it, or the unreasonable length to which public prayer is sometimes extended, may render it excusable. But it should not be forgotten, that the Christian is to glorify God in his body as well as in his spirit, (1 Cor. 6: 20,) and if glorifying him includes the offering of prayer to his name, it must include—except in cases of sickness or other disability, in which cases He 'will have mercy and not sacrifice'—placing the body in that posture which will be the fittest expression of reverence.

But it is not so much of the posture assumed in time of prayer in public assemblies that we would speak, as of what we often witness in families, at their seasons of devotion. The master of the house kneels and supplicates the blessing of God upon his family, but not [illegible] himself—neither wife, nor child, nor servant. In some cases, we are told, it is the custom for those members of the household who are professors of religion to kneel, while all the rest keep their seats. We believe it is more commonly the case, however, that no one kneels except the person who conducts the exercise. If the household consist of a dozen or twenty persons, the whole group remain bolt-up-right in their chairs, the leader of the exercise alone bowing himself before the high God.

We shall not undertake to denounce this custom as a sin, but we must be permitted to say that we consider it unbecoming. In the first place, we see no necessity for it. The floor of any decent house—and a Christian's house ought always to be decent—is clean enough to kneel upon, while the number of persons together is never sufficiently large to render the act inconvenient. The process of shifting the position from sitting to kneeling is a very simple one, and, except in cases of bodily infirmity, we can conceive of no necessity which would forbid it.

In the second place, it appears irreverent. The leader of the exercise takes a kneeling attitude as a testification of his reverence for the Divine Being. Aside from this reason, why should he not keep his seat? It seems to be taken for granted that he, at least, ought to be reverential enough to kneel. Then why should not the whole family? In coming together for prayer, they "come before God." But if, when they come before him, they take no attitude expressive of reverence, the appearance at least is irreverent, whatever may be the inward state of their hearts.

In the third place, it looks as if none but the master of the house himself prayed. But does he call together his family, simply that he, in his individual capacity, may seek the blessing of God for them? It is quite unnecessary for him to do so. He has a closet, into which he can retire and pour out his heart in their behalf. He does not summon them together, that he may make an ostentatious display of his devotions before them. It is for another object altogether. He does it that they may join him in supplication. It is a united devotion which he proposes. He remembers that, where two are agreed as touching any thing that they shall ask in the name of Christ, it shall be done for them; and trusting that his family will be agreed with him, he bows his knees to the Father of all. Why, then, should not the family bow also?

If it be pretended that the heart is exercised with devotion, though the body makes no outward expression of it, we reply that, where there is no outward manifestation of what the heart feels, the feeling itself gradually decays, till at length it dies altogether. How long will a child feel reverence for his parents, if he never expresses himself reverently, nor by other outward signs shows his respect for them? There is not a parent who does not feel—whether he can explain the philosophy of it or not—that the true way to secure the cordial respect of his children, is to train them up to respectful behavior. This is owing to a law of our nature; and this law holds good in regard to our intercourse with God. If we would nourish and give strength to our reverence for the Most High, we must habituate ourselves to such forms as shall be the fittest outward manifestation of it.

Is it said, that 'the unconverted members of the family ought not to kneel in time of prayer, because to do so would be to express an homage of the heart which they cannot feel?' Then they ought not to be taught any religious duty whatever. The children should not be allowed to read the Scriptures, because the reverence and awe which one should feel when reading God's word, are more than unconverted children can be expected to feel. For the same reason, they should never hear them read; or, certainly, when God speaks, the listener should attend with the most profound reverence. They should never be allowed to sing psalms; for what daring presumption it is to —"mock him with a solemn sound.

Upon a thoughtless tongue."

Those who sing, should sing with the spirit and with the understanding, making melody in their hearts unto the Lord. And they should never be taught any form of prayer, to repeat morning and evening. The child should never be taught to say—

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take;"

for that implies the spirit of prayer, which, it is altogether probable, the child does not feel. In short, the whole religious education of children must be abandoned, lest the outward forms in which it is conducted should imply more than their naturally corrupt hearts can appreciate! And we submit, whether an argument that proves so much, proves any thing at all.

The unconverted children should be taught to kneel; and they should be taught that their kneeling is before the great Searcher of Hearts. The God of the family should be reverenced by the family. The practice of kneeling is itself calculated to inspire reverence; and, while we are training our children to it, God may, peradventure, make it the means of fixing in their hearts that deep and real reverence which is inseparable from true piety.

The heathen child, taught to bow and perform other reverential acts before the idol, grows up with such a feeling of respect for that object of his adoration as pervades his whole nature. The Papist is trained from infancy to bow before the image of the Virgin, to kneel before the Host, to kiss the crucifix, and to speak reverently [illegible] his religion. And what is the consequence? We all know what it is. He loves these symbols of his faith; he venerates them; he adores them; he clings to them with an undying tenacity, nor can you give a greater shock to his nature than to speak disrespectfully of these things. And is it to be supposed that the name of the Almighty God himself is less calculated to fill the heart with reverence than these objects of false worship? Does it not become Christians to take equally as unwearied pains in teaching their children to bow before the High God?

Mere reverence, we grant, is not the whole of religion, and it may exist without that love of holiness and hatred of sin which spring from the New Birth. The child may be taught to feel a trembling awe at the bare mention of the Sacred Name, while his heart still "goeth after its covetousness." But for the regeneration of the child—his new creation after the image of Christ—parents are not responsible. They are responsible only for the use of the means, the impartation of spiritual life being the act of God alone. Yet, for the use of means, parents are and ever will be responsible. And these means must be such as naturally tend to create the deepest reverence for the Being whom it is the duty of the child to love and worship, otherwise they might as well not be used at all. The daily practice of bowing before God certainly tends to this result. The child, if taught to kneel before the Lord his Maker, is thereby taught that he ought to hold his Maker in the most profound reverence.

NATIONAL POPULAR EDUCATION.

The Sixth Annual Meeting of the Board of National Popular Education was held at Cleveland, Ohio, on the 9th inst. Gov. Slade, the indefatigable General Agent, was presents and read the Annual Report, from which the following facts are gleaned:—

The operations of the Board during the past year have been continued with undiminished success. Two classes, the Eleventh and Twelfth, numbering forty-nine, have been collected at Hartford, carried through a course of study, and sent out to the Valley of the Mississippi. Five have been sent to California and one to Oregon, in addition to the five sent to Oregon in 1851. Those sent to California have met with signal success and have awakened a deep interest in the cause of Education.

There has been sent to the Pacific Coast, during the past two years, eleven teachers, beside ninety-three to the Great West.

This Society has been in operation six years, during which time it has sent our three hundred and two teachers. Sixty-eight in 1847; forty-three in 1848; forty-two in 1849; forty-six in 1850; forty-nine in 1851, and fifty-four in 1852.

There have been sent to Indiana, 86; Illinois, 79; Wisconsin, 29; Michigan, 22; Missouri, 18; Ohio, 15; Iowa, 14; Tennessee, 8; Western Pa., 5; Kentucky, 4; Minnesota, 3; North Carolina, 3; Alabama, 3; Texas, 2; Shawnee B. M., 1; Oregon, 6; California, 5.

They have been drawn from the following States: Massachusetts 83, Vermont 80, New York 47, Maine 30, Connecticut 22, New Hampshire 21, Rhode-Island 4, Pennsylvania 4, Virginia 1, Western Reserve, Ohio, 5, Michigan 3, Wisconsin 1, Ireland 1.

Of the entire number 75 have been married, 9 of whom still continue to teach.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday Trade—The Crystal Palace—Syria and Jerusalem.

GLASGOW, December 24th, 1852.

The case of Jennings, who was imprisoned on refusing to pay the fine imposed by our Police Magistrate, for his having sold bread, butter, snuff and other articles on Sunday, has now been adjudicated upon by the Court of Session. Their Lordships were unanimous in deciding that it was not a crime cognizable by the Police Court, and in awarding the expenses incurred by the grocer to be paid by the Procurator Fiscal. The Town Council are, however, about to apply to Parliament for a new Police Bill for the city, and one of its cleuses is for power to close shops on Sunday. They may not succeed in this, perhaps.

The Sunday opening of the Crystal Palace still occupies much of the public attention, and various means have been suggested by which the Directors may evade the force of the old act, 21 of Geo. III. The Record, which somewhat confidently intimated lately that no application would be made to Parliament for the repeal of the prohibitory clause, now more confidently asserts that there is no doubt that this will be done in February. It was also affirmed, that the statutory notices of such intention could not be made, the due period of such notice having already expired; it is now as plainly declared, that no such notices are necessary, and efforts are being made to procure petitions signed by large numbers of the working classes in favor of the Sunday opening. Mr. H. Mayhew, author of a work on London Labor and the London Poor, is circulating a printed letter in the same cause, and is organizing the Trades' Unions for an appeal to Parliament, thus neutralizing the effect of the Church petitions. It is intended to ask the Legislature to authorize also the Sunday opening of public Museums, Galleries of Pictures, &c. On the 15th instant, the London Temperance League held a meeting, at which Mr. G. Cruickshanks, the chairman, read a letter he had written to the Directors, inquiring if it was designed that spirituous or fermented liquors be sold in the Palace during the week. The Secretary's reply strongly declaring that they would be wholly excluded, was also read, and from the manner in which it was received by the meeting, it is hardly to be doubted, that the company have thereby secured the countenance of a large number of the community more interested in the promotion of temperence by abstinance than by the influence of religion on the heart, whether that religion be cherished on Sunday or Sabbath. Having formerly mentioned the case of the Rev. H. V. Elliot of Brighton, who affirmed that large sums were paid for the advocacy in the Times of the opening of the Palace on Sunday, it is due to him to state, that he distinguishes between the writers in the Times and the Times itself—so as to believe, that the writers he refers to may be even paid additionally by the Times, instead of the editors or proprietors receiving a bribe directly themselves. The Times refused to give insertion to a long letter explanatory of this distinction.

Syria and Jerusalem are coming more and more into notice on the part of the crowned heads. Two powers are assuming even a position which may hereafter become still more interesting and important in reference to the Holy Land. The new Emperor of France takes to himself the title of Protector of the Holy Places—meaning those to which tradition assigns interest and association. In this he is the champion especially of the Church of Rome; and he lately obtained by the French ambassador at Constantinople, a firman from the Sultan, in favor of her members. Russia, however, as the head and protector of the Greek Church, was indignant at this preeminence; and the Sultan, to please that party, issued another firman in their favor. But now is the time of difficulty, for these two opposite decrees cannot both stand. Commissioners were appointed to settle the differences; but accounts from Jerusalem of Oct. 26th say, that these Commissioners had separated a few days before without being able to accomplish that object, and that the opposite parties appeared to be farther off than ever from an understanding. Still more recent intelligence from Constantinople (Dec. 5,) intimates that M. Lavalette declared that if the firman giving possession of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre to the Papists were proclaimed at Jerusalem, he would demand his passports; while the Russian ambassador intimated that if the Greek claims were not on the contrary acknowledged there according to the second firman, war would be declared. The Lord grant protection to His poople at Bethlehem, and give them grace to look to His protection when troubles thus arise.

Prospects of Protestantism, &c.

GLASGOW, Dec. 31st, 1852.

The year, as it closes, witnesses the inauguration of a new Cabinet in this country, probably still more indifferent than its predecessor to the principles of Protestantism. Lord Aberdeen, the Prime Minister, although a member of the Church of Scotland, is said to have Tractarian leanings, while Mr. Gladstone's adherence to these is potent. He had not scope enough in the Church of England for his Church Popery, and therefore connected himself with the Episcopal Church in Scotland, whose principles, or apostacy, more closely assimilate it to Rome. And in the present day we have need of men more determined to abide by the truth of God. Popery is an enemy, open and avowed, to all who shall dare to prefer the Inspired Word to its traditions. And the boldness with which it is prepared now to act out its intolerance, is well illustrated by the case of the imprisoned Madiai. In that case it is not the Duke of Tuscany, and his personal hatred of the truth, but the enmity of the Pope and priesthood, by whom he is led. They, therefore, are not afraid, in the face of the church and the world, to imprison men and women for the reading of the Holy Scriptures. They are not influenced to withdraw from public gaze, by directing their tool at Florence to set at liberty, even when their health has been much impaired, those whose only crime is a love to "the faithful word." By the recent accounts it is doubted if these persecuted ones can long survive. To their imprisonment is added the pain of frequent visits from a Popish ecclesiastic, charged with the office of effecting their conversion—as a return to Popery would be miscalled. The Grand Duchess, and even the Archbishop, visited the female confessor with entreaties that she would return to the church she had left. The dignitary, although he wholly failed in his aim, with mock humility, begged to be remembered in Flora's prayers. It was expected that the Grand Duke would have been strained into an act of moderation, and was even said that he had promised to the King of Prussia that they should have been released before now. This not having been done, it has been stated that that monarch has given instruction to M. Usedom, the Prussian Ambassador at Rome, to repair to Florence to renew his solicitations in behalf of the humble Protestant prisoners.

Papists in this country were wont to talk of it as slander when Protestants alledged that their church had never renounced her persecuting dogmas. And there are some of them who seemed ashamed of such doings, and Mr. Sergeant Shee, M. P., in a public speech, spoke of the conduct of the Grand Duke as of an atrdciously wicked character. He was, however, sharply reprimanded by the Editor of the Tablet, Mr. F. Lucas, (once a Quaker,) although he had himself, in the very act of becoming a Papist, exercised the right of private judgment which he would deny to those becoming Protestant. Yet this man was member of a Committee of a Society which professed to have for its aim the securing of religious equality in Ireland. Yes! it is equality that is demanded where there is no hope of dominancy being obtained; but where, as in Florence, they have the ascendancy, intolerance to all who refuse to yield to the dictates of apostacy is the law. Spain has in this exceeded the usual limits of prudence, in that she is stated to have just issued a decree requiring compliance with the Romish faith, even from strangers sojourning within her dominions.

The aspects of Providence are indeed ominous. But, as a yielding to apostacy, and making void the law of God by human traditions, is provoking in His sight, He may leave the nations to feel the weight of the burden that neither we nor our fathers could bear. His is the easy yoke and He it is who gives strength to those who look to Him for it.

REVIVAL AT HOUNSFIELD, N. Y.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Having received an invitation from the church in Hounsfield, Jefferson Co., N. Y., to hold some religious meetings with them, I journeyed thither, and commenced there Dec. 10th, and closed my labors Jan. 2d. To those acquainted with the religious state of things in that vicinity, I need not say, that to all human appearance, faith could stand on but little else than the promise of God. As there were some things connected with the management of those meetings which by some are considered as having a tendency to hinder a revival, I beg leave to remark—

1. That entire freedom of speech was allowed to all. The congregation was composed of Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Christians, Trinitarians, Unitarians, Arians, Universalists, Infidels, and others. Believing that freedom of speech is a right which inheres in all, I freely extended that right to each one. And I am happy to say, that during the whole series of meetings, there occurred nothing to wound the feelings of any. Had I not been convinced before of the safety of such order, the results of that meeting would have removed every doubt.

2. That the preaching was designed to be both interesting and instructive. No effort was made to excite the feelings, otherwise than by the power of truth. The standard of Christain character was Christ's sermon on the Mount, and its practical bearings on man individually and collectively were explained and enforced. The unchristian attitude of the present professed Christian world, as it stands identified with slavery, war, and other political organic sins, were freely discussed. The ground was taken, that a Christian could not consistently aid or abet any human government which countenanced either slavery, war, or the taking of judicial oaths, as Christianity forbids them all.

3. That great fundamental truth of Christianity, viz. the overcoming of evil with good, was shown to be a necessary part of a Christian profession; that all resort to brutal force, by individuals or nations, was anti-Christian, and that it was the immediate duty of the Christian world to disband its armies, and put a stop to human butcheries; that it was equally the duty of individuals and nations to suffer for righteousness, and that it was by suffering, rather than fighting, that prosperity was promised; and that the church was designed to demonstrate the power of godliness in this way.

4. That the gospel embodied a perfect remedy for all moral evil here and hereafter; that faith in Christ secured a full and free pardon for all past offenses, when connected with true repentance or reformation.

5. The Sabbath as a memorial of creation's work was shown to be of perpetual obligation, and the immersion of the body in water as a symbol of a new creature, and a future resurrection, were also not forgotten.

In short, I allowed myself the utmost freedom and latitude of thought in my preaching, and the result has fully convinced me that such meetings can be conducted upon the broad platform of freedom of discussion.

6. The result. Christians were apparently much refreshed, although they experienced great searchings of heart; numerous backsliders were reclaimed; while some forty-five openly renounced their sins, and embraced Christianity. Among them were those who had been notorious sinners in community. There was also the convert from Universalism and Infidelity, if not Atheism. Quite a proportion were adults. Seldom has it been my privilege to participate in a revival apparently so salutary to a community and so refreshing to the people of God. The remembrance of it, together with the Christian association there enjoyed, will not soon be forgotten. I ought also to mention the respectful demeanor of all who attended. And on all of the friends there, who by their hospitality and kindness rendered my visit so pleasant to myself, I fervently invoke the blessing of our Heavenly Father.

REVIVAL IN A COLLEGE.

The day annually devoted to prayer for revivals in colleges, is at hand. In hope of stimulating some to greater earnestness on this behalf, we copy from the Independent the following letter of Rev. J. M. Sturtevant, President of Illinois College, annnouncing a revival now progressing in that Institution:—

"This letter will convey to you joyful intelligence. God hath visited his people. The present is a time of refreshing religious interest in Jacksonville, and in that interest the college shares largely. Indeed the first decided tokens for good were at college. The interest in the Institution has been pervading and absorbing. From twelve to fifteen have seemed to come out on the Lord's side, and many others are deeply affected. Those who have given evidence of a decided change are, a large proportion of them, from our advanced classes, and among our most influential and promising minds.

"Besides the conversion of sinners, the work has brought cold back-slidden Christians to confession and renewed consecration; and some, who have hitherto scarcely lived Christ, to declare that they have not been Christians, and that they have now determined not only to live Christ, but to preach his Gospel as the work of their lives. There is much reason to hope that this harvest season will bring to the aid of the church a number of gifted minds devoted to the ministry. The work is now quite extensive in the Congregational and Methodist churches. Both of the Female Seminaries are much blessed. The Christmas holidays compel a season of release from study at college, and we have some apprehension as to the result; but we hope for much yet.

"I feel that this blessed work is largely owing, under God, to the steady faithfulness of a few young men in college. We have had for some years past a few choice spirits, and we have this year some valuable accessions to their ranks. I think the time is not distant when the churches will feel our college as they have not done before in raising up ministers. God's mercies to us this year are indeed wonderful, and I desire to call on all that is within me to bless his holy name. This has not come upon us without an evident previous preparation of the way of the Lord. Our weekly prayer meeting has, from an early period of the term, been attended by nearly half of our whole number of students—thirty to forty present in an evening. And there is great reason to hope that religion has gained an ascendency and power in the institution which it has not had for many years.

EDUCATION IN MASSACHUSETTS.

The following paragraph from the Message of the new Governor of Massachusetts, shows a most gratifying condition of the educational interests of that Commonwealth. God speed the day when the Governor of each State of our Union may with truth use such language in relation to the territory over which he rules.

"The cause of Education has ever been regarded by our people as second to none of the great interests committed to the care and guardianship of the State. Among the first to enlist the warmest sympathies, and to secure the efficient aid of the early colonists, it has continued to receive from their descendants to the present hour, a constant, if not at all times an adequate, support. Our colleges, founded and fostered by the wise and far-seeing liberality of individuals, from the two mites which were cast into their treasuries by the needy pilgrim, to the princely munificence of their endowments in later days, cannot fail to be regarded with deep interest by an intelligent Legislature. The manner in which they have been conducted, has secured for them the foremost rank among similar institutions in the country; and they now furnish to our youth the opportunity of acquiring an education of enlarged and liberal culture. But the peculiar glory of Massachusetts is to be found in the origin and history of our system of Common Schools, which have been cherished and extended, until no child of the two hundred thousand living within her borders may not, and there are few who do not, receive in them the rudiments of a common education, at the public charge. This, however, should be regarded but as one stage of our progress in the right direction. It should be the object of the Government eventually to establish and maintain in them a system of instruction so thorough and efficient that every child may have furnished to him at the public expense, an education which will fit him adequately to discharge all the ordinary duties, both public and private, of a man and a citizen. This is an object worthy of the highest ambition of an enlightened and Christian commonwealth; and no enlightened and Christian commonwealth should rest satisfied until this object is attained. That Massachusetts has proposed to itself this high purpose, its legislation for the last fifteen years—in the creation of the Board of Education—the institution and support of Normal Schools—the establishment of Teachers' Institutes and School Libraries—with other kindred measures, clearly indicates. The statistics which will be furnished to you from the office of the Board of Education, and to which in this connection, I can only refer, will exhibit a gratifying and encouraging progress in this great work; which, like all others of a moral and intellectual character, intended to operate upon an extensive scale, must necessarily be slow; and which, for this reason, must be pursued with patient energy, with no diminution of means or effort, and with no abatement of heart nor hope. It will be my pleasure to coöperate with you, and with the Board of Education, in whatever measures may, after mature deliberation, be adopted for the promotion of a cause so beneficent and noble as the education of the whole people."

A MODEL NEW-YEAR GIFT.—Rev. Lyman Beecher, of Boston, who is 77 years old, received the following letter on the 1st inst., which contained, as is indicated, about as appropriate a New Year's gift as could be offered to a faithful minister of the gospel in his declining years:—

BOSTON, Jan. 1, 1853.

REV. LYMAN BEECHER, D. D.—Dear Sir: Permit us, in behalf of ourselves, and the several gentlemen whose names are enclosed, to ask your acceptance of a life annuity of five hundred dollars per annum, a policy for which we now send you. We take this occasion, dear sir, to assure you of the high appreciation in which your former ministration in this city, and your more public labors here and elsewhere are still held by your old friends, and to express the wish that you may yet have many years of health and happiness to spend amongst us. With sentiments of highest regard, we remain your obedient servants.

THE CRIME OF HAVING A BIBLE.—At a recent meeting of the N. Y. Bible Society, among other facts of interest, it was stated that in April, 1852, the Agent, in the course of his regular distribution, had furnished a Bible in the Italian language to Agostino Francis, mate of the brig Anna, of Palermo, Sicily, at his earnest request. A few weeks since, while visiting another Sicilian brig, the Agent learned from the mate of the latter vessel, that Agostino Francis had been discovered after his return to Palermo to be the possessor of the Bible, which had been procured by him at New York, and for this crime has been arrested and sentenced to imprisonment for ten months, and a fine of $60.

LIBERAL BEQUESTS.—Mark H. Newman, Esq., whose death we recently noticed, left by his will $25,000 to the American Home Missionary Society, to be invested by his executor, and the interest, so much as was needed, applied to the support of his children, until the youngest becomes of age—the whole to be then paid to the Society, After specific legacies to his children and other family friends, he gave also $10,000 to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and then made the American Home Missionary Society his residuary legatee. From this residue it is expected a large amount will be realized to the Society. It was his injunction to have his estate so settled up as to make the most of it for this object of benevolence.

A GENEROUS GIFT.—Mrs. Harriet L. Packer, widow of the late Wm. L. Packer, has signified her intention to appropriate $65,000 for the endowment of a Female Academy, to be located on the brow of the Brooklyn Hights. The Trustees of the Institution have in their hands a surplus of $15,000, which, added to Mrs. Packer's donation, is sufficient to build and furnish an edifice that will be an honor and an ornament to the city. At a late meeting of the Trustees, they resolved to appropriate the stock of the present Academy, amounting to $32,000, to the establishment of an Academy for Boys on the same scale as the Institution for Girls.

PRAYER FOR ITALY.—In reporting the visit of an English deputation to the imprisoned Madiais, Earl Cavan said:—

"My esteemed friend, Capt. Trotter, suggested to them a union in prayer with Christians, on Saturday evenings, for an abatement of this persecution, and that, 'whether by life or by death, such a torch may thereby be lighted throughout Italy, as may never go out till the Lord come,' and in this I trust all who are interested in the suffering Madiais will join."

SPREAD OF TRUTH.—The Earl of Cavan, one of the Deputation to Florence on behalf of the Madiais, says:—

"It is an interesting fact that the Jews in Italy are great helpers forward of the printing of the Scriptures, from the conviction that, hateful to them as the New Testament is, it is, they believe, the destined weapon which will break down the still more odious system of idolatrous Rome."

TOO MANY CONGREGATIONS.—The Lutheran Standard says: "As a general thing, our ministers serve too many congregations. Some have four, others six, and others again even eight congregations to whom they regularly minister. Of course, a number of weeks intervene between the public services; much of their time is spent on horseback; they are scarcely able to meet all the calls for funeral and other services; and pastoral visits are almost wholly neglected."

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JAN. 10.

The Senate devoted the session to a discussion of the Clayton and Bulwer Treaty, and requested the President to transmit all correspondence between Mr. Lawrence, late Minister at the Court of St. James, and the British Government in regard to Central America, and particularly any correspondence relating to the claims of Great Britain to the Musquito Coast, or any portion of the territory of Honduras or Yucatan.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Deficiency bill. Mr. Bell made a speech on Manifest Destiny, Mr. Skelton against conferring the title of Lieut. General on Winfield Scott, and Mr. Weightman in defense of New Mexico.

THIRD-DAY, JAN. 11.

In the Senate, Iowa put in another claim for more land for railroads. After various unimportant business, on motion of Mr. Chase, the Senate went into Executive Session, and therein the injunction of secrecy was removed on the proceedings touching the Clayton and Bulwer Treaty, by a vote of 31 to 25. A message was received from the President on the same topic.

The House of Representatives passed the day in discussing the Secretary of the Treasury, and in having a flout at the shinplaster currency of the District.

FOURTH-DAY, JAN. 12.

In the Senate, the principal subject was the action of Great Britain in relation to Central America. Mr. Soulé resumed and finished his speech. He labored to show that the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty could only have passed the Senate under the general impression that in that instrument the British Government gave up all rights in Central America, save that of cutting dye-stuffs in Honduras, went into a history of the action of Great Britain in the premises, and finally expressed his hope that the matter would come before the Senate in such a shape that that body could inform England that if there be any doubt as to the provisions of the Treaty, that we will give notice of our intention to suspend its effect. The debate was continued by several of the Senators, and at length closed for the day by Mr. Mangum.

The House was mainly occupied in further discussing the bill to prevent frauds upon the Treasury.

FIFTH-DAY, JAN. 13.

In the Senate, the only topic of interest was Mr. Gwin's project for a railroad to the Pacific, which called forth, in addition to Mr. G.'s own speech, favorable ones from several distinguished members, Mr. Seward among them, and counter projects from Messrs. Hamlin and Rusk. Without taking any action in the premises the Senate adjourned.

In the House, there was a long discussion on the bill to prevent frauds on the Treasury, (by the prosecution of private claims against the Government,) and the bill was read a third time, but before question was taken on its passage the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, JAN. 14.

In the Senate, John M. Clayton's credentials as Senator from Delaware were presented. Various resolutions were offered and private bills passed. The announcement of the death of Senator Upham caused an adjournment to Second-day.

In the House, the bill to prevent frauds upon the Treasury passed by a vote of 134 to 23. Mr. Marshall, of Cal., asked leave to introduce the $10,000,000 resolution, but objection was made, and so the House entered into a good old-fashioned crusade against Banks, the particular point being to prevent the circulation of small bills in the District of Columbia.

European News.

The steamer Arabia, with Liverpool dates to Jan. 1, arrived at New York on the 16th inst.

A new Ministry is the principal item of news from England.

On Monday, 27th, Liverpool was visited with the most violent gale that has been felt for years. The gale commenced on Sunday night, from the southwest, and reached its height on Monday morning. Considerable damage was done to the shipping, and it is feared that further disasters will be reported.

The Colonial-built (St. Johns, N. B.) ship Marco Polo, 1,625 tuns, Captain Forbes, has made the unrivalled passage from Liverpool, 4th July, to Melbourne, Australia, in 68 days, and back in 75. She sailed from Melbourne 11th October, and arrived at Liverpool 26th December.

A paragraph in a London paper says that the steamship City of Glasgow, on her late arrival, brought from Philadelphia a package addressed to a Member of the British Parliament and containing 100,000 Kossuth notes, which were duly delivered to their destination.

The Paris Moniteur publishes a decree naming the Emperor's uncle, Jerome Bonaparte, successor to the throne in default of legitimate or adopted heirs.

The Minister of the Interior has decided on carrying out Napoleon I.'s plan or idea, to make the entrance into Paris by the Barrière d'Etoile the most magnificent in Europe. A space of 170 yards is to be cleared around the arch as an exercise ground for the troops and for public fêtes.

The Pope refuses to allow casts to be made for the Crystal Palace at Sydenham (London) from the works of art in Rome.

In the dominions of the Grand Duke of Tuscany the punishment of death has just been revived for "offenses against religion." A mere "suspicion" of such offenses is punishable with imprisonment for three years. As far as control can be established over thoughts, it is committed unreservedly to the hands of the priesthood. All schools not under the immediate management of priests will, at the expiration of twelve months from the present time, be absolutely suppressed.

Edward Murray has been safely transported to the end of his journey, and is now lodged in the state prison of Palliano. Exertions are still being made in his behalf, and it is inferred, in spite of the present unyielding spirit of the Government, that a diminution in the term of his penalty will shortly be achieved.

A paragraph in the Madras Gazette of Nov. 26, mentions that the Marquis de Lisboa, a young Portuguese nobleman serving as midshipman on board the British ship of war Hastings, was accidentally shot dead by Prince Ernest of Saxe Leiningen, also serving as a midshipman in the same ship. The young men had been hunting, and the Prince in sport snapped a gun at his friend, believing it to be unloaded.

An extract from a letter dated Lisbon Dec. 20, says that Mr. Heald (Lola Montez's husband) went out in one of the vessels of the Royal Yacht Club, having in his company a beautiful young lady. The yacht foundered in sight of the British war steamer Inflexible, which instantly manned a boat, with fourteen hands, to rescue them. Not only were they unsuccessful, but all hands were drowned.

A tragical event has been made known at Lloyd's, to the effect that on the 20th October a mutiny broke out among a party of Chinese on board of the British bark Gertude, from Amoy to Havana, and that seventeen of the Chinese had been shot by the captain and crew. The bark put into Singapore, when, from the investigation that was held, it appeared that what the captain took for the mutiny was merely a row among the Chinese, but having no interpreter on board, the Chinaman were unable to make themselves understood.

The Court of Rome has recently addressed to all the European powers a circular, in which it invites them to interest themselves in the state of the Hergezewina and Bosnia, where the Christians are suffering from the persecutions of the Turks.

Eighty-seven persons belonging to the best families in Rome have been arrested for circulating caricatures of Napoleon III.

The following is the British Cabinet as newly organized under Lord Aberdeen:—

Earl of Aberdeen, First Lord of the Treas.
Lord Cramworth, Lord Chancellor.
Mr. Gladstone, Chancellor of Exchequer.
Lord Palmerston, Home Secretary.
Lord John Russell, Foreign Secretary.
Duke of Newcastle, Colonial Secretary.
Sir Jas. Graham, 1st Lord of the Admiralty.
Earl Granville, President of the Council.
Duke of Argyle, Lord Privy Seal.
Hon. Sydney Herbert, Secretary of War.
Sir C. Wood, Pres. of the Board of Control.
Sir W. Molesworth, 1st Com. of Public W'ks.
Marquis of Lansdowne, a Seat in the Cabinet, (without office.)

China.

By the arrival of the bark Palmetto, 40 days from Shanghae, files of the North China Herald up to the 31st October have been received at San Francisco, four days later than our last advices by the way of England.

The cholera has made its reäppearance at Ningpo, and has proved fatal in a large number of cases in five hours, and even within a shorter period, after the first attack.

The Herald asserts that in no other port in the world have so many magnificent vessels been assembled together at one time as at Shanghae during the present season.

Capt. Sylvester, of the clipper ship Aramingo, died at Shanghae on the 1st of Nov., as the ship dropped down the stream on her return to New York. Capt. Hinkley, of the Oread, also from this port, died a few days previous to her arrival, and was buried at Shanghae.

The total amount of Green and Black Teas exported from the port of Shanghae to the United States, from the 1st of July to the 28th of October, was 10,268,101, being an excess of 6,684,471 over the exports for the same period last year.

The Herald is in raptures at the prospected steam communication between Shanghae and San Francisco. It will not be long before the necessary arrangements for the establishment of such a line are completed.

During the year ending Sept. 30, 1852, the total tonnage moored in the harbor of Shanghae was 182 vessels, of 78,165 tons. Of these 102 were British, tonnage 38,420, 66 American, tonnage 36,532; other nations, not more than two vessels each, with an average tonnage of 500.

The pirates of Ningpo recently captured an enormous and richly-laden junk belonging to the King of Siam.

Four churches have been erected in Ningpo by the Protestant Missionaries. Others are projected.

Solid Gas.—Murdock first used gas to light up his office at Redrath in 1792. "It would," says Liebig, "be one of the greatest discoveries of the age, if any one could succeed in condensing coal gas into a white, dry, solid, odorless substance; portable, and capable of being placed on a candlestick or burned in a lamp." Already is the desire of Liebig being accomplished. A mineral oil flowed out of coal in Derbyshire, obviously produced by slow distillation from the coal. On examination it has been ascertained that paraffine, a solid, waxy substance, hitherto never produced from coal, could be formed in commercial qualities by a slow and regular distillation. This is condensed coal gas—a solid form of olefiant gas desired by Liebig. In forming cake, this product, dissolved in an oil of a similar composition, may be readily obtained instead of the water-gases now thrown away. Should this discovery be as successful as it promises, a great change will be wrought in fuel as well as illuminating gas.

The New Motive Power.—The second trial trip of the Caloric ship Ericsson came off last week, and is represented by the papers as highly successful. There are, it is true, some defects in the machinery; but these, it is thought, will easily be obviated in other ships. When we can find an intelligible account of the new engine we will print it.

Another company of missionaries has sailed for Smyrna, consisting of Rev. Messrs. Benton, Marsh, Walker and Nutting, with their wives. Mr. and Mrs. Benton, formerly at Aleppo, expect to be stationed on Mount Lebanon, on their return to Syria. Mr. Marsh has spent some time in Mosul already, and he now goes thither again. Mr. and Mrs. Walker are destined to Diarbekr, on the Tigris. Mr. and Mrs. Nutting will be stationed in some part of the Armenian field.

There is a delightful religious interest with the Baptist church at Valley Forge, Pa., Meetings have been recently held which have been attended with great power and effect. Twelve were baptized on a recent Sabbath. There are more candidates awaiting the ordinance. Inquiries are multiplying. It is the first revival experienced within the last eight years.

SUMMARY.

A prominent steamboat owner of this City, who has made an immense fortune in steamboating, has devised a novel, most liberal, and magnificent plan for disbursing some of his gains. He proposes to rig in the most perfect style a steamer yacht, now nearly completed, furnishing her in the richest manner, at a cost of $50,000 over ordinary ships of the kind. About the first of May he will take on board his sons and daughters and forty or fifty other guests, and sail for London, Copenhagen, Stockholm, St. Petersburg, Havre, Bordeaux, Lisbon, Gibraltar, Marseilles, Naples, Malta, and such other ports as may be desirable, staying a short time at each port, giving fêtes and seeing the lions. The entire expense, is estimated at more than $200,000.

The people of the small but delightful island of Madeira are on the brink of starvation; the fact is beyond doubt. The cause simply is the dependence of the population almost wholly on the cultivation of the Vine, and the utter failure of the Grape harvest in 1852. With Wine they have been accustomed to buy most of their food and all their clothing; and, the Grape having failed, they have nothing wherewith to pay; and while the wealthy and forehanded are pinched, the poor are reduced to the last extremity. Of the 80,000 inhabitants of the island, probably 60,000 are to-day needy, while 40,000 must perish unless assisted from abroad.

On the trial of an Irishman in Cambridge, Mass., a few days since for stealing a pair of 'pants,' the fact was proved beyond question by the concurrent testimony of nine witnesses, and no witnesses were introduced by the defendant; but his counsel took occasion to ask the Court what were "pants." He had looked in the Dictionary, and found that they were a sort of breathing operation. He moved that the complaint be dismissed, on the ground that it did not specify the article alledged to have been stolen. The motion was entertained, and before a new complaint could be made out, Paddy was out of sight.

In December, 1849, two boys of Philander French, named Lafayette and Jerome, left their father's residence in Independence, Buchanan County, Iowa, and have not since returned. Their mother was dead, and their father had gone East at the time. It is supposed that they became lonely, and started to find their father, as they were heard of once, in Michigan. They were then but 12 and 9 years of age, and though four years have elapsed, the father does not yet relinquish his search.

A resolution was recently introduced into the Senate of New Hampshire, declaring the "religious test" in the constitution of that State "unjust, anti-republican, and contrary to the spirit of the present age," and that when the proper time for holding a Convention to revise the Constitution shall arrive, the members will spare no efforts to induce the people to assist the calling of such a Convention, and to abrogate the test. This resolution passed the Senate unanimously, and by a vote of 209 to 9 in the House.

On Monday of last week Mr. James H. Cooley, lately connected with educational movements in San Francisco, took charge of a Mission Day School, which is to be conducted in the building now going up on the site of the Old Brewery, New York. There were 150 of the children of the Five Points present on Monday. It is conducted under the auspices of the ladies of the Home Missionary Society, some of whom have personally attended to gathering them in to the enjoyment of educational advantages.

A correspondent of the Watchman and Reflector says, of Thompson, Ct.: "A blessed reviving influence of the Holy Spirit has been experienced in this town, making the waste places to rejoice. In the eastern section of the town, in the Methodist society especially, a powerful work of grace has taken place, and the work is spreading. Our meetings are very solemn, and a soft and gentle influence, like a heavenly dew, is upon us, quickening the saints, awakening sinners, and giving hope and peace to trembling penitents."

At a few minutes past 11 o'clock Monday morning, Dec. 11, a fire caught in the partition or ceiling of Ward School-House 30, in Twenty-fourth-st., near Eighth-av., N. Y., by some unexplained defect in the flue. There were more than 2,000 children in the house at the time; but by the coolness and promptness of the teachers they were all dismissed without accident of any kind, or even alarm. The fire was speedily extinguished, without material damage to the edifice.

Emigrant Train at 5 P.M., via Piermont.

Light.

THE subscribers invite the attention of all persons who desire a cheap, brilliant, and safe light, to their Safety Phosgene Lamps and materials for burning.

They are also manufacturers of Burning Fluid and Camphene, together with the various kinds of Lamps, all of which they offer, wholesale and retail, on the best terms.

Call and see, at 117 Fulton-street.

Sept. 16—6m. CHAS. STARR, Jr., & Co.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand; and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Just Published.

SLAVERY AND ANTI-SLAVERY: A History of the Great Struggle in Both Hemispheres; with a View of the Slavery Question in the United States. By William Goodell, author of "The Democracy of Christianity."

This work is designed to embody a great amount of historical information in a single volume, conveniently arranged for reference. It contains fifty chapters on as many distinct topics, embracing the most important facts in the political and ecclesiastical history of the contest, together with an account of the Anti-Slavery agitation in England and the United States up to the present time; the divisions among American Abolitionists, and the various measures advocated among them; and closing with a brief discussion of the question, "What ought to be done?" The book is an abstract of several volumes, besides the Anti-Slavery history of the last twenty years, a great part of which has never before been collected into any volume, but lies scattered in the newspapers of that period. The Table of Contents and a copious Alphabetical Index will facilitate a reference to particular facts, and to dates when desirable.

It is a large royal 12mo. volume, of about six hundred pages, well printed, on handsome paper, neatly bound in cloth, and lettered. Price one dollar per copy, at retail; $9 per dozen, or $65 per hundred, to booksellers and book pedlars, for cash.

The postage on a single copy will be 30 cents to any part of the United States, and must be prepaid.

For sale by the publisher, William Harned, 48 Beekman-street, New York.

THE DEMOCRACY OF CHRISTIANITY, or an Analysis of the Bible and its Doctrines, in their relation to the principle of democracy. By William Goodell. Cady and Burgess, New York. Sold also by William Harned, 48 Beekman-street, New York. The first volume is occupied with an examination of the Old Testament; the second volume carries the investigation into the New, shows the bearing of the leading doctrines of the Gospel upon the principle of democracy, examines the institutions of the New Testament, traces the progress and the influence of Christianity in promoting human liberty, to the present time, and, in the light of Scripture prophecy, as illustrated by the signs of the times, unfolds the future prospects of humanity. The work is designed to promote liberty, both in the Church and the State, and to show that the cause of human freedom is identified with the Christian religion.

Price $1 50 at retail, $12 per dozen, or $90 per hundred.

An Edition for the Million.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN FOR 37½ CENTS!—We have yielded to the repeated and urgent solicitations of numerous friends of humanity, and now offer to them, and to the public generally—TO THE LIVING MASSES—an edition of Mrs. Stowe's unrivaled work, at a price so low as to bring it within the means of every person. It seems a work of supererogation to speak in complimentary terms of a book,

ONE MILLION COPIES OF WHICH

have been printed, in this country and in Europe, in a little more than six months—a sale which has no counterpart in the world's history. Yet, notwithstanding this immense sale, there are hundreds of thousands in our own country, who have not yet perused the glowing pages of UNCLE TOM'S CABIN, many of whom have been prevented from doing so, from inability to purchase. To remove this obstacle, we have issued this edition

☞ FOR THE MILLION. ☜

And millions will now read it, and own it, and drink in its heavenly principles, and the living generations of men will imbibe its noble sentiments, and generations yet unborn will rise up and bless its author, and thank the God of Heaven for inspiring a noble woman to utter such glowing, burning truths, for the redemption of the oppressed millions of our race.

To Booksellers, Philanthropists, or Societies, who wish to purchase the above by the thousand, for sale or distribution, a liberal discount will be made. The edition is very neatly printed, in a large octavo pamphlet of 166 pages, double columns, thick paper covers, and firmly stitched. We now offer to the public the following editions:

	Retail.
Uncle Tom's Cabin. Edition for the Million,	$0 37½
Uncle Tom's Cabin in German, (in press, to be published about the 1st of January, 1853.)	0 50

JOHN P. JEWETT & CO., Publishers, Boston.
Jewett, Proctor & Washington, Cleveland, Ohio.

☞ P. S.—Mrs. Stowe is now preparing, and in a few days will offer to the public, being a complete refutation of some charges which have been made against her on account of alleged overstatements of facts in Uncle Tom. It will make a pamphlet of about 100 pages, double columns, and will present original facts and documents, most thoroughly establishing the truth of every statement in her book. Price 25 cents.

☞ A KEY TO UNCLE TOM'S CABIN,

Water.

BY WILLIAM OLAND BOURNE.

"Water! Water!" cries the bird,
With his singing, gentle note;
And the liquid cry is heard
Pouring from the little throat;
Water! Water! clear and sweet!
To-weet! To-weet!

"Water! Water!" roars the ox,
While it rushes at his side,
Down among the mossy rocks
Rippling with its crytal tide;
Water! Water! pure and true!
"Moo! Moo!"

"Water! Water!" said the tree,
With its branches spreading high;
"Water! Water!" rustled he,
For his leaves were very dry;
Water! Water! for the tree!—
Pure and free!

"Water! Water!" said the flower,
Whispering with its perfumed breath;
"Let me have it in an hour,
Ere I thirsting droop in death!
Water, water, soft and still,
Is my will!"

"Water! Water!" said the grain,
With its yellow head on high;
And the spreading, fertile plain,
Ripening, joined the swelling cry;
Water for the grains of gold!
Wealth untold!

Water! Water! sparkling, pure,
Giveth Nature every where—
If you drink it, I am sure
It will never prove a snare!
Water is the thing for me—
Yes! and thee!

Water! Water! young and old!
Drink it, crystal-like and sweet!
Never heed the tempter bold!—
Crush him underneath your feet!
Water! Water! Youth, for thee—
Thee and me!

A Special Providence.

"What is a special Providence?" said a lady to a clergyman, who formed one of a cheerful winter's evening party, seated around a brightly blazing fire, which cast its ruddy light over an antiquely wainscotted room in which they were assembled.

"My dear madam," said he, drawing his chair still closer to the hearth, "you have touched upon a subject which perhaps I can better illustrate by anecdote than argument."

"By anecdote? That will be delightful," said a chorus of voices.

"The story which I am about to relate," said the clergymen, "although possibly one of the most remarkable of its kind, is yet no less true than strange. About fifteen years ago I was appointed—I was then a young man—to a curacy in the town of Bradford, in the woolen districts of Yorkshire. Soon after my arrival, the town was electrified by the reports of robberies mysteriously perpetrated at a large mill in the neighborhood; but, although of almost daily occurrence, and notwithstanding the most vigilant means were employed, all attempts to discover the guilty party were for a long time of no avail. The article stole was cloth. The theft was effected by cutting pieces of a yard or so in length from the long rolls in the warehouse. The first intimation which the firm obtained of the robbery, was by the return of a large quantity of goods upon their hands, marked 'short lengths.' They felt their honor, as men of business, involved, and immediately a searching investigation took place. All the 'rolls' in the warehouse were remeasured, and the result proved that nearly one half of the stock had been tampered with. The hands employed in the warehouse and mill were upwards of a thousand in number, and each was subjected to a long and painful inquiry. Nothing definite, however, was elicited. But, although the theft was not brought home to any one, more than fiffy persons were discharged on suspicion.

Notwithstanding these precautions, however, reports of fresh robberies were from time to time circulated, and the thief seemed to bid fair to elude detection; but the daring delinquent was at length discovered. One of the partners in the firm being called by business to Sheffield, saw there, exposed for sale, in the window of a tailor's shop, a waistcoat piece, of a pattern and quality made only, and that too very recently, by their own house—so recently, indeed, that to be fully prepared for the probable demand, they were still manufacturing, and had not, as yet, sent a single piece into the market. The gentleman immediately communicated with the police authorities; the tailor was waited upon, underwent a long examination, but stated a plain case; saying in a few words, that the waistcoat piece was part of a 'job lot,' purchased from a man named James Burrows, of Bradford.

This was sufficient. James Burrows was a confidential warehouse clerk, in the employ of the firm, and positively the last person on whom suspicion would have fallen. He was a professor of religion; a man of some standing among his sect, being a local preacher, Sabbath-school teacher, and class leader.

Returning to Bradford that same evening, the gentleman consulted with his partners. He had brought the piece of stolen cloth from Sheffield, and they resolved that, without Burrows' knowledge, every roll of that description should be unwrapped, until by fitting at the point of severance it was matched with the piece from which it had been cut.

The whole night was occupied in this manner, but the piece was discovered, and in the morning Burrows was confronted with the proofs of his guilt. Taken quite aback, and finding denial or excuse equally hopeless, he confessed all, acknowledged that, in violation of the trust reposed in him, he had committed all those robberies for which so many of his fellow workers had been discharged with ruined characters, and pleaded hard for mercy.

This, however, was out of the question. The firm were justly indignant. Burrows was committed for trial. They prosecuted—pressed the charge—conviction followed, and the judge, after remarking on the flagrant nature of the case, sentenced him to be transported for life.

With a heavy heart, his wife and children—the latter six in number—bade him farewell at the appointed time; he left his native land an outcast and a felon.

Convict discipline was even more severe then than now. Burrows, upon whose destination, doubtless, the summing up of the judge was not without influence, was drafted with a gang of malefactors of the worst possible class, to the extreme penal settlement. Here it was forbidden, under heavy penalties, that he should attempt to hold any communication with living souls, or even to write to his family for three years. His occupation, and that of the gang, was packing wool, and while pursuing their labors the silent system was strictly enforced.

Three years passed away. The circumstances of the robbery were fast fading from memory, when one morning, while some laborers were engaged in unpacking a bag of Australian wool at the Bradford mill, where Burrows had formerly worked, a letter, addressed in his handwriting to his wife, was found deeply buried among its contents. The letter was immediately taken to the counting-house. But the strange circumstances under which it was stated to have been found, induced in the minds of the members of the firm suspicions of its authenticity. To unravel the mystery, however, they resolved to open the letter. They did so, and it proved to be a genuine document. It came from Burrows himself. It set forth that he was well—that if he continued to behave himself, he should in two years from that date be permitted to go to Sydney, where he prayed his wife to try and meet him. It also expressed his contrition for past offenses, and his acknowledgment of the justice of his sentence, and his determination to lead a new life for the future."

"What a remarkable circumstance!" exclaimed several voices in concert.

"It was, indeed," continued the clergyman. "The letter was duly handed to Burrows' wife, and taking into consideration the mysterious train of events by which it had been brought in safety to its destination, a subscription was organized, and Burrows' family were sent out, so as to meet him at the time he requested. They duly met, and according to the last reports, the man was bidding fair to retrieve his fallen position in society."

"A special providence, indeed!" remarked the lady who had first started the subject.

"And such an extraordinary illustration," said another of the company.

"It teaches a most important lesson," said the clergyman. "It teaches humility. Reflect that this man, an outcast to society, while packing wool in a remote settlement in the antipodes, promiscuously placed a letter in the heart of one of those packages, which might have been sent to any part of Europe or America, indiscriminately. But, instead of this, after crossing twelve thousand miles of trackless ocean, it not only reaches England, but it is forwarded to the very town, consigned to the very firm of whom Burrows was formerly a servant, and thus the letter falls into the hands of his family, for whom it was intended, and answers all the purposes for which it was written. This singular combination of events, I say, appears almost miraculous, yet the result should, while inculcating hope and trust in the Almighty Creator and Dispenser of good, teach the lesson that mercy is neither restricted to rank nor class, and that none of us from our supposed righteousness have a claim upon Heaven for any speciality of favors."

Affecting Incident.

I recollect one member of Congress who was always rallying me about our Congressional Temperance Society.

"Briggs," he used to say, "I'm going to join your Temperance Society, as soon as my demijohn is empty." But just before it became empty, he always filled it again. At one time, towards the close of the session, he said to me: "I am going to sign the pledge when I get home. I am in earnest," continued he; "my demijohn is nearly empty, and I am not going to fill it again." He spoke with such an air of seriousness as I had not before observed, and it impressed me; and I asked him what it meant—what had changed his feelings.

"Why," said he, "I had a short time since a visit from my brother, who stated to me a fact that more deeply impressed and affected me, than any thing I recollect to have heard upon the subject, in any temperance speech I ever heard or read.

In my neighborhood is a gentleman of my acquaintance, well educated, who once had some property, but is now reduced—poor! He has a beautiful and lovely wife—a lady of cultivation and refinement—and a most charming daughter.

This gentleman had become decidedly intemperate in his habits, and had fully alarmed his friends in regard to him. At one time, when a number of his former associates were together, they counselled as to what could be done for him. Finally, one of them said to him, "Why don't you send your daughter away to a certain distinguished school?" which he named.

"Oh, I cannot," said he; "it is out of the question. I am not able to bear the expense. Poor girl! I wish I could."

"Well," said his friend, "if you will sign the temperance pledge, I will be at all the expense of her attending school for one year."

"What does this mean?" said he. "Do you think me in danger of becoming a drunkard?"

"No matter," said his friend, "about that now, but I will do as I said."

"And I," said another, "will pay the rent of your farm a year, if you will sign the pledge."

"Well, these offers are certainly liberal—but what do they mean? Do you think me in danger of becoming a drunkard? What can it mean? But, gentlemen, in view of your liberality, I will make an offer. I will sign if you will!"

This was a proposition they had not considered, and were not very well prepared to meet; but for his sake they said they would and did sign, and he with them.

And now for the first time the truth poured into his mind, and he saw his condition, and sat down bathed in tears.

"Now," said he, "gentlemen, you must go and communicate these facts to my wife—poor woman! I know she will be glad to hear it, but I cannot tell her.

Two of them started for that purpose. The lady met them at the door, pale and trembling with emotion.

"What," she inquired, "is the matter? What has happened to my husband?"

They bid her dismiss her fears, assuring her they had come to bring her tidings of her husband—but good tidings, such as she would be glad to hear.

"Your husband has signed the temperance pledge—yea, signed in good faith."

The joyous news nearly overcame her—she trembled with excitement—wept freely, and clasping her hands devotionally, she looked up to heaven, and thanked God for the happy change. "Now," said she, "I have a husband as he once was, in the days of our early love."

"But this was not what moved me," said the gentleman. "There was in the same vicinity another gentleman—a generous, noble soul—married young—married well—into a charming family, and the flower of it. His wine drinking habits had aroused the fears of his friends, and one day, when several of them were together, one said to another, "Let us sign the pledge." "I will if you will," said one to another, till all had agreed to it, and the thing was done.

This gentleman thought it rather a small business, and felt a little sensitive about revealing to his wife what he had done. But on returning home, he said to her—

"Mary, my dear, I have done what I fear will displease you."

"Well, what is it?"

"Why, I have signed the temperance pledge."

"Have you?"

"Yes, I have certainly."

Watching his manner as he replied, and reading in it sincerity, she entwined her arms around his neck, laid her head upon his bosom, and burst into tears. Her husband was affected deeply by this conduct of his wife, and said:

"Mary, don't weep; I did not know it would afflict you so, or I would not have done it—I will go and take my name off immediately."

"Take your name off!" said she; "no, no! let it be there. I shall now have no more solicitude in reference to your becoming a drunkard. I shall spend no more wakeful midnight hours. I shall no more steep my pillow in tears."

Now for the first time truth shone upon his mind, and he folded to his bosom his young and beautiful wife, and wept with her. Now, I can't stand these facts, and I am going to sign the pledge." [Speech of Gov. Briggs.

Results of Accidents.

Some of the most useful inventions own their existence entirely to accident; such, for instance, as the accidental discovery that Plaster of Paris was a non-conductor of heat—a peculiarity to which our 'fire-proof safes' are entirely indebted for their usefulness and popularity. The discovery was first made in this city in 1830, by a mechanic, who carried on various branches of smith-work in Eldridge Street. Having occasion to heat some water, he took a cast-iron vessel in which plaster of Paris had been used, and to which some had adhered, forming a crust or coating on the inside of the kettle from one-half to three-fonrths of an inch in thickness; he poured in water and put it over a fire, with a view of heating the water sufficiently for his purpose; to his great surprise, after remaining in some time, he found that no change had been made in the temperature of the water; he blew the bellows, rendered the fire still hotter, and was still more surprised, after a long lapse of time, that the water did not become warm; he left the water on the fire, and went on with his work. Returning after some hours, he found the water had only become a little tepid; on this he laid various combustible substances on the fire, but still no effect was produced. Being somewhat puzzled to account for so strange a state of things, he next day instituted a series of inquiries, the result of which was the invention of the celebrated "Salamander Safe," for the privilege of manufacturing which, Mr. Wilder, of this city, pays the discoverer, S. C. Herring, $25,000 a year. So much for having an accident in the family, and properly taking advantage of it. [N. Y. Dutchman.

An Incident at the Battle of New Orleans.

A British officer, who was present at the battle of New Orleans, mentions an incident of thrilling strangeness, and one very descriptive of the Western hunter, many of whom marched to the defense of New Orleans, as volunteers under the renowned Andrew Jackson.

We marched, said the officer, in a solid column of 12,000 men, in a direct line upon the American defenses.

I belonged to the staff, and as we advanced, we watched through our glasses the position and arrangements of our enemy, with that intensity an officer only feels when marching into the jaws of death, with the assurance that, while he offers himself a sacrafice to the demands of his country, every action, be he successful or otherwise, will be judged with the most heartless scrutiny.

It was a strange sight, that long range of cotton bales—a new material for breast-works, with the crowd of human beings behind, their heads only visible above the line of defense. We could distinctly see their long rifles laying over the bales, and the battery of General Coffee directly in front, with its great mouth gaping towards us as they waited to devour us, and the position of Gen. Jackson with his staff around him. But what attracted our attention most, was the figure of a tall man standing on the breastwork, dressed in linsey-woolen, with buckskin leggins, and a broad-brimmed felt hat, that fell around his face, almost concealing his features. He was standing in one of those picturesque and graceful attitudes peculiar to those natural men-dwellers of the forests. The body rested on the left leg, and swayed with a curved line upwards, the right arm was extended, the hand grasping the rifle near the muzzle, the butt of which rested near the top of the right foot, while with his hand he raised the rim of his hat from his eyes, and seemed gazing from beneath intensely upon the advancing column. The cannon of Gen. Coffee had opened upon us and tore through our ranks with dreadful slaughter, but we contrived to advance, unwavering and cool, as if nothing had threatened our progress.

The roar of cannon seemed to have no effect on the figure standing upon the cotton bales, he stood fixed and motionless as a statue. At last he moved, threw back the hat rim over the crown with his left hand, raised the rifle to his shoulder and took aim at our group. Our eyes were riveted upon him. At whom had he leveled his piece? But the distance was so great that we looked at each other and smiled. We saw his rifle flash, and my right hand companion, as noble looking a fellow as ever rode at the head of a regiment, fell from his saddle. The hunter paused a few moments without moving the gun from his shoulder, then re-loaded and assumed his former position. Throwing the hat rim over his eyes, and again holding it up with his left hand, he fixed his piercing gaze upon us as if hunting out another victim. Once more the hat rim was thrown back and the gun raised to his shoulder. This time we did not smile, but cast short glances at each other to see which of us must die; and when his rifle again flashed, another one of us dropped to the earth. There was something most awful in marching on to certain death.

General Coffee's battery, and thousands of musket balls playing upon our ranks we cared not for—there was a chance of escaping unscathed. Most of us had walked upon batteries a hundred times more destructive, without quailing, but to know that every time that rifle was leveled towards us, and its bullet sprung from the barrel, one of us must as surely fall; to see the gleaming sun flash as the deadly iron came down, and see it rest motionless, as if poised upon a rock, and know when the hammer struck, and the sparks flew to the full primed pan, that the messenger of death drove unerringly to its goal—to know all this, and still march on, was most awful.

I could see nothing but the tall figure standing on the breastwork. He seemed to grow phantom-like, higher and higher, assuming, through the smoke, the supernatural appearance of some great spirit. Again did he reload and discharge his rifle with the same unfailing aim; and it was with indescribable pleasure that I beheld, as we neared the American lines, the sulphurous cloud gather around us, and shut that spectral hunter from my gaze. We lost the battle; and to my mind that Kentucky rifleman contributed more to our defeat than anything else; for while he remained to our sight, our attention was drawn from our duties, and when at last we became enshrouded in the smoke, the work was complete; we were in utter confusion, and unable to restore order sufficient to make any successful attack.

The Punishment of the Knout.

Mr. Dixon, in his "Prison World of Europe," says that one of the great boasts of the Russian criminal system, at the time Howard visited the prisons of that country, was, that capital punishments for civil crimes were abolished, and no one was liable to suffer death for acts of high treason. Howard doubted this. Being aware that the knout could be made a substitute for the gallows if the death of the criminal was desired, he availed himself of the first opportunity presented to witness the infliction of that instrument of torture The scene is thus described:

"August 10th, 1781, I saw two criminals, a man and a woman, suffer the punishment of the knout. They were conducted from the prison by about fifteen hussars and ten soldiers. When they arrived at the place of punishment, the hussars formed themselves into a ring round the whipping post, the drum beat a minute or two, and then some prayers were repeated—the populace taking off their hats. The woman was taken first, and after being roughly stripped to the waist, her hands and feet were bound with cords to a post made for the purpose, a man standing before the post to keep the cords tight. A servant attended the executioner, and both were stout men. The servant first marked his ground, and struck the woman five times on the back. Every stroke seemed to penetrate deep into the flesh. But his master thinking him too gentle, pushed him aside, took his place, and gave all the remaining strokes himself, which were evidently more severe. The woman received twenty-five, and the man sixty. I pressed through the hussars, and counted the number as they were chalked on a board. Both seemed but just alive, especially the man, who had yet strength enough to receive a small donation with some signs of gratitude. They were conducted back to prison in a little wagon. I saw the woman in a very weak condition some days after, but could not find the man any more!"

This latter circumstance confirmed Howard's previous suspicion that the knout was in reality the Russian gallows, and that under cover of a whipping, death was sometimes, if not frequently, inflicted; while western Europe was abused with idle boasts of the superior clemency of Russian laws. It was, however, useless to think of making any inquiries on the subject amongst the courtiers of Catherine, or even amongst the ministers of justice; so in order to get further information he took his own characteristic course. Having ascertained the address of the executioner, he got into a coach and drove off to his house. The poor fellow was alarmed at seeing a person having the appearance of a noble and an official enter his humble dwelling; domiciliary visits from the authorities of St. Petersburg rarely boding good to the host. Howard had calculated upon the man being surprised and thrown off his guard, and now endeavored to increase his confusion by his air, tone and bearing. The fellow probably remembered seeing him within the lines on the occasion just described, and of course supposed him to be a person in authority. Howard expected this. Assuming therefore an official tone, he desired the man to answer the questions put to him simply, and without equivocation; adding, that if his replies were found conformable to truth he had nothing to fear. The executioner meekly declared his readiness to answer any questions that should be put to him.

"Can you inflict the knout in such a manner as to occasion death in a very short time?"

"Yes, I can," was the prompt reply.

"In how short a time?" continued Howard.

"In a day or two."

"Have you ever so inflicted it?"

"I have."

"Have you lately?" added our countryman, going to the point he was very anxious to be satisfied of.

"Yes, the last man who was punished by my hands with the knout died of the punishment."

Even so! no wonder that the Philanthropist had not been able to find him.

"In what manner do you thus render it mortal?"

"By one or two strokes on the sides, which carry off large pieces of the flesh."

"Do you receive orders thus to inflict the punishment?"

"I do."

This was the substance of the extraordinary catechism; and thus were Howard's doubts removed.

Something New.

We were recently shown a wonderful piece of mechanism, which certainly goes ahead of anything in the shape of a lock that we have ever seen or heard of, in the essentials of security from depredation. It is called "Yale's Magic Lock," and is as absolutely unpickable as the kernel of a walnut would be without damaging the shell. The only opening is a circular orifice, half an inch in diameter, for admitting the key, and through which there is no possible access to the tumblers by any instrument whatever—not even the key itself, strange as that may seem. By a singular contrivance, a portion of the key is detached after insertion, and sent to a distant part of the lock, where it moves the tumblers, and where the tools of the burglar could never arrive except by first battering the lock to pieces. The keyhole resembles the interior of a small pistol barrel, and having no opening in the interior basin of the lock, would not receive powder enough to blow it open. The lock is therefore absolutely gunpowder proof also.

Among other peculiarities, the key is susceptible of from forty thousand to one million of changes. A change of the key changes the lock also in the act of locking, so that one may have a new lock every day for hundreds of years! One may thus lose the key or have it stolen, and still entertain no fears of the lock's being opened with it.

Altogether, this lock seems to be as perfect as anything of the kind can be. It has decided advantages over the most celebrated locks of the day, which cannot fail to be discovered by any one upon inspection. With all its advantages it is of exceedingly simple construction, and not liable to get out of order. The proprietors offer a reward of $500 to any one who will pick it through the keyhole, using whatever instruments he pleases, and taking any length of time he desires. [Artizan.

Farmer Pennywise and Farmer Poundwise.

There is a farmer Pennywise, with whom I am acquainted, who will occasionally raise a good heifer, steer, or colt, for his neighbors keep good breeds, and he is by accident occcasionally benefited thereby. When he has such an animal in his flock, he is apparently uneasy until it is disposed of; and after selling such an animal, a heifer for instance, you may hear something like the following: "Well, my dear, I have sold the big heifer for fifteen dollars; is not that a good price for a heifer of her age." "Good price, indeed!" his wife would reply, "you had better have sold two of them cat-hammed, crooked-legged, scrawny things that you always keep for cows. The reason that our cattle always look so bad, and that we sell so little butter and cheese is, that you always sell the best heifers." Poor woman! I pity her; her pride and ambition are injured, her children and herself in rags, because her native industry and economy are cramped by the foolish and niggardly policy of her husband.

The picture is reversed in farmer Poundwise, who always keeps his best animals until full grown; then selecting his best breeders for his own use, he sells the rest. If he has a good young horse, he will say that he will make a fine team horse; a mare, she will make a fine breed mare. "And what will you do with that?" says his neighbor, pointing to an ordinary animal. "Between you and I," says he, "I shall sell that colt the first chance. Such an animal spoils the looks of all the rest, and will not pay for keeping." Thus he will sell his poor steers, heifers, sheep and pigs at the first offer. If not sold, he would fatten those that would pay the expense, and give away those that would not. Not pay the expenses of fattening! Are there any cattle, sheep, or hogs, that will not pay the expense of fattening? Reader, take some of each—of the real Pharaoh breed—feed them until fat; keep an exact account of the expenses, and you can answer this question yourself. In this way farmer Poundwise always has valuable stock; his steers are ready sale, and command a good price; his horses are the best in the neighborhood, and the first to be looked at by the purchasers. So with all the animals he raises. Pennywise, on the contrary, is thronged with an ill-shaped, worthless stock, that none will buy and pay the expenses of raising; which are continually eating out his substance, and making no return. Thus Pennywise drags on a miserable life in the road to ruin, while Poundwise moves easily and happily along in the road to wealth. [Maine Farmer.

Simple Cure for the Croup.

We find in the Journal of Health the following simple remedy for this dangerous disease. Those who have passed nights of great agony at the bedside of loving children, will treasure it up as an invaluable piece of information:—

If a child is taken with the croup, instantly apply cold water, ice water if possible, suddenly and freely to the neck and chest with a sponge. The breath will instantly be relieved. So soon as possible, let the sufferer drink as much as it can; then wipe it dry, cover it up warm, and soon a quiet slumber will relieve the parent's anxiety, and lead the heart in thankfulness to the Power which has given to the clear, gushing fountain such medical qualities.

We publish the above for the purpose of bearing witness to the efficacy of the remedy, "with a slight variation." We have repeatedly, in our family, arrested attacks of this terrible disease upon a child who is subject to a very violent and stubborn form of the disease, by the following simple method. At the first symptom of the disease, wet a napkin or towel, folded to about four inches in width, and wind around the naked throat of the patient, and then take about half a pound of clean dry cotton-batting and tie it over the napkin so as to retain the animal heat. Give the patient plenty of cold water to drink, and cover it up warm in bed. The cough will cease—the patient will sleep all night, and awake well in the morning. Wash the neck in cold water, and dress as usual. There is no danger of taking cold, and the dreadful effect of emetics are all avoided. We have tested this remedy by at least twenty trials within the past five years, and it has never failed. It is equally efficacious in quinzy, if taken when the disease first manifests itself—as it is also in any other inflammation of the throat.

In trying the experiment, don't take it into your head that flannel, or an old stocking, or some other substitute will answer in place of the cotton. Dry cotton wool and plenty of it, is a perfect non-conductor of animal heat, and hence it is the best article and only sure reliance.

After the disease has made great progress, we will not undertake to say that even this remedy would arrest the disease; but in such cases we have no doubt that it would have a most potent aid to other remedies. [Buf. Ex.

AFRICAN COLONIZATION.

The 36th Anniversary of the American Colonization Society was held in Washington on Third-day evening, Jan. 18th, and was largely attended by Members of Congress, Judges of the Supreme Court, Heads of Departments, and other dignitaries. An abstract of the Annual Report was read, from which it appears that during the last year six vessels were sent to Liberia, carrying 660 colored persons—403 were free born, 225 were emancipated, and 38 purchased their freedom, or their friends purchased it for them. The great attraction of the occasion was the speech of Hon. Edward Everett—a speech with some points in which we can not fully agree, but which embodies so many valuable suggestions in relation to the condition and prospects of Africa, that we are sure our readers will thank us for copying it, notwithstanding the large space it occupies.

Mr. Everett's Speech.

Mr. President: When you invited me, some time ago, to take part in the discussions of this evening, it was my purpose, if able to attend the meeting at all, to examine the questions connected with the Colonization Society in all their bearings, for I have long been of opinion, that whether we consider the state of things in America or Africa, no more momentous subject can engage our attention. But, Sir, my time and thoughts, during almost the whole interval, have been preöccupied in a manner which has prevented my making any but the hastiest and most inadequate preparation to address this audience, on whose kind indulgence, therefore, without further apology, I beg to throw myself.

The Colonization Society has been the subject, as it seems to me, of much unmerited odium—of indifference equally unmerited on the part of the majority of the community—of the deep interest which it deserves, on the part of a very few. Its operations are yet in their infancy—they are confined to the proceedings of an association of private individuals pursuing the noiseless tenor of their way, without ostentation or eclat, at home, and to the humble fortunes of the small State, the germ of a Republic, which, under the auspices of this Association, has been planted on the Coast of Africa.

But before we deride these humble beginnings—before we think it extravagant to believe that all-important futurities may be wrapped up in them, as the mighty oak is wrapped up in the acorn, we would do well to refresh our recollection of the first twenty-five years of the settlement at Jamestown, or call to mind that first dismal winter at Plymouth, where more than half the Mayflower's company sunk under the rigors of the climate, and the infinite sufferings of their forlorn adventure. Sir, neither Plymouth nor Virginia, at the end of twenty-five years, had attained anything like such a position as is already occupied by Liberia, in the family of nations—recognized, as she has been, by the most powerful Governments of Europe, and sustaining all the relations of an independent State.

First—The settlement of Liberia, on the coast of Africa, under the auspices of the Colonization Society, was founded on a political and moral necessity. As the measures adopted for the suppression of the African slave trade led to the capture of slave ships, it was necessary that provisions should be made for restoring the captured Africans to their native country. To return each to the village where he was born, was impossible—collected, as they are, from every portion of the interior, and often brought down to the coast from vast distances, all thought of restoring them, at least immediately, to their several homes, was out of the question. To place them down at any of the usual resorts, on the coast of Africa, would be to throw them back, at once, into the power of the native chiefs, who are chief agents for carrying on the foreign trade.

A settlement on some point of the coast, protected by the influence of the name of a powerful civilized State, seemed, therefore, an indispensable condition of all measures for repressing the foreign trade from the necessity of furnishing an asylum to the victims that might be rescued from its grasp, where they might be received and sheltered and civilized, and gradually, perhaps, find their way into the interior to their native tribes.

Allied to this object of the colony was one still more important, because applicable to a much larger number of persons, and that was to afford a home in Africa to such free men of color in this country as were desirous of emigrating to the native land of their fathers. This object at first approved itself almost unanimously at the South and at the North to the white and the colored race. Jealousies by degrees crept in—prejudices, so I must think them, arose, till at length the colony has become intensely unpopular with a considerable part of those whose interest was one of the leading objects of the formation of the Society.

Now, Sir, I do not intend to discuss the ground of these jealousies, nor to inquire into the policy of the laws of some States, and the condition of public opinion—often more powerful than law—in others, which make the condition of the free colored man in all parts of the country one of inferiority and hardship. In order to meet the objections to the Society, that it recognizes and coöperates with these oppressive laws, and a still more oppressive public opinion, I will admit such to be the character of the legislation and the public sentiment of the country in reference to the free colored population of the country.

But does this furnish any valid practical argument against Colonization? Does the fact that the free colored man is unjustly treated in this country—that he is oppressively excluded from all the eligible careers of life in the United States—furnish any argument why he should not resort to the region where his fathers were born; to a climate more congenial with the African constitution—a soil more generally fertile, and one which it is every day becoming more probable is rich in deposits of gold? For myself, I must own that this state of legislation and public opinion seem to me strong considerations in favor of immigration. I cannot reconcile with real kindness toward our free colored population the attempts which have been made, and with considerable success, to prevent their emigrating from this country, where their position is one of hardship and disability, to a country which promises them every imaginable advantage.

What sort of a kindness would it have been toward the persecuted Puritans who in 1608 composed the little flock which afterward became the Pilgrim Church at Leyden, to endeavor to persuade them at all hazards not to leave England? Or what motive of real enlightened kindness could have prompted a similar attempt in reference to Governor Winthrop's much larger and more efficient company in 1630. Would it have been the part of real friendship to go among them, and tell them they were the victims of cruel laws and still more cruel prejudices, to bid them remember that they were born in England; that they had as good a right to live there as their oppressors; to exhort them to stand upon their rights, and, if need be, to bleed for them; to depict the Western Continent, and their probable future in the darkest colors. But this is the precise counterpart of the language continually addressed to the free colored population of the United States by those who claim to be their peculiar friends.

Or, to take a case, if possible, more nearly parallel—that of the suffering Scotch, Irish, Swiss, Germans, Norwegians and others, who, to the number of hundreds of thousands, annually are emigrating to the United States; would it be deemed an act of friendship, or rather of refined cruelty, or at least of most mistaken kindness, to go among the suffering population of these several countries, whose thoughts are turned toward America as a land of refuge and plenty, and endeavor to dissuade them, kindling in their minds a morbid patriotism, a bitter nationality—urging them to stay and starve rather than find employment, position and prosperity for themselves and children on this side of the Atlantic.

Second—But I must pass to another very important object of the Colonization Society in establishing the colony of Liberia, and that is the effectual suppression of the slave trade throughout its extent and within the sphere of its influence. It is grievous to reflect that contemporaneously with the discovery of our own continent, and from motives of kindness to its natives, the whole western coast of Africa was thrown open to that desolating traffic, which from time immemorial had been carried on from the ports of the Mediterranean, by the Nile, and along the eastern coasts of the continent. It is still more painful to consider that the very period at which the modern culture of the west of Europe was making the most rapid progress is that at which Africa began to suffer the most from its connection with Europe. It was the age of Shakspere, of Spencer, of Hooker, and Lord Bacon, of those other brightest suns in the firmament of England's glory, that her navigators first engaged in this detestable traffic, and vessels bearing, as if in derision, the venerable names of Jesus and Solomon, were sent from Great Britain to the coast of Africa—at a time when some of the last remnants of the feudal systems were broken down in England and France—when private war had wholly ceased—when men began to venture from the covert of the walled towns and traverse the high roads, and live in the open country in safety, these very States, the most civilized in Europe, began to struggle for the monopoly of that cruel trade, which was carried on by exciting the barbarous races of Africa to new fury against each other, and by introducing a state of universal war, not merely between nation and nation, but between tribe and tribe, village and village, and almost between house and house. In fact it is not without example that these benighted beings have delivered their wives and children to the slave dealers. Thus, the Western coast of Africa became, like the Northeastern and Eastern coasts, one great slave market, and so remained for nearly three centuries. It is now about twenty years since the powers of Christendom, excited to activity by philanthropic operations and benevolent individuals, began the warfare upon this cruel traffic. The American Colonies, before their independence, passed laws for its abolition, which were uniformly negatived by the Crown. The Revolutionary Congress, in the first year of its existence, denounced the traffic, and the Constitution of the United States appointed a date for its prospective abolition.

This example has been successfully followed by other States. The trade is now forbidden by the laws of every Christian and most of the Mohammedan powers of Europe and Asia. It still exists, however, to a frightful extent, and the more active the means used to suppress it by blockade and cruisers, the greater the cruelty incident to its practice, by crowding the slave ships with a greater number of victims. Such being the case, many of those in England who have taken the greatest interest in the suppression of the traffic have seriously proposed to abandon the system of blockades and cruisers, and resort to other expedients; and, of these, unquestionably, none can be compared for efficiency with the settlement of the coast. Wherever a colony is founded by England, France, or America, the traffic is broken up, not merely for that extent of coast, but the whole interior region which found an outlet through it. In this way the traffic has been wholly suppressed for an extent of at least one thousand miles, from the northern extremity of the jurisdiction of Sierre Leone to the southern bounds of Liberia.

It is necessary only to look at the map to see what an important extent of country has been rescued in this way from the direst scourge which ever afflicted humanity. The last of the ancient slave marts, Gallinas, has been lately purchased and brought within the limits of Liberia. Along a line of coast not less extensive than that from Maine to Georgia, from every bay and within the shelter of every headland of which this traffic was carried on within the memory of man, the slave traffic has been wholly rooted out. What could not be effected by Congresses of Sovereigns at Vienna or Aix la Chapelle, by quintuple treaties, or by squadrons of war steamers, has been brought about by these feeble colonial settlements, of which that of Liberia has been obliged to struggle its way into permanence of late, without the coöperation, almost without the toleration of the Government—drawing its supplies almost exclusively from the perennial fountains of Christian benevolence.

I repeat, Sir, wherever these settlements have been founded the slave trade has disappeared, and, as we may trust, for ever. It seems to me that if no other benefit were anticipated from their extension, that this alone would constitute an all-powerful motive. What object in life, in this country or in any country, can an individual of African descent propose to himself at all to be compared with that of forming, in his own person, a part of that noble line of defense by which the shores of his native land are to be forever barred against the desolating traffic? But, great as is the importance of this object, it yields in interest to another, connected with it, but far more comprehensive and momentous—and that is the civilization of Africa.

The condition of the African continent is a reproach to the civilization of the world. With an extent nearly three times that of Europe, a considerable portion of the known regions of great fertility, teeming with vegetable and animal life—traversed by lofty ranges of mountains, which send down from their sides the tributaries of noble rivers—connected by the Mediterranean on the north, both with the ancient and modern culture of Europe—the western shores reposing on the Atlantic Ocean, the great highway of civilization—the south-eastern running within a near proximity to our own continent—the eastern coasts spread out to the commerce of India, and the whole Oriental world—while the Red Sea and the Nile throw open the approaches of the Asiatic continent. It would seem that by natural endowments and geographical position, it was destined to be the emporium and garden of the earth. Man only, throughout these vast regions, has remained in arrears in the progress of humanity, and instead of keeping pace with his fellow-men in other parts of the world, to have been so much depressed by various causes of degeneracy, as finally to have come under a suspicion of natural infirmity, of which I must own I have no belief. I have no doubt that among the numerous races of Africa, as of the other continents, there are great diversities of intelligence, from the warlike, politic tribes of the central plateau, to the broken-down, enfeebled hordes on the banks of the Congo, and the squalid, scarcely human Hottentot.

But it may be doubted whether this difference is greater than between the Laplander, the Gipsey, and the Calmuc, on the one hand, and the best and brightest specimens of humanity to be found in Europe and America, on the other. What, then, is the cause of the continued uncivilization of Africa? And, without pretending to pry too curiously into the mysteries of Providence, it seems to me that a sufficient cause may be found in some peculiar circumstances in the history and geography of this Continent. It seems a law of human progress, which, however difficult to explain, is too well sustained by facts to be doubted, that the first advances out of barbarism must be made under the influence of culture from abroad. Thus the germs of improvement were brought from Egypt and Syria to Greece—from Greece to Rome—from Rome to the West and North of Europe—from Europe to America; and they are now on their way from our continent to the remotest islands of the Pacific.

To what extent the aboriginal element shall be borne down and overpowered by the foreign influences, or enter into kindly combination with them, depends upon the moral and intellectual development of both parties. The native race may be so apt for improvement as to harmonize promptly and kindly with the cultivated strangers—this was the case with the early Greeks—or the disparity may be so great that no kindly union between them is practicable, and the native tribes slowly and silently retreat before new comers. This has been the case with the native races of our own continent, who have found it all but impossible to embrace our civilization. Now, in reference to this law of our social nature, the difficulty in Africa has been two-fold.

First, that the inhabitants of the other quarters of the globe, who had obtained the start in the race of improvement, and might have proved the instructors and guides of the native races, were all deeply concerned in a traffic with the continent of Africa, which, instead of tending, like other branches of commerce, to mutual improvement, and especially to the elevation of the inferior party, is, of all barbarizing agents, the most poisonous and deadly. In this way foreign trade, which has usually been the medium through which the more cultivated foreign race has gradually introduced itself to a mutually beneficial intercourse with the less advanced tribes, has been to Africa, from the dawn of history to the present day, the all-powerful agent of eternal civil war, anarchy, and social disorganization. This has been one cause of her making so little progress in civilization.

Another is her climate—her mighty equatorial expanse, a more extensive tract of land between the tropics than in all the rest of the globe—her fervid vertical sun, burning down upon the rank vegetation of her fertile plains, and rendering her shores and water courses pestiferous to a foreign constitution. This peculiar geographical character seems again to shut her out from the ordinary approaches of civilization. Common inducements of commercial gain are too weak to tempt the merchant to these feverous districts. Nothing but a taste for adventure, approaching to mania, attracts the traveler, and when Christian benevolence lures the devoted missionary to this field of labor, it lures him too often to his doom. Here, then, we see a union of influences which seem to seal the fate of unhappy Africa as an abomination of desolation. But, now, mark and reverence the providence of God, educing out of these natural disadvantages of climate—disadvantages to man's apprehension—and this colossal moral wrong, the African slave trade, out of these seemingly hopeless elements of physical and moral evil—out of long cycles of suffering and crime, of violence and retribution, such as history can no where parallel—educing, I say, from these elements, by the blessed alchymy of Christian benevolence, the means of the ultimate regeneration of Africa. The aroused conscience of Christendom denounces the slave trade, but not till it has existed for three centuries, and filled a portion of the Western Hemisphere with five or six millions of the descendants of Africa, of whom about a million and a half, in the islands and on the continent, have from time to time become free; though born and reared under circumstances unfavorable to mental culture, yet still partaking, in the main, of many of the blessings of civilization and Christianity, amply qualified, as Liberia has shown, to convey those blessings to the native land of their fathers.

Thus, at the moment when the work itself is ready to be commenced, the chosen instruments are prepared. Do I err in the opinion that the same Providence which has arranged or permitted this mysterious sequence of events, is calling and inviting them to the auspicious work? All other means have been tried in vain. Private adventure has miscarried—strength, and courage, and endurance almost superhuman, have languished and broken down—well-appointed expeditions, fitted out under the auspices of associations and powerful governments, have ended in calamitous failure; and it is proved at last that the Caucasian race cannot achieve this long deferred work. When that last noble expedition which was sent out from England, I think in the year 1841, under the highest auspices, to found an agricultural settlement, in the interior of Africa, ascended the Niger, every white man out of one hundred and fifty sickened, and all but two or three, if my memory serves me, died, while of their dark skinned associates, also one hundred and fifty in number, with all the added labor and anxiety that devolved upon them, a few only were sick, and they were individuals who had passed years in a temperate climate, and not one died.

I say again, Sir, you Caucasian, you proud Anglo-Saxon, you self-sufficient, all-attempting white man, you cannot civilize Africa! You have subdued and appropriated Europe; the native races are melting before you in America, as the untimely snows of April before a vernal sun; you have possessed yourself of India; you menace China and Japan; the remotest isles of the Pacific are not distant enough to elude your notice; but Central Africa confronts you, and bids you defiance. Your squadrons may range or blockade her coast, but neither on the errands of peace nor the errands of war, can you penetrate to the interior. The God of Nature, no doubt, for wise purposes, however inscrutable, has drawn across the chief inlets a cordon you cannot break through. You may hover on the coast, but you dare not set foot on shore. Death sits portress at the undefended gateways of her mud-built villages—yellow and intermittent fevers, blue plagues, and poisons that you can see as well as feel, await your approach. As you ascend the rivers, pestilence shoots from the mangroves that fringe their noble banks, and the glorious sun, which kindles all inferior nature into teeming, bursting life, darts disease into your languid system. No, you are not elected for this momentous work. The great Disposer, in another branch of his family, has chosen out a race—descendants of this torrid region, children of this vertical sun—and fitted them, by ages of stern discipline, for the gracious achievement.

From foreign realms and lands remote, supported by His care,
They pass unharmed through burning climes, and breathe the tainted air.

Sir, I believe that the auspicious work is begun; that Africa will be civilized—civilized by her returning offspring and descendants; I believe it, because I will not think that this mighty and fertile region is to remain forever in its present state—because I can see no other agency adequate to the accomplishment of the work, and I do behold in this agency a most mysterious fitness. I am aware that doubts are entertained of the practicability of the work, founded, in part, on the supposed incapacity of the civilized men of color in this country to carry on an undertaking of this kind, and partly on the supposed hopeless barbarism of the native races, which is thought by some persons to be so gross as to defy the approach of improvement. I believe both opinions to be erroneous. It would, I think, be unjust to urge, as a proof of the intellectual inferiority of the civilized men of color in this country, that they have not made much intellectual progress. It appears to me that they have done quite as much as could be expected under the depressing circumstances in which they have been placed. What branch of the European family, if held in the same condition for three centuries, would not be subject to the same reproach? Mr. Jefferson, in his notes on Virginia, urges the intellectual inferiority of the African race, as existing in the United States. He might have been led to doubt the justice of his conclusions, by reflecting that in the very same work he thinks it necessary to vindicate the race to which we ourselves belong from a charge of degeneracy, made by an ingenious French writer. Why, Sir, it is but a short time since we Anglo-Americans were habitually spoken of by our brethren in England as a degenerate and inferior race. Within thirty years it has been contemptuously asked in the liberal journals of Europe, in reference to the natives of the country of Franklin and Washington, and Adams and Marshall, and Jefferson and Madison, of Irving, Prescott, Bancroft, Ticknor, Bryant and Longfellow, "Who reads an American book?" In the face of facts like these, it becomes us to be somewhat cautious in setting down the colored race in America as one of hopeless inferiority.

Again, Sir, it is doubted whether there is in the native races of Africa a basis of improvability, if I may use that word, in which a hope of their future civilization can be grounded. It is said that they alone, of all the tribes of earth, have shown themselves incapable of improving their condition. Well, Sir, who knows that? Of the early history of our race we know but little, in any part of the globe. A dark cloud hangs over it. The whole North and West of Europe, till the Roman civilization shone in upon it, was as benighted as Africa is now. It is quite certain that, at a very early period of the history of the world, some of the native races of Africa had attained a high degree of culture. Such was the case of the ancient Egyptians, a dark-colored race, though not of what we call the negro type. They are considered the parents of much of the civilization of the Greeks, and, indeed, of the whole ancient world. As late as the fifth century before the Christian era, Plato passed thirteen years in studying their sacred records. The massive monuments of their cheerless culture have withstood the storms of time, better than the more graceful creations of Grecian art. Races that emerged from barbarism later than those of Africa have, with fearful vicissitudes on the part of individual States, acquired and maintained a superiority over Africa, but I am not prepared to say that it rests on natural causes of a final and abiding character. We are led into error by contemplating things too much in the gross. There are tribes in Africa which have made no contemptible progress in various branches of human improvement. On the other hand, if we look closely at the condition of the mass of the population in Europe, from Lisbon to Archangel, from the Hebrides to the Black Sea. If we turn from the few who possesses wealth, or competence, education, culture and that lordship over Nature and all her forces which belongs to instructed mind; if we turn from these to the benighted, destitute, oppressed, superstitious, abject millions, whose lives are passed in the hopeless toils of the field, the factory, the mine—whose inheritance is beggary, whose education is stolid ignorance—at whose daily table hunger and thirst are the stewards—whose rare festivity is brutal intemperance; if we could count their numbers, gather into one aggregate their destitution of the joys of life, and thus estimate the full extent of the practical barbarism of the nominally civilized world, we should be inclined, perhaps, to doubt the essential superiority of the present improved European race. If it be essentially superior, why did it remain so long unimproved? The Africans, you say, have persevered in their original barbarism for five thousand years. Well, the Anglo-Saxon race did the same thing for nearly four thousand years, and in the great chronology of Providence, a thousand years are but as one day.

A little more than ten centuries ago, and our Saxon ancestors were not more civilized than some of the African tribes of the present day. They were savage, warlike people—pirates by sea, bandits on shore, enslaved by the darkest superstitions, worshiping divinities as dark and cruel as themselves; and the slave trade was carried on in Great Britian eight hundred years ago as ruthlessly as upon the coast of Africa at the present day.

But it pleased Divine Providence to pour the light of Christianity upon this midnight darkness. By degrees, civilization, law, liberty, letters and arts came in, and at the end of eight centuries we talk of the essential inborn superiority of the Anglo-Saxon race, and look down with disdain on those portions of the human family who have lagged a little behind us in the march of civilization.

Sir, at the present day Africa is not the abode of utter barbarism. Here again we do not discriminate; we judge in the gross. Some of her tribes are, indeed, hopelessly broken down by internal wars and the foreign slave trade, and the situation of the whole continent is exceedingly adverse to any progress in culture. But they are not savages; the mass of the population live by agriculture, there is some traffic between the coast and the interior, there is a rude architecture; gold dust is collected, iron is smelted, weapons and utensils of husbandry and household use are wrought, cloth is manufactured and dyed, palm oil is expressed, and schools are taught. Among the Mahomedan tribes the Koran is read. I have seen a native African in this city who had passed forty years of his life as a slave in the field, who, at the age of seventy, wrote the Arabic character with the elegance of a scribe. And Mungo Park tells us that lawsuits are argued with as much length in the interior of Africa as at Edinburgh. I certainly am aware that the condition of the most advanced tribe of Central Africa is wretched, mainly in consequence of the slave trade which exists among them in the most deplorable form. The only wonder is, that with this cancer eating into their vitals from age to age, any degree of civilization can exist. But I think it may be said, without exaggeration, that, degraded as are the ninety millions of Africans, ninety millions exist in Europe, to which each country contributes her quota, not much less degraded. The difference is, and certainly an all-important difference, that in Europe, intermingled with those ninety millions, are fifteen or twenty millions, possessed of all degrees of culture, up to the very highest; while in Africa there is not an idividual who, according to our standard, has attained a high degree of cultivation. But if obvious causes for this can be shown, it is unphilosophical to infer from it essential incapacity. But all doubts of the capacity of the African race for self-government, and of their improvability under favorable circumstances, seem to me to be removed by what we witness at the present day, both in our own country and on the coast of that continent. Notwithstanding the disadvantages of their condition in this country, specimens of intellectual ability, the talent of writing and speaking, capacity for business, for the ingenious and mechanical arts, for accounts, for the ordinary branches of academical learning, have been exhibited by our colored brethren, which would do no discredit to Anglo-Saxons. Pall Cuffer, well recollected in New England, was a person of great energy. His father was an African slave; his mother, an Indian of the Elizabeth Islands, Mass. I have already alluded to the extraordinary attainments of Abderrahaman. A man of better manners or more respectable appearance I never saw.

The learned blacksmith of Alabama, now in Liberia, has attained a celebrity scarcely inferior to that of his white brother, known by the same designation. I frequently attended the examinations at a school in Cambridge, at which Beverly Williams was a pupil. Two youths from Georgia, and a son of my own, were his fellow pupils. Beverly was a born slave in Mississippi, and apparently of pure African blood. He was one of the best scholars, perhaps the best Latin scholar, in his class. These are indications of intellectual ability, afforded under discouraging circumstances at home.

On the coast of Africa the success of Liberia (the creation of this Society) ought to put to rest all doubts on this question. The affairs of that interesting settlement, under great difficulties and discouragements, have been managed with a discretion, an energy, and I must say, all things considered, with a success, which authorizes the most favorable inferences as to the capacity of the colored races for self-government. It is about 30 years since the settlement began, and I think it must be allowed that its progress will compare favorably with that of Virginia and Plymouth after an equal length of time.

They have established a well-organized Constitution of Republican Government. It is administered with ability; the Courts of Justice are modelled after our own. They have schools and churches. The soil is tilled, the country is explored, the natives are civilized, the slave trade is banished, a friendly intercourse is maintained with foreign powers, and England and France have acknowledged their independent sovereignty. Would a handful of Anglo-Americans from the humblest classes of society here do better than this?

The truth is, Mr. President—and with this I conclude—our influence has been, and I trust ever will be, at work through the agency of the Colony of Liberia and the other similar agencies I trust hereafter to be added, abundantly competent to effect this great undertaking, and that is the sovereign power of Christian law. Ah, sir, this, after all, is sometimes resisted and subdued—commercial enterprise becomes bankrupt, State policy is outwitted, but, in the long run, pure, manly, rather let me say, heavenly love, can never fail.

It is the moral sentiment, principally, under the guidance and impulse of religious zeal, that has civilized the world. Arms, and craft, and mammon, seize their opportunity and mingle in the work, but cannot kill its vitality. That our colored brethren equally with ourselves are susceptible of the moral sentiments, it would be an affront to your discernment to argue. Sir, I read last year in a newspaper an anecdote which seemed to put this point in so beautiful and affecting a light, that with your permission I will repeat it.

A citizen of Rapides, in Louisiana, with his servant, started for California, hoping to improve his not prosperous circumstances by sharing the golden harvest of that region. For a while they were successful, but the health of the master at length failed. What, in that distant region, under a constitution forbidding Slavery, and in that new and scarcely organized society—what was the slave? Priest and Levite, as the master lay ill of typhus fever, came and looked on him and passed by on the other side; but the faithful servant tended, watched, protected his stricken master, by day and by night—his companion, nurse and friend. At length the master died. What then was the conduct of the slave, as he stood in those lonely wastes by the remains of him who, when living, he had served? He dug his decent grave in the golden sands—gathered up the fruits of their joint labors—(these he considered the sacred property of his master's family)—toiled a few more weeks under the burning sun of a California summer to accumulate the means of paying his passage to the States, and then returned to the family of his master in Louisiana.

I cannot vouch for the truth of the story. I have heard of tales which, if not true, were well invented. This, sir, is too good to be invented. I believe, I know, it must be true, and such a fact proves more for the possession by the African race of the moral sentiments by which the land of their fathers is to be civilized, than volumes of argument. Sir, that master, and that slave ought to be in marble and brass. If a person so humble as myself, so soon to pass away and be forgotten, dare promise it, I would say their memory shall never perish.

There is a moral wealth in that incident beyond the treasures of California. If all the gold she has already yielded to the indomitable industry of the adventurer, and all that she yet locks from the cupidity of man, in the virgin chambers of her snow-clad Sierras, were molten into one ingot, it would not buy the moral worth of that scene. Sir, I leave you to make the application. I have told you—you knew it well before—how Africa is to be civilized, and who are to do the work; and what remains, but to bid God speed the undertaking.

THE PRAYER MEETING.

It was nearly forty years ago when I became acquainted with this meeting. It was held on Wednesday afternoon, and usually at the house of the pastor, because the feeble health of the pastor's wife did not permit her to go abroad. The number attending it was about eight; and seldom was one absent because of cold, or heat, or storm, though some of the members lived two or three miles distant. They were all mothers, and the first specific object of prayer was the conversion of their children. One who was sometimes present when a child, still remembers some of these meetings as occasions when all present were weeping, and the voice faltered in prayer. I believe only two of those mothers are now living. Some of their children are dead, but nearly all of them gave evidence of having passed from death unto life. Seven of their sons entered the Christian ministry.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, January 27, 1853.

"CONSEQUENCES OF SIN HERE AND HEREAFTER."

A correspondent, who appears to have judged of an article which we wrote some weeks ago by a standard of we know not whose adjusting, sends the subjoined "inquiries." We give them to the readers of the Recorder, accompanied with a few remarks of our own; merely premising that, as correct views of the nature and consequences of sin lie at the foundation of true piety, we trust that neither our correspondent, nor our readers, will allow themselves to be ensnared by those specious systems of theology, which whisper peace and safety, while sudden destruction is at the door.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In reading your comments, in the Recorder, of December 16th, on the "Consequences of Sin here and hereafter," I notice two points, upon which I would raise a few inquiries, (which you may not deem improper, as I am not inclined to controvert [controversy] on the system of theology referred to.) In answer to your premeditated inquiry, To what extent do we suffer for our sins in this life? you reply, "To just that extent in which they are injurious to our fellow creatures"—and you say, "We are to suffer to the full extent that our offenses deserve."

"But as far as there is any guilt or criminality in our sins as committed against God, the punishment is not inflicted in this life," and that "the offense to ourselves involved in the wrongs and injuries to others, is reserved for a judgment to come."

[Our correspondent misquotes our language. We did not say, "the offense to ourselves," &c., but "the offense to himself," that is, to God, as the context, as well as the grammatical construction, will clearly show, if he will take the trouble to refer to the passage again.]

Now, were my mind free from any preconceived opinions on the various systems of theology, I think I would embrace the one which, to my mind, most exalted the attributes of Deity; and should, if subject to the light of reason and observation, appear consistent.

[Your opinion as to which of the various systems "most exalted the attributes of Diety," would be a "preconceived opinion"—would it not?

You speak of "the light of reason," as the test to which the various systems of theology must be subjected. But it should be remembered, that the reason of the unrenewed man is in a disordered state. No man's reason is competent to determine what is honorary to the Diety, and what is dishonorary to him, till he has first learned Diety's true character from Revelation.]

1st "That we are to suffer here the full extent [of our desert] for our offenses and wrongs, so far as they operate injuriously to our fellows."

May not the perpetrators of wrongs be classed: 1st. Those whose acts are open to the observation of their fellows. 2d. Those whose acts are known only to themselves?

Of those whose acts are known:

Is not the opinion held of the wrong doer modified by various circumstances, such as interest, custom, and fashion, &c.; though they may not affect the author's sense of right and wrong? Of such wrong, let the untold numbers speak; wrongs unrequited by "scorn and violence." Yes, of wrongs legalized, and, we may almost say, Christianized.

Now, according to your system, the evil doer to others, as such, needs neither repentance nor a Redeemer; "for he is punished here to the full extent that his offenses deserve." It would be contrary to our sense of justice, after a full and just punishment, to be again punished for the same offense.

[You seem to have misunderstood us. The evil doer to others does need both repentance and a Redeemer; for his wrong doing to others is not merely an injury to them, but an offense against God. God, in his law, has forbidden it, and therefore God's authority is insulted by it. On this account, he needs a Redeemer. But if his wrong doing were an offense against man only, he would need no Redeemer. Christ did not die to atone for the offenses of one man against God. We are not, "after a full and just punishment, again punished for the same offense." If a man wrongs another, he is requited for it here in this world, so far as it was merely a wrong to his fellow-creature. But, in such requital, the character of the act, as an offense against God, is not taken into the account. Surely, this distinction is perfectly plain. If not, we will try to illustrate it.

A boy is commanded by his father not to swear. He goes to school, and is commanded by his teacher not to swear. During school hours, he has some altercation with one of his fellow pupils, gets angry, and swears. Here is a double offense in one single act—an offense against his teacher, and an offense against his parent. His teacher flogs him soundly for disregarding his authority, and when he goes home, his father flogs him for disregarding his. Thus, he is punished twice for the same act, and each time as much as he deserves; that is, as much as he owes to the authority against which he has offended. Is there any thing "contrary to our sense of justice" in this?]

2d. Those whose deeds are not known to others cannot be punished by them in "scorn and violence," which, you say, is the manner in which God avenges the injuries which our fellow-creatures suffer by reason of our evil doings.

["Deeds not known to others" are not, usually, injuries inflicted upon them. The subject of an injury may not, indeed, know who is the author of it, but it is not common for him to be ignorant of the fact that he has been injured. It is not necessary that the "scorn and violence," meted out as a punishment of the perpetrators of wrongs, should be inflicted by those who have received the wrongs; nor did we teach any such thing. Neither is it necessary, that those who are made the instruments of inflicting the punishment, should understand that they are serving the purpose of God in the matter. It is enough that "scorn and violence" overtake the wrong doer, at some time, and in some way, before he leaves this world; and that the providence of God will certainly bring it about. When Adoni-Bezek cut off the thumbs and great toes of seventy captive kings, and made them gather meat under his table, he was not punished by those whom he had thus mutilated; nevertheless, he was overtaken, afterward, by the same kind of punishment, inflicted by those, too, who before had known nothing about his cruelty. And he himself acknowledged the righteousness of the providence. "As I have done, so God hath requited me." Judges 1: 7.]

But, to the other point in your remarks. You say, "But as far as there is any guilt or criminality in our sins, considered as against God, the punishment is not inflicted in this life"—and that offense to ourselves involved in wrongs and injuries to others is reserved for a judgment to come. [A misquotation. See our remarks above.] Now we would conclude from this, that those who may escape punishment from their fellows might live here, in the enjoyment of all the happiness which could have been their lot if they had never sinned.

[But as you have misquoted our language, and made out an inconsistency where none existed, we cannot be responsible for your conclusion; it is entirely your own.]

If it is conducive to our own happiness to love and venerate the Supreme Being, a contrary course must be productive of sorrow and punishment. For it is not reasonable that punishments are all arbitrary inflictions, but that they are but the legitimate and natural consequences of wrong doing. And if man, in kind offices to another, is producing his own enjoyment, a contrary course must cause misery and punishment, independent of any opinion that may be held of him by others. D. C.

PLYMOUTH, Wis., Jan. 5th, 1853.

It is, unquestionably, "conducive to our happiness," here in this life, "to love and venerate the Supreme Being." But it does not follow, that "a contrary course must be productive of sorrow and punishment." If the sinner had once before stood in the love of God, and enjoyed the happiness of such a state, he would, no doubt, feel sad whenever he reflected upon what he had lost. But the case is far otherwise. He has never known the love of God; he has never known the happiness of communion with Him; he has, all his life, been "alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in him." Of course, he feels no loss; he is quite well satisfied with the pleasures of this life. Give him wealth, pleasure, plenty of earthly comforts, and he will say to his soul, 'Take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry.' God is not in all his thoughts; and he is the more happy, in proportion as he can succeed in shutting God out completely.

It may be "reasonable" to our correspondent, that "punishments are not arbitrary inflictions"—nothing but "the legitimate and natural consequences of wrong doings;" but we reason somewhat differently. In every transgression, there is not only an outrage of natural laws, but a want of subordination to the lawgiver. It is as necessary for the sake of government, that the lawgiver's authority be vindicated, as it is for our health that natural laws be regarded. All that we have time to say upon this point, at present, however, may be set forth in a simple illustration.

A father forbids his son to enter a certain field. After a time, the boy is found at play near the enclosure, and seeing a prodigious quantity of beautiful flowers, of every hue and color, scattered through the tall grass, he leaps over the fence, and rambles about among the flowers for some time. It is not long before the child's flesh is affected with an intolerable itching, which goes on till a loathsome eruption covers his whole body. The child has been poisoned. The flowers, so tempting, were poisonous flowers.

Now, according to our simple way of reasoning, the child suffers all this distress, not as a punishment for disobeying his father, but for his imprudence—his ignorance and disregard of natural laws. If it be said that it was a punishment for disobedience, what shall be said of another boy, who went into the field at the same time, having first obtained his father's consent? For he, too, has contracted the poison, and is suffering in like manner. To us, it appears very plain, that the authority of the father, set at nought by the first boy's offense, is not yet vindicated; and the father ought, in justice to himself, and in justice to the family over which he presides, to take the necessary steps for its vindication.

Now, we have no hesitation in admitting that, in every violation of the Moral Law, there is an outrage of natural or constitutional principles, as well as disobedience of sovereign, intelligent authority. There is, to adopt the language of another, "a wrenching of the soul into a moral dislocation. It is a rupture of the bands which keep the moral fabric in its integrity, and from the consequent suffering there is no exemption." But, at the same time, we believe that the authority of God, in commanding us to abstain from transgression, is as much to be respected as his wisdom in informing us that we incur danger by sinning. And though, to some extent in the present life, and more fully in the future, the misery of sinners will grow naturally out of their violations of the constitution of their being, the insulted authority of God their Lawgiver must be vindicated besides. BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Law and Prayer Books of the Chinese Jews—The Holy Places—The Druses—The Madiai.

GLASGOW, January 7th, 1852.

The native Chinese Christian messengers sent from Hong Kong by the Bishop of Victoria to the Jews at Kae-Fung-Foo purchased six of their thirteen copies of the Law. Of these six, the Bishop has sent five to this country—and the British Museum, the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and the University Library of Cambridge, have each been thus enriched with a Roll. The Committee of the London Society for promoting Christianity among the Jews, to whom these Rolls were sent, say they have no data from which they can come to any certain conclusion as to their antiquity; but they are found to "correspond, generally speaking, with the Rolls of the Law used by the Jews in this and other countries; but there are some slight variations, occasioned probably by mistake on the part of the transcribers."

A collection of MS. Prayer Books were obtained at the same time. From these it appears, also, that the main features of the services of the Jews in the Synagogue at Kae-Fung-Foo correspond with those of their brethren in other parts of the world, at the present time, with slight variations.

After numerous very contradictory statements as to the dispute between the Greek and Romish churches relative to "the Holy Places" at Jerusalem, the Paris Union (a Romish Journal,) states confidently, that it is now absolutely concluded in favor of the Latins. To them is to be entrusted the key of the Church at Bethlehem, and a new silver Star is to replace that which they accuse the Greeks of having removed some five or six years ago. The Sultan has been in vain striving to please both parties; and the displeasure of the Emperor of Russia he may now calculate upon. But the Ambassador of the new French Emperor was still more determined. We may look for the Land of Immanuel rising into importance in the estimation of the nations, and of its being prepared for the return of those to whom by covenant it is secured.

The Druses have been in revolt, and although hostilities are at present suspended, they are likely to be resumed, unless the Porte make changes which its financial difficulties interfere to prevent. The intrigues of Russia are not unlikely brought to bear from time to time even to prevent this. The Czar having continually an eye to the possession of Constantinople, it is policy to keep the Sultan in trouble. He then interposes his aid—at an expense which weakens more and more the Turkish power, and aggrandizes himself by an accession both of territory and influence.

The Madiai are still in their prisons. A letter of Rosa to her husband has just appeared in an Italian paper published in London. It is full of faith and love—encouraging and cheering him. Austria seems to be much disposed to act in concert with Tuscany in hatred to Protestantism—both being stimulated by a priesthood who find persecution to be easier than persuasion. But the Pope himself seems to confess an imperfection of knowledge, even on important points. He has appointed a Commission "to investigate the mystery of the immaculate conception of the Holy Virgin with the greatest minuteness." It seems an odd subject for any Commission, and we had supposed it had been understood and promulgated long ago. But no Commission is proposed for ascertaining how far their Church has departed from the truth as revealed in God's word. J. A. BEGG.

THE SCARCITY OF MINISTERS.

It is a truth, too painfully and extensively felt to be denied, that while the harvest is plenteous beyond parallel, there is a sad deficiency in the number of able and devoted men to gather the perishing thousands into the garner of the Lord. Were the causes clearly understood, by our ministry and membership, we are persuaded there is power sufficient in the church to wholly remove the deficiency. Let us glance at some of the sources of the increased demand for able ministers, and inquire why the supply is not proportionate.

The demand arises from—1st. An increase of population in the States of not less than one million during the past year; 2d. New fields of labor, which are constantly opening along the line of our public improvements by enterprising emigrants; 3d. A call for agents and missionaries. Is there not a work here which laymen are competent to perform? Are there not men in abundance, whose talents are rusting, who might otherwise be employed entirely in the work of "agencies," and thus assist in filling up the ranks, and saving souls from death? Then the islands of the sea, and "the uttermost parts of the earth," longing to become the inheritance of the Son of God, increase greatly the call for more laborers in the enlarged vineyard.

In the second place, let us notice some of the causes of a failure in the manner and quality of the supply.

1st. A neglect of duty on the part of old ministers, in encouraging and bending the steps of young men toward the ministry. Who, that is now standing on the walls of Zion, cannot remember how the "fathers in Israel" were accustomed to seek out the self-distrusting, yet promising young man, and with streaming eyes breathe the prayer to Heaven, "Lord, make him a faithful minister?" How that prayer thrilled through his soul! How it fastened upon his memory, and became an ever-present and all-controlling thought, until it forced out the long-suppressed reply, "Amen, thy will be done?" It is often said, that there are three evidences of a call to the ministry—first, an impression of duty made by the Holy Spirit upon the heart; second, a call from the church; third, the divine power accompanying and sanctioning labors. Now, if the first of these evidences is not followed by the second, the man is supposed to be mistaken as to his duty. But is it not possible, and indeed probable, that the Lord has called thousands to this work, and yet his watchmen have failed, through indifference, to see the "signs of promise," and never encouraged or assisted in the least the waiting, trembling energies of the God-called man?—never have helped to plume the wing or break the bonds of the embryo herald of the cross? Are there not men in other pursuits, who to-day might be reaping with a mighty arm in our Master's harvest, had they been faithfully urged at first to put forth a hand? Is there not a woeful lack here? Do our ministry seek out and enforce upon young men the duty of working for God? Do they set before them with earnestness and affection the claims of humanity, the wants of the church, the peril of souls, the value of an immortal spirit, and the rich reward of him who "shall doubtless return again, bearing his sheaves with him?" This may be done in the pulpit to a certain extent, but the instructions of the pulpit will never do the entire work.

2d. A want of encouragement to beginners on the part of the membership. In olden times, the nursing fathers and mothers used to stay up the hands and encourage the heart of the fainting aspirant, get him to "try" to preach, and respond, "Amen, Lord bless him," until his young and ardent soul, freed from fear and embarrassment, uttered words that burned and thoughts that enraptured the heart. If he failed once, twice, or even a score of times, he was made to feel that the sympathies, prayers, hands and hearts of the brethren were with and for him, and he girded himself anew, and at last gloriously prevailed. Is it not different now? If a candidate does not preach at the first effort like Chrysostom, some hang down their heads, sit uneasy, and instead of praying the despairing young speaker "right up to heaven," and at the close of service taking him warmly by the hand, and whispering a word of comfort to his troubled heart, go out and say, "He has mistaken his calling," "His head is a continent of mud," "His speech is an unbearable jargon," "He will never do for this enlightened age." His faults are greatly magnified, his feelings wounded, his spirit crushed, and a brilliant star is set and lost to the church forever. Brethren, is this the way to drill new recruits for Immanuel's army? If the youth lacks ability to edify the intelligent auditory—and what youth does not?—better raise a fund, say fifty dollars per year, and start him off to some institution, where, under the instruction of warm-hearted, clear-headed, and Heaven-inspired men, he may be taught the way of preaching more perfectly. Would not this be far more Christian-like than to stand afar off, and with a Pharisaical stare, look on to see if the bruised reed will recover?—whether the young man, after dark and weary years of struggling against floods of adversity and trial, will rise at last above the billows, before he sinks into the grave? Oh, how many bright and noble minds, doomed to eternal seclusion, under the pressure of heavy pecuniary embarrassment, might be secured to the service of our Redeemer, if some of our wealthy societies and members would furnish them with "material aid" as well as good wishes, and that with a cheerful spirit! What inducement is now held out for a youth of conscious mental strength, to spend three years at an academy, two at a college, and three at a biblical school, all at his own expense, and that too with the bare hope that he may by and by settle down with some church where he will possibly receive one or two hundred dollars a year to support himself and discharge the debt he may have incurred in prosecuting his studies? But some one will say, "Let him go right to preaching, and avoid such an expense and waste of time." Yes; let him be a dwarf, cripple, pigmy, pack-mule for carrying abuse and ridicule until the sod covers him. Another says, "Let him endure the trial of preparation for Christ's sake." For "Christ's sake" do, my brother, take hold and help him bear the burthen, lest he be crushed under it, and rise no more. In the Western Association of 1849, it was remarked by a brother, concerning the resolutions touching this subject, that they were "do-nothing resolutions;" and we need not speak of the literal truth of that remark. We have young men whom the church should nourish ere they are lost to her forever, who have been known to weep, and bitterly too, because they were driven from the school to labor for pecuniary means. Why cannot the Seventh-day Baptist Church have a permanent fund to help poor and promising students of theology, so that the demand for able men may be early supplied?

3d. The third and last reason we notice is, a wrong view in the minds of young men in relation to the character of the work. Many suppose it to be a work of all toil, all privation, and little enjoyment, as well as poor pay. Ought they not to be taught, that no profession holds out so many inducements, social, intellectual, spiritual, and eternal, as that of the Christian ministry? True, a man may in time become the owner of more dollars by being a lawyer or physician; yet in this respect the chances are against him, when the country is surfeited with such; and it does appear to us, that if a man is faithful as a pastor or preacher, and tries to render himself acceptable and useful to the people, he is about as sure of obtaining a comfortable support in that as in any other profession. The cases are rare indeed where a minister dies in want, while such cases in other callings are numerous. The time is past when the church was too poor to pay her ministry, or thought they should be starved into humility. The day has come when the membership believe the words of God, that "the laborer is worthy of his hire," and see the importance and feel the duty of supplying his temporal wants, that he may give himself wholly to his work. Ought not our ministry to tell the young man, by way of encouragement, how preëminent their profession is in improving, purifying, elevating and refining the social qualities; in promoting and cultivating a vigorous and noble mentality; in improving, polishing, and making beautiful, all the finer feelings and nobler attributes of nature, until the soul becomes like a high-toned harp, tuned to the melody of angels? And then should they not present to the mind the superior subjects which engage their attention?—not civil, or, as the case may be, uncivil law—not disease, which destroys the body, or the remedy, which assays to cure. What is their calling but the highest department of law and physics? What is it but a sublime practice in Heaven's jurisprudence, in the "higher law," in Calvary's art of healing? What sublimity, what grandeur, what glory adorns and ennobles their profession! How honored he who lawfully enters it! How often its inspiring themes lift up the soul, till

> "The invisible appears in sight,
> And God is seen by mortal eye."

May the love of the Saviour impel the ministry and membership to vigilance in searching out and encouraging those devoted hearts, now in obscurity, that the inward call of the Spirit may respond to the outward call of the church, and strong men, holy men, seeing the demand for help, the excellence of the work, and the felicitous issue, may enter the ranks, and lead on in the world's conquest and redemption, until the

> In bliss returns to reign."

TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION IN ALBANY.—The friends of Temperance had a four-days demonstration at Albany last week, designed to forward the passage of a law to prohibit the traffic in intoxicating drinks. During the four days there was a semi-annual meeting of the State Temperance Society, a meeting of the State Temperance Alliance, several sessions of the Sons of Temperance, a grand procession of all sorts of temperance folks which marched though the streets and brought up at the State House, and finally the Women's State Temperance Convention. Among the speakers at the various meetings which were held, were P. T. Barnum, Neale Dow, Rev. Messrs. Chapin and Beecher, and a host of other advocates of the Temperance Reform. The State Temperance Society adopted a resolution insisting that it is the duty of the present Legislature to enact a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage, with adequate penalties and suitable provisions for its enforcement; and, further, that in case the present Legislature shall adjourn without having passed a prohibitory law, it will be the right and duty of the friends of temperance, at the next election, to combine their influence so as to make the temperance question the main issue.

SYMPATHY FOR THE MADIAI.—The Senate of New York, on the 19th inst., unanimously adopted the following resolutions:—

That the Legislature of the State of New York have regarded with deep solicitude and regret the recent persecutions to which Francisco Madiai, and his wife, Rosa Madiai, have been subjected in the kingdom of Tuscany, for the alledged crime of reading the Holy Scriptures.

That the congratulations with which the State of New York formerly and by public act hailed in 1847 the efforts of Pius the IXth to ameliorate the condition of the Italian people, and to bestow upon them the incalculable blessings of national independence and constitutional freedom, make eminently proper at this time a formal and public remonstrance against cruel and flagrant oppression in the same land.

That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to exert his best influence with the Government of Tuscany to obtain, as a favor asked by a people which welcomes all strangers and protects all religions, permission for the Madiai, and their fellow-prisoners for the same offense, to emigrate to this country.

That a copy of these resolutions be duly authenticated and forwarded by the Governor to the President of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

CHRISTIANITY AMONG THE HINDOOS.—Rev. Dr. Scudder, writing from Madras, says that the Hindoo mind is so thoroughly roused, that all the enemies of Christianity are united in opposing it. A book has been published, embracing all the common objections, and expressing great apprehension as to the prevalence of the Gospel. The "Friend of India," in speaking of these things, compares the state of things in India to that of Paganism in the Roman Empire, in the time of Diocletian, and says, "There are signs on every hand that we are witnessing the beginning of the end." Dr. S. describes the case of a young Brahmin, in the North of India, who was selected to confute a Christian tract, which he attempted, but in the course of his investigation, became convinced of its truth, and was baptized. In consequence, his wife was taken from him, and kept for two years, when he took possession of her, and his rights were sustained by the court.

THE CHURCH-BUILDING FUND OF THE CONGREGATIONALISTS.—Collections for this Fund were taken up in most of the New York and New England churches on the first Sunday in January. In Henry Ward Beecher's church, Brooklyn, the collection amounted to twenty-five hundred dollars; in Mr. Storrs's, Brooklyn, to eighteen hundred dollars; in the Tabernacle, New York, to over one thousand dollars, and in Dr. Cheever's to about fifteen hundred dollars. What the whole collection amounted to has not been announced, but it is generally expected to exceed the proposed $50,000.

To Bro. Wm. M. Fahnestock:—

When your communication, in answer to my inquiries, appeared in the Recorder, I was from home; and since my return, besides a multiplicity of cares and duties that have pressed upon me, the state of my health has been such that I could not, without inducing severe pain, sit at my desk a sufficient length of time to write a reply to your questions. I write this explanation, that I may not appear inattentive or indifferent.

Yours in hope of eternal life,

N. V. HULL.

BIBLIOTHECA SACRA AND AMERICAN BIBLICAL REPOSITORY.—The January number of this valuable quarterly (published by W. F. Draper & Brother, Andover,) has articles by Prof. Wm. S. Tyler on "Socrates as a Teacher;" by Prof. C. E. Stowe on "the right interpretation of the Sacred Scriptures;" by Edward Beecher, D. D., on "the Works of Samuel Hopkins;" by Charles Short on the "Prolegomena to Tischendorf's new edition of the Septuagint;" "Outlines of a Journey in Palestine in 1852, by E. Robinson, E. Smith, and others;" "College Course, and its enlargements for Graduates," by Prof. Hickok of Union College; "The Relations and Consequent Mutual Duties between the Philosopher and the Theologian;" Notices of New Publications; and select Theological and Literary Intelligence.

The article on College Education, by Prof. Hickok, gives an exposition of certain changes about to be introduced in the system of instruction at Union College. It seems that this institution has come into possession of property, from which the amount of at least $500,000, and probably a much larger sum, will be realized for educational purposes. A portion of the income of this Fund is to be devoted to professorships of $25,000 each, and scholarships of $1,000 each, until a sufficient number of each for the prosperity of the college shall have been established. Another portion is to be applied to an astronomical observatory, cabinet, library, gardens, cemetery, pleasure-ground, and so forth. It is a condition in both professorships and scholarships, that no incumbent shall use either tobacco or intoxicating drinks. But the most important part of this endowment contemplates a large advance in the order of American scholarship. It is proposed to organize a three-years' course of scientific and literary instruction for a select number of college graduates. The trustees of the college are authorized to add the provisions made for two professorships into one, if necessary, to obtain the most able men as professors in this Higher Department, and also to put two scholarships into one for such graduates as may be found disposed and competent to enter it. The students will be selected from the current graduating class, with reference to their talents and character, while the Department will be open to graduates of any college who shall be found qualified on examination. The Department includes five professorships, which are to be filled as speedily as possible, the number to be enlarged as occasion shall require. The outline of the course under these professorships will be as follows: 1. Natural Science, under the general divisions of Geology, Biology, and Chemistry; 2. Mathematics and Astronomy; 3. Ancient Philology and Literature, including Philosophy of Language, Principles of Interpretation, Critical and Philosophical Examination of Ancient Authors; 4. History, divided into Anthropology, Ethnology, and Study of History; 5. Metaphysics, embracing Rational Psychology, Philosophy of Æsthetics, Philosophy of Science, and Absolute Classification of All Science.

THE AMERICAN POLYTECHNIC JOURNAL; a new monthly periodical, devoted to Science, Mechanic Arts, and Agriculture; conducted by Prof. Charles G. Paige, M. D., late chief examiner of patents; J. J. Greenough, M. E., formerly of the Patent Office; and Chas. L. Fleischman, C. E. Washington, opposite the Patent Office; New York, No. 6 Wall-st. The first number of this work contains 80 large octavo pages of well selected and arranged matter relating to Science, Mechanics, Chemistry, Agriculture, and the Arts. Terms, $3 per annum, 10 copies for $5.

"BEATRICE, OR THE UNKNOWN RELATIVES," is the title of a "religious novel" by Catharine Sinclair, designed to show the arts employed by the Jesuits to beguile Protestants into the false convictions of Romanism. From a cursory view of the work, we think it may serve a good purpose in warning the unwary against the wiles of Jesuitism. 12 mo. pp. 384. Dewitt & Davenport, publishers, Tribune Buildings, New York.

WILBUR FISK'S WIDOW.—Among the men who labored and sacrificed for the establishment of Methodism, perhaps none deserved more than Wilbur Fisk, the first President of Wesleyan University. Yet his widow is now living in abject poverty. We are glad to learn, however, that measures for her relief are on foot. A subscription has been proposed, to raise $2,000, of which Mrs. F. shall receive the interest during her life, and then the principal shall go to the college. One quarter of the sum has already been subscribed.

NUMBER OF BAPTISTS IN THE WORLD.—The American Baptist Register for 1852 has tables of Baptists, of all sorts and in all countries; and finally presents the following "Grand Summary of Baptized Professed Christians in the World:"—

	Churches.	Ministers.	Members.
N. America,	16,709	13,144	1,237,621
Europe,	2,053	1,700	196,824

A FUGITIVE SLAVE PREACHER.—Rev. J. W. Loguen, the eloquent colored preacher of Syracuse, is a fugitive from slavery, and of course liable at any moment to be seized and sent back to slavery. The Auburn Advocate says that an effort is being made by Aristarchus Champion, Esq., of Rochester, to purchase the freedom of Loguen and his mother, who is still in slavery.

INTERVENTION FOR RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.—At a rencent meeting on behalf of the Madiai, Dr. Murray said he learned that President Fillmore, and the Secretary of State, Mr. Everett, had already adressed representations to the Grand Duke in favor of the Madiai, and other sufferers for conscience sake in Tuscany.

Prayer for Colleges.—A benevolent individual who is deeply impressed with the importance prayer for colleges as a means of increasing the number of educated ministers, has placed $150 at the disposal of the Society for Promoting Collegiate and Theological Education at the West, to be given to the author of the best essay on that subject. The circular says:—

> "The writer is expected to set forth the importance of the subject, especially as relates to the conversion of young men in a course of education, and the consequent increase of candidates for the sacred ministry. Also the encouragements derived, not only from the divinely appointed relations of prayer to the conversion of men, but also from the signal answers to prayer for this specific object furnished by numerous revivals of religion in colleges. Then, by way of inference, the obligations of instructors to labor unceasingly for the conversion and sanctification of those under their training, and of pious young men in colleges to co-operate in this work, together with the obligations of Boards of Trust, to whom the church, in an important sense, commits the sacred interests of Christian education."

Ladies' Temperance Convention.—A Ladies' State Temperance Covention was held at Albany, N. Y., Jan. 21st. The attendance was very large, the addresses, speeches and resolutions pithy and pointed. A Committee of Ladies from the Convention invaded the Assembly Chamber, where, by a suspension of the rules, they were permitted to present in person the petition of 28,000 women of the Empire State, praying the Legislature to enact a law for the suppression of the rum traffic. Miss Clark, Chairman of the Committee, made a speech, explaining the reasons why the petitioners ask for the passage of the law in question.

Union Theological Seminary.—The annual catalogue of Union Theological Seminary in the City of New York, has just been issued, from which it appears that there are 88 students in the institution, of whom 9 were graduates of Yale and 8 of Williams College; Amherst College and the New York City University furnish 6 each; Knox College, Ill., and Union College, N. Y., 5 each; 17 are from New York and the adjacent cities; 10 from New York State, 19 from New England, 17 from the West, and 15 from the South.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

The Congregational Journal states that Rev. Mr. Atkinson, the first Congregational minister who entered Oregon five years ago, has been laboring the season past in New England, to obtain aid for himself and his associates in labor. The immediate objects proposed are the establishment of a college and female seminary. Mr. A. has secured the services as instructor of Mr. Marsh, now of the Theological Seminary in New York, and son of the late Dr. James Marsh, of Burlington College. For the female seminary $11,000 have been raised in Oregon. The seminary building has been erected, furnished with a bell, a piano, and some apparatus, and has been in operation for a year.

There are, says the Congregational Journal, eighteen hundred and one Lutheran ministers in the United States. The list embraces Old Lutherans, New Lutherans, General Synod Lutherans, Hinkelites, Frankeans, etc. Of these, two hundred and twenty-four are in Pennsylvania, one hundred and sixty-eight in Ohio, seventy-five in New York, forty-seven in Indiana, forty in Illinois, thirty-seven in Virginia, and the rest scattered throughout the various sections of the Union, from Maine to California.

It is stated that Archbishop Cullen, of Dublin, has issued a pastoral letter to his clergy, in which he defends the persecution of the Madiai, and denounces all Romanists who will not do the same. He claims the act to be thoroughly Romish and right; that it is the principle of Papists to persecute Protestants even to death. The principle on which he proceeds is, that when one proselytes a Romanist to Protestantism, he ruins a soul, and death is too good for him.

In the British possessions in India, containing 94,500,000 inhabitants, are 337 missionaries; which is the same as if Massachusetts had only three ministers of the gospel, or New York city two only. In the States tributary to Great Britain are 40,500,000 inhabitants, with only two missionaries; which is the same as if there was only one minister of the gospel to the whole United States. And yet all these regions are open for the gospel.

The movement for a subscription for Mrs. Stowe, headed by the Earls of Carlisle and Shaftesbury, and by the Quakers Gurney and Alexander, and others of similar stamp, is proceeding, and will doubtless result in a handsome sum, to be added to the nearly $25,000 which Mrs. S. has already received from her American publishers, with prospects of indefinite increase.

Rev. Isaac Robinson, D. D., of Stoddard, N. H., preached a sermon on the 50th anniversary of his ordination as pastor in that town. Of the council who ordained him, in 1803, but one remains, the venerable Rev. G. Newell, of Nelson, who for many years has had no charge of a parish, and is now nearly 90 years of age.

The ports of the island of Madagascar are again to be opened to the commerce of the world, and the ingress of missionaries. The Queen had given permission to all her subjects to return, and the young prince is reigning jointly with his mother, both being anxious to make a treaty with the British government.

On Christmas morning, when Rev. Mr. Clarkson, rector of St. James' church, Chicago, went into his vestry, he found on his table a purse of gold amounting to several hundred dollars, with a line saying it was the gift of a few friends to a beloved and devoted pastor.

The Puritan Recorder says a benevolent lady in Boston has contributed through the Doctrinal Tract and Book Society, during the year past, about a thousand dollars. This noble donation has gone to replenish ministers' libraries.

George G. Shuttuck, M. D., of Boston, has recently made a donation of $7000 to Dartmouth College, for the erection of an observatory and the purchase of astronomical and philosophical instruments; also a donation of $1000 for the purchase of books for the library.

The Baptists in the South-west are moving for the establishment of a new Baptist interest in New Orleans. The Conventions of Alabama and Mississippi have voted to render encouragement and aid in this enterprise. There is a legacy of $21,000 left for the erection of a house of worship, by Cornelius A. Paulding.

Dr. Belcher, of Philadelphia, has nearly ready for the press a new Life of Dr. Carey, the first English Baptist Missionary to India. A large portion of the volume, it is said, is new matter. A number of engravings will illustrate the letter-press.

There are in Mississippi 40,000 Baptists. The subject of education is now receiving among them great attention. $30,000 was subscribed towards the endowment fund of $100,000 proposed to be raised for a Literary and Theological Institution to be located at Clinton.

A vessel recently sailed from Liverpool for Australia with 550 emigrants. Among the passengers were two clergymen of the Church of England, four Roman Catholic priests, and three ministers of the Kirk of Scotland.

The bark Springbok, for Cape Town, Cape of Good Hope, takes out the Rev. Moses F. Bixby and wife, Rev. Daniel Whittaker and wife, and Miss Cephus Bennett, as missionaries to Maulmain.

An effort is being made in the bounds of Virginia Conference to raise a fund of $20,000, for the education of the daughters of the traveling preachers of that body.

The annual collection for Foreign Missions was made in Dr. James W. Alexander's church, in New York, on a recent Sunday, and three thousand dollars were contributed.

The establishment or increased endowment of eleven Old School Presbyterian Colleges at the West is in contemplation.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JAN. 17.

In the Senate, Mr. Seward presented the petition of Thos. Ewbank for assistance to enable him to try his newly-invented paddle wheels. Many other reports and petitions were presented. The most interesting item of business which followed was a resolution offered by Mr. Miller, directing an inquiry as to the propriety of recognizing the Independence of Liberia. The Pacific Railroad proposition created some discussion, but nothing was done in relation to it.

In the House, the pension bill to the widow of Gen. Armstrong passed, and Mr. Dean, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to appropriate $40,000 to carry out the resolution of Congress of 1783, to erect a colossal equestrian statue of Gen. Washington at the Capitol of the Nation. It is proposed that this work be executed by Clark Mills. This bill, which changes the costume of the statue originally proposed from the Roman to the Continental of the last century, was passed.

THIRD-DAY, JAN. 18.

In the Senate, the bill appropriating $50,000 for an Equestrian Statue of Washington, was passed—as it had passed in the House—unanimously. The session was mostly occupied by a discussion upon the resolutions of Mr. Cass in relation to the Monroe doctrine and Cuba. Mr. Cass made a very long speech, and Mr. Hale replied.

In the House, a bill was reported establishing a Branch Mint in New York. The bill for the suppression of small notes in the District of Columbia came up, and finally passed by a vote of 81 to 38. The bill in effect provides that any person making or uttering notes as currency in this District, under the denomination of $5, shall be liable to indictment by the Grand Jury for a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be imprisoned for a term not less than 10 days nor more than one year, and fined in a sum of not less than $100 nor more than $500.

FOURTH-DAY, JAN. 19.

In the Senate, a message from the President called attention to the claim of Spain on behalf of its subjects in the Amistad case, and recommended a prompt decision in regard to it. Mr. Mason made a long speech upon Mr. Cass's resolutions. Some progress was afterward made with the Pacific Railroad question, and the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the New York Mint proposition called forth a spicy debate, in which Mr. Chandler played a conspicuous part. Among some communications from the President, after the morning hour, was one formally announcing that the Seminoles refused to emigrate, which went to the Military Committee.

FIFTH-DAY, JAN. 20.

In the Senate, a large number of resolutions and petitions were presented, among which was a resolution of the New York Legislature concerning the distribution of the Public Lands to the several States for internal improvements, and a memorial of ship owners and others, setting forth the evils resulting from the abolition of corporeal punishment in the commercial marine, and asking a substitute therefor. A bill reported by the Territorial Committee, for a Railroad to the Pacific, was referred to a Select Committee.

In the House, the New York Mint was the cause of another spicy discussion, and but little progress appears to have been made with it. The French Spoliation bill came up—but apparently with very little advantage to any claimants under it.

SIXTH-DAY, JAN. 21.

In the Senate, numerous petitions were presented, including two from New York, praying that the Government of the United States would no longer permit or engage in traffic in land, but grant it in lots to actual settlers. Private bills were then taken up, and several were passed, among which was one compensating the representatives of Major Wigg, of South Carolina, whose property was destroyed by the British in the Revolution, in retaliation for acts of Gen. Greene, after the execution of Hayne. The Senate adjourned to Second-day.

The House passed a bill for the relief of Daniel Myerle, who had lost by supplying Government with water-rotted hemp. Then followed a long discussion as to whether the galleries should be cleared to hear a message from the President on the Spanish claim. The message was read publicly. Adjourned to Second-day.

European News.

The steamship Europa, with European news to Jan. 8th, one week later, arrived at Boston on the 22d inst.

The most important announcement by this arrival is the burning of the packet-ship St. George, bound for New York, with emigrants, upward of fifty of whom perished. This terrible catastrophe is reported by the ship Orlando, Capt. White, arrived at Havre from Mobile. On the 24th Nov. the St. George sailed from Liverpool for New York with 127 passengers, (mostly Irish,) a crew of 25, and a valuable cargo. On the morning of the 24th Dec., in lat. 46 12 N., long. 25 30 W., the ship was discovered to be on fire, and notwithstanding the most strenuous efforts, in which 7 or 8 persons were suffocated by the smoke, the flames burst out through the deck, and it being impossible to do more towards checking them, Capt. Bragdon mustered the women and children on the poop to save them as long as possible from the horrible death that stared them in the face. Fortunately, at this moment, the ship Orlando hove in sight, and bore down to render assistance. The sea ran so high that the ship's boats were speedily swamped, and none floated but the line-boat, which carried only five at a time, but by means of which, after several hours of incessant labor, seventy-six of the passengers and the crew were placed on board the Orlando. The storm had by this time increased into a tempest, and the Orlando had but just got clear of the burning ship when the latter sunk. About fifteen men were drowned in trying to reach the Orlando; eight were suffocated by the smoke when the fire was first discovered, and twenty-eight were burned or sunk with the ship. Some hours afterward the Orlando had most of her sails blown away. It was, however, determined to bear up for her destined port, and after eleven days of anxiety, being short of water and provisions, she succeeded in reaching Havre. A subscription was immediately set on foot in behalf of the unfortunate sufferers. The conduct of Capt. White and the crew of the Orlando is above all praise.

The ship Lady of the West, from Bristol, Dec. 23, for New Orleans, is also reported lost, having been abandoned. The Captain and 14 of the crew were picked up in the long boat, and carried to Falmouth, and four others, in the pinnace, were also picked up and taken to Brest.

An impression prevails in naval circles that two more Arctic Expeditions will be sent out this spring—one to Smith's and Jones's Sounds and another to Behring's Straits.

The Ministers of the Northern Powers have at length presented their credentials to the Emperor of the French. Nicholas absolutely refused to call Louis Napoleon by the title of brother, and compromised the matter by using the phrase "Mon Ami."

There has been more fighting in Algeria.

Cholera was very prevalent at Ona.

Madame Madiai is better in health, but still confined in prison.

The Police authorities of Brussels ordered that the funeral of Madame Kossuth—mother of the distinguished exile—should take place during the night, to prevent a political demonstration.

Some severe skirmishing has taken place between the Turks and Montenegrines at Kirbancer, on the Lake of Scutari. The Turks lost 600 killed, and the loss of the Montenegrines was also great. Both parties have thus broken the truce.

SUMMARY.

Gov. Farwell, of Wisconsin, in his message says, in relation to Railroads, that from the construction of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Road, and the surveys and estimates for the construction of other roads, it is apparent that railroads can be constructed in Wisconsin at an average cost of ten to eighteen thousand dollars per mile. From this cheapness, as compared with Eastern roads, the Governor assumes that the railroads of the State will yield a higher per cent. of profit upon the capital invested, and for that reason, that the means will not long be wanting to build the roads now projected within the boundaries of the State.

The Treasurer of Columbia County, Ohio, having called, on the 30th ult., upon the Salem Bank for taxes assessed several times, and being refused, on the ground that the tax was levied on the capital instead of the profits, entered the Bank with a posse, armed with guns, revolvers, and sledges, for the purpose of breaking open the vault and seizing the requisite funds. At this state of the affray an armistice was declared for the purpose of calling the Directors together, that they might decide whether they would or would not pay the tax so assessed. The Directors met and protested against paying, and by means of guns, crowbars, &c., drove the tax-gathering party out of the Bank.

A slight shock of an earthquake was sensibly felt at Milledgeville, Ga., on the 8th inst., at 7.40 P. M. This is the second or third earthquake that has occurred in the central portion of Georgia within the past few months. These phenomena have been more frequent the past year than for a long while before. Throughout the West India Islands and South America, as well as in Southern Europe and China, shock has succeeded shock with fearful rapidity. The ship Canthia witnessed a submarine volcanic eruption in mid-ocean, some months since, and other vessels have experienced shocks in southern latitudes. The frequency and simultaneousness of these phenomena would lead one to believe they arise from the same cause.

Gov. Conway, of Arkansas, has offered a reward of $200 for the arrest of one Henry A. Washington, who recently, in a cruel and unprovoked manner, murdered Mr. Newton J. Hudson, at Pine Bluffs. He is described as about 23 years old, 5 feet 8 inches high, fair complexion, smooth skin, almost without beard, dark flaxen hair, blue eyes, high forehead, but not prominent, a large mole on his chin, out of which grows a small bunch of hair, weighs about 130 pounds, being rather spare built.

The annual report on Commerce and Navigation shows that fourteen hundred and forty-four vessels have been built the past year, measuring three hundred and fifty-one thousand four hundred and ninety-four tuns, and that our aggregate tunnage is now four millions one hundred and thirty-eight thousand four hundred and forty-one tuns. Maine built last year three hundred and fifty-four vessels, measuring one hundred and ten thousand and forty-seven tuns.

The Greensboro' (Ala.) Beacon has the following notice of the value of negroes in that section: "Negroes hired here on the first instant, at higher prices than they have commanded since 1837–8. Men brought from $150 to $180. A lot of over 40, composed of men, women, boys and children, averaged over $100 a piece. And what is most remarkable, these prices were paid by some of the most prudent and responsible men in the country. The selling prices of negroes are also very high—though not altogether as high, relatively, as the hiring prices. Men command from $1,000 to $1,200, and women and boys about in the same proportion."

Mr. Wm. Glover, joiner, Newcastle, England, fixed a pistol in his room so that any person entering would be shot. This he did because the room had been entered in his absence, and contrary to his wish. Knowing the trick himself, he could so open the door as to occasion no discharge. It so happened, however, that he one day was unsuccessful in his attempt, and shot himself in the legs. Still, however, he persisted in his folly, to call it by no harsher name, and, last week, he again discharged the pistol, and was killed.

Mrs. DeKroyft, the lady who, for a year or two past, has excited the commiseration of the public by traveling through various parts of the country, for the sale of a book written by herself, in which she says she was in one month "a bride, a widow, and blind," has recently addressed a letter to Mrs. Fillmore, wife of the President, announcing that, in consequence of Mrs. F.'s advice, she had put herself under the care of an Oculist, by whose skill she has been so far restored to sight as to be able already to walk about the streets without a guide, and even to read large letters.

A bill has passed the Legislature of Florida to authorize the raising of two regiments of volunteers, for Indian service. According to the Floridian, the bill provides that the regiments raised be tendered to Government, and if refused, the Governor then to employ them in removing the savages. The Governor is required to keep the tender of the volunteers open until the 4th May, when, if not accepted, and nothing be done toward removing the Indians, the State will then go to work and do the business herself.

Robert G. Shaw, known everywhere as one of the most wealthy and influential merchants of Boston, the Fitchburg Reveille says, is crazy. He has been for some time deeply interested in spiritual manifestations, and it was to him that the spirit of Daniel Webster is said to have communicated, and given as an evidence of its identity Webster's signature, which by critics in such matters could not be distinguished from the signature of an unpaid note of $1,000 that Mr. Shaw holds against Webster.

A most heart-rending loss of life by drowning occurred in the neighborhood of Rahway, New Jersey, on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 22. It appears that a number of lads, of ages varying from ten to fourteen years, were enjoying themselves in skating upon a mill pond near the town, when several of them incautiously approached a hole which had been cut in the ice. Three of the number ran in, and were almost immediately drowned, although the water in the pond was only about three or four feet deep.

A Circular, signed by Washington Hunt, Horatio Seymour, T. Romeyn Beck, Henry S. Randall, Wm. L. Marcy, Sanford E. Church, Gerrit Y. Lansing, Gideon Hawley, Erastus Corning, and twenty-seven other gentlemen, has been issued, proposing to open a discussion in Albany upon the propriety of establishing a National University. The first meetings are to be held, say the Albany papers, on the 26th and 27th of the present month.

It is stated in one of the Boston papers, that a few evenings since, a little stranger, in the shape of a bright-looking boy, about four weeks old, was left on the door-steps of a Mr. Strange, No. 28 North Russell-st., who took him in and will see that he is properly cared for. What makes this strange affair more strange, is the fact that the father of Mr. Strange was left on somebody's door-steps in the same strange manner. This is why the name of Strange was given to him.

The friends of Temperance held a general mass meeting at Albany, Jan. 19, at which Mr. R. N. Havens stated that a bill, very stringent in its provisions, and so framed as to obviate the objections raised by Judge Curtis against the Rhode Island law, had been already drawn up by a committee previously appointed, and would be ready for presentation soon.

Col. E. W. B. Spivey, of Columbus, Ga., was lately assailed, in a murderous manner, by two men named John Calvin and William Stains, of Girard, Ala. In the melee, Spivey's son brought him a double-barreled gun, with which he shot both his assailants. They were both in a dying condition at last accounts. Col. S. received a ball in the hand and another on the head.

A negro woman belonging to Dempsey Weaver, Esq., jumped into the river night before last, says the Nashville (Tenn.) Gaz., with a child in each arm, and all three were drowned. Owing to her misconduct, her master had threatened to sell her, and she determined not to be sold. It is said that her husband had promised to end his existence in the same way, at the same time, but did not do so.

In Stark Co., Ohio, 404 licenses were granted for marriage in 1852; over 21 years and under 26, 184 males and 116 females. The average age of the bachelors was 25 2-5th years, and the maids 21¼ years. Between bachelors and maids there were 352 marriages; widowers and widows, 15; bachelors and widows, 7; widowers and maids, 30.

Hon. Nelson J. Beach, who has for some weeks past been acting in the service of the Hudson River Railroad Company, has been elected Vice-President of the Company, and will be charged with the duties of acting President, Mr. Morgan, the President, not desiring to devote his time to the business.

The public surveys in the Lake Superior land district will be pretty much closed up this season, and very large tracts of mineral and agricultural lands will be offered at public sale, we understand, in the spring. If we are correctly informed, there are some 150 townships of these valuable lands to be offered, or about 5,000,000 acres.

A bill is before the New York Legislature, and will probably pass, "to prevent injustice in the construction of Railroads in the City of New York." It requires a previous act of the Legislature before building a railroad, and is designed to head off the projectors of the Broadway Railroad.

A hotel, which is to be about six times as large as the Astor House, in this City, is to be erected at Cape May. It will be called the Mt. Vernon Hotel, and is to be a most magnificent structure. It will be 506 feet long, 306 feet wide, and four stories high. It will accommodate 2,500 guests, and is designed for those who visit that watering place.

William Page was convicted and sent to the State Prison for three years, for embezzling money from a letter taken from the Ogdensburg Post-Office, addressed to a female. The offense was committed on the 14th inst., and one week after, the prisoner was sent to the State Prison.

In the District Court, at Albany, Saturday, Jan. 22, a verdict was rendered on behalf of the United States, against Wm. A. Hilliard, of Bridgewater, N. Y., for using a postage stamp after it had been once used already, in violation of the act of 1851. This is the first conviction for this offense.

The Savannah Courier has a letter from Florida, which states that the Indians have formally declared War against the United States, and a painful rumor prevailed that Gen. Hopkins and his force had been massacred.

The Mayor of the city of Portsmonth, N. H., C. S. Toppan, has given to the city his salary for the last year, $300, as a perpetual fund, the income of which is to be annually expended in extras for the Thanksgiving dinner for the inmates of the alms-house.

John Townsend, of Prince George's County, Md., died some years since, emancipating 75 slaves and bequeathing them all his real estate. In the Circuit Court of Anne Arundel County, on Saturday last, this will was set aside on the ground of insanity.

A meeting was held in New York on Second-day evening, Jan. 24, to take measures for the relief of the fearful destitution brought on the inhabitants of the Island of Madeira by the destruction of the vine and potato.

The special train of cars which brought the Europa's mails from Boston to New York on Sunday night last, left Boston at 4 P. M., and reached New York at 9¾ P. M. The actual running time for 236 miles was five hours and five minutes.

Miss Catharine E. Beecher has published a letter, disclosing, as she inclines to think, the secret of the phenomena known as spiritual rappings, writings and manifestations. She attributes them to the will of the "medium" and to electricity.

MARRIED,

At Verona, N. Y., Jan. 16, 1853, by Samuel T. Marsh, Esq., Mr. Horace Morse, of Lenox, N. Y., to Miss Eliza Huneyman, of Alexandria, Jefferson Co., N. Y.

In Hopkinton, R. I., by Eld. D. Coon, Jan. 9th, Mr. Jirah I. Gray, of Westerly, and Mrs. Nancy C. Crocker, of Hopkinton.

In Independence, on the evening after the 1st inst., by Eld. T. E. Babcock, Mr. Samuel A. Livermore to Miss B. Emeline Wood, both of Independence.

DIED,

In Hopkinton, R. I., Dec. 29th, of a short illness, Thankful Stillman, wife of Phineas Stillman, in the 69th year of her age. She professed religion in early life, say at the age of 15 or 16 years, and united with the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, where she was an honor to the cause until she was removed to join the church triumphant. Her disease was called a disease of the heart. She lived only six or seven hours after she was taken ill. She died calm, without a struggle, with a serene hope of eternal life, lamented by an affectionate family, a large circle of relatives, and all acquaintances. Her kindness in the neighborhood will long be remembered, and her memory blessed. Luke 20: 36—"Neither can they die any more, for they are equal to the angels." D. C.

In Wirt, N. Y., Dec. 16th, 1852, George Rodman, only son of A. A. & Ruth Place, aged 1 year, 7 months, and 17 days.

"So fades the lovely flower."

BENEDICT W. ROGERS, Treasurer.

Central Railroad Company of New Jersey.

NEW YORK TO EASTON, PA. Fare, $1 75.—Fall Arrangement, commencing November 15, 1852. Leave Pier No. 1 North River daily, for Easton and intermediate places, at 8 A. M., 12 M., and 3.45 P. M., and for Somerville at 4.45 P. M. Returning, leave Phillipsburg at 6 and 9 A. M., and 3.15 P. M.

New York and Erie Railroad.

TRAINS leave pier foot of Duane-st., New York, as follows:

Express Train at 8 A.M. for Dunkirk, connecting with first-class steamboats for Cleveland, Sandusky, Toledo, and Monroe, and railroads to Cincinnati and Chicago.

Mail Train at 8 A.M. for all stations.

Way Train at 3½ P.M., via Piermont, for Delaware.

Night Express Train at 5 P.M. for Dunkirk, connecting with first-class steamboat for Detroit direct, connecting with Express Train for Chicago.

Emigrant Train at 5 P.M., via Piermont.

Light.

THE subscribers invite the attention of all persons who desire a cheap, brilliant, and safe light, to their Safety Phosgene Lamps and materials for burning.

They are also manufacturers of Burning Fluid and Camphene, together with the various kinds of Lamps, all of which they offer, wholesale and retail, on the best terms.

Call and see, at 117 Fulton-street.

Sept. 16—6m. CHAS. STARR, Jr., & Co.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses, Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

SLAVERY AND ANTI-SLAVERY: A History of the Great Struggle in Both Hemispheres; with a View of the Slavery Question in the United States. By William Goodell, author of "The Democracy of Christianity."

This work is designed to embody a great amount of historical information in a single volume, conveniently arranged for reference. It contains fifty chapters on as many distinct topics, embracing the most important facts in the political and ecclesiastical history of the contest, together with an account of the Anti-Slavery agitation in England and the United States up to the present time; the divisions among American Abolition[illegible], and the various measures advocated among them; is[illegible] closing with a brief discussion of the question, and c[illegible]ht to be done?" The book is an abstract "What ou[illegible]mes, besides the Anti-Slavery history of of several volu[illegible]rs, a great part of which has never the last twenty yea[illegible] into any volume, but lies scattered in the newspapers of [illegible] that period. The Table of Contents and a copious Alpha[illegible]betical Index will facilitate a reference to particular fa[illegible]ts, and to dates when desirable.

It is a large royal 12mo. volume, of about six hundred pages, well printed, on handsome paper, neatly bound in cloth, and lettered. Price one dollar per copy, at retail; $9 per dozen, or $65 per hundred, to booksellers and book-pedlars, for cash.

The postage on a single copy will be 30 cents to any part of the United States, and must be prepaid.

For sale by the publisher, William Harned, 48 Beekman-street, New York.

THE DEMOCRACY OF CHRISTIANITY, or an Analysis of the Bible and its Doctrines, in their relation to the principle of democracy. By William Goodell. Cady and Burgess, New York. Sold also by William Harned, 48 Beekman-street, New York. The first volume is occupied with an examination of the Old Testament; the second volume carries the investigation into the New, shows the bearing of the leading doctrines of the Gospel upon the principle of democracy, examines the institutions of the New Testament, traces the progress and the influence of Christianity in promoting human liberty, to the present time, and, in the light of Scripture prophecy, as illustrated by the signs of the times, unfolds the future prospects of humanity. The work is designed to promote liberty, both in the Church and the State, and to show that the cause of human freedom is identified with the Christian religion.

Price $1 50 at retail, $12 per dozen, or $90 per hundred.

An Edition for the Million.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN FOR 37½ CENTS!—We have yielded to the repeated and urgent solicitations of numerous friends of humanity, and now offer to them, and to the public generally—TO THE LIVING MASSES—an edition of Mrs. Stowe's unrivaled work, at a price so low as to bring it within the means of every person. It seems a work of supererogation to speak in complimentary terms of a book,

ONE MILLION COPIES OF WHICH

have been printed, in this country and in Europe, in a little more than six months—a sale which has no counterpart in the world's history. Yet, notwithstanding this immense sale, there are hundreds of thousands in our own country, who have not yet perused the glowing pages of UNCLE TOM'S CABIN, many of whom have been prevented from doing so, from inability to purchase. To remove this obstacle, we have issued this edition

☞ FOR THE MILLION. ☜

And millions will now read it, and own it, and drink in its heavenly principles, and the living generations of men will imbibe its noble sentiments, and generations yet unborn will rise up and bless its author, and thank the God of Heaven for inspiring a noble woman to utter such glowing, burning truths, for the redemption of the oppressed millions of our race.

To Booksellers, Philanthropists, or Societies, who wish to purchase the above by the thousand, for sale or distribution, a liberal discount will be made. The edition is very neatly printed, in a large octavo pamphlet of 166 pages, double columns, thick paper covers, and firmly stitched. We now offer to the public the following editions:

	Retail.
Uncle Tom's Cabin. Edition for the Million,	$0 37½
Uncle Tom's Cabin in German, (in press, to be published about the 1st of January, 1853,)	0 50
Uncle Tom's Cabin, the edition in 2 vols., bound in cloth, best library edition,	1 50
Uncle Tom's Cabin, superb illustrated edition, with 145 original designs by Billings, engraved by Baker & Smith, in 1 vol. 8vo. cloth,	2 50
Uncle Tom's Cabin, cloth, full gilt,	3 50
Uncle Tom's Cabin, extra Turkey, full gilt,	5 00

JOHN P. JEWETT & CO., Publishers, Boston.
Jewett, Proctor & Washington, Cleveland, Ohio.

☞ P. S.—Mrs. Stowe is now preparing, and in a few days will offer to the public,

☞ A KEY TO UNCLE TOM'S CABIN, being a complete refutation of some charges which have been made against her on account of alledged overstatements of facts in Uncle Tom. It will make a pamphlet of about 100 pages, double columns, and will present original facts and documents, most thoroughly establishing the truth of every statement in her book. Price 25 cents.

Miscellaneous.

The Caloric Engine.

The recent trial trip of Capt. Ericsson's new Caloric Ship is generally represented as remarkably successful. We have looked through several reports of it in hope of finding a clear statement of the principle upon which the Engine is constructed and worked. In the absence anything better, we copy from one of the daily papers the following :—

"The Caloric Engine is no hasty product. Twenty-five years ago Ericsson conceived the idea. For twenty-five years he has been engaged in elaborating and perfecting it. In 1833 he propounded it to the scientific world at London. Men of the highest authority, such men as Faraday and Brunel, pronounced it good, and predicted its triumph. But there were practical difficulties. The principle was clear; not so its application. Those difficulties have had to be overcome gradually, one by one. Since the first model engine of five-horse power was constructed, the inventor has built some twelve or thirteen others, in each making some improvement, removing some obstacle. Two years since his invention was complete. No hindrance remained to be vanquished. He was ready to submit the New Motive Power to the test of trial on the largest scale. Fortunate beyond other great inventors, at every step he had found means to go forward. And now came the final demonstration. For that means were also found. Enlightened capitalists came forward, and examined, and were convinced. The funds were furnished. It was determined to bring out the machine on a scale unprecedented in the history of inventions. The Ericsson, a splendid ship of 2,200 tuns, was constructed, the machinery built and put on board." * * * * *

"The first thing in the engine which strikes the observer, is the magnitude of the cylinders. These are fourteen feet in diameter, six feet more than those of the Collins' steamers. There are four in the Ericsson, standing in a fore-and-aft line; two before and two abaft the shaft, and working in pairs upon it. From the base of the cylinders to the summit is about thirty feet. Each cylinder is double, consisting of what is called a working cylinder and a supply cylinder, the latter being on top and united with the other, though of inferior diameter. The working cylinder has the furnace under it; in it the active force of the machine is developed in the form of air expanded by heat. The supply cylinder is always cold. The working cylinder is 14 feet in diameter; the piston which plays in it has a superficies of 22,300 square inches. The supply cylinder is 11 feet 7 inches in diameter, and the area of its piston is 14,500 square inches. These pistons are joined by powerful iron rods. The stroke is 6 feet. On the under side of the upper piston are valves through which the supply of fresh air is drawn after the machine is put in motion. Over the supply cylinder is a reservoir in which the upward motion of the piston compresses the air, which passes in there through valves. The connection between the reservoir and working cylinder is by a large pipe running from the former to the base of the latter. The engine is set in motion by pumping cold air into the reservoir, by hand or otherwise.

"From the reservoir, through a valve at the bottom of the large connecting pipe, the compressed air is admitted into the working cylinder over the furnace. Here it is instantly heated, and by its expansion drives up the piston, and at the same time compresses the air in the supply cylinder, and forces it into the reservoir. Then another valve in the connecting pipe opens, and the hot air is let off into the atmosphere. This removes the pressure that has driven the piston up, when its own weight brings it down again, and the escape valve closes. Then the supply valve opens again, and lets the cold air in over the furnace; it is heated, and so the process goes on.

"But the great feature of the invention is yet to be described. This is the apparatus by which the main part of the heat which expands the air in the working cylinder is saved and made to do duty over and over again. This it is that produces the astonishing economy of fuel, which is one of the great characteristics of the invention. In a steam engine the heat is used but once; it passes away, and therefore has to be perpetually renewed. In the Caloric engine it is economized. This is an immense advantage. The apparatus is formed of iron wire, 1-16 of an inch in diameter, woven into a web dense enough for the holes or meshes to occupy half the surface. Fifty thicknesses, or disks, of this wire cloth are used in each pipe connecting the reservoir and working cylinders. Each disk is 6 feet long and 4 wide, and contains half a million of meshes. They are placed close together in the pipe between the working cylinder and the two valves which let in the new air and let out that which has been used.

Thus all the air which comes in passes through the meshes of the wires, as does all that goes out. Here lies the wonder of the invention. The heated air in going out leaves its heat in these wires, and the cold air in coming in takes it up again. In the engines of the Ericsson the air which comes out is but 30° hotter than the atmosphere, though before passing through the wires it was 384° hotter. Even these 30° might be saved, says Capt. Ericsson, by increasing the number of wire disks, but it is practically unnecessary. This apparatus is called the regenerator. Though the principle of it is essentially the same as that of Davy's Safety Lamp, the glory of its application to mechanical purposes is Capt. Ericsson's forever.

"As we said, there are four of these double cylinders, four working and four supply. Accordingly there are four furnaces, ingeniously arranged, and set without any extraordinary outlay of brick, such as had been reported. In these a small fire is kept up with anthracite coal, which is preferable to other fuel, because it does not blaze—only its radiating heat is employed. From the grate to the apex of the cylinder-bottom, which is arched of course, there is a distance of five feet. The cylinder-bottom is 1½ inches thick. Before the engine is put in motion it may get to a brown heat, but at that distance it cannot get hotter. As soon as the cold air is let in, it cools much below that point. Thus there is no danger either of fusion, cracking, or oxydizing of the cylinder-bottom, all of which have been predicted by the skeptical. A cylinder-bottom will last five years—as long as a steam boiler; or, if it gives out, can easily be replaced. The difference in the cost of replacing cylinder-bottoms and steam-boilers would, in a large ship, be from thirty to forty thousand dollars in favor of the former.

"The piston in the working cylinder is made six feet deep from top to bottom, concave underneath to fit the cylinder-botton, and flat at the top. The top as well as the sides are of iron, but the space between is filled with gypsum and charcoal, non-conductors of heat. Thus, while the bottom has the temperature of the hot air in the cylinder, the top is perfectly cool. The heat there is barely sufficient to keep the tallow used for lubrication in a fluid state, not to burn it. This enables the engineer at any time to grease just the part of it which he may desire; when the ship is careening, for instance, and the friction of the piston is all on one side, that side can be directly lubricated. This is a point of great practical importance, which cannot be attained in a steam engine. Nor is there any danger of burning the packing, for it is at the top of the piston and never comes within less than 6 feet of the fire. The cylinders act in pairs, and in each pair the action is reciprocating; that is to say, as the piston goes up in one, it goes down in the other. The pressure for which the Crloric engine is calculated is 12 lbs. per square inch, and to obtain this it is necessary to heat the air to 384°. By raising the air to 450°, a pressure of 15 lbs. could be obtained, but 12 is sufficient for practical purposes, and more convenient to manage.

New York Needle-Women.

We wound through a dark, filthy street, toward the East river, working our way among gangs of men and bold women, and stumbling over heaps of refuse, till we stopped before a low house. My companion—Mr. Pease, the missionary—knocked, and we entered a small, neat room, apparently a work room, where several women were just putting up some shirts. It seemed very small for so many, and very near the foul odors from the street; but we had no time to look about, as the young woman for whom Mr. Pease inquired came in, and asked us, in a pleasant voice, to step into the other room. She had seen much better days once, Mr. P. had told me; was the daughter of a colporteur; and he knew her for a simple, religious woman—a very handy needle woman, too, he said, the best of all whom he knew. The room where she worked was very small, not more than 12 by 6 feet, but remarkably neat, with one or two good chairs, and a bunch of artificial flowers on the mantle-piece, I remember, perhaps to remind her of what she never saw in these days.

As I took my seat near the window, the air which came in made me involuntarily turn away—it was so full of noisome smell from some drain or sewer behind the house. The light by which she had been working still burned on the table, a little camphene lamp, so faint that I could hardly have read a small type with it.

Mr. Pease, who knew her well, at once asked to see her work. She did the fine stitching alone of a shirt, the cutting and basting being done by the other girls in the front room. The work looked—at least to an uninitiated person—of the best order; the stitches were very hard to find, and the collars and the cording of the bosoms very fine and neat. It was full three-quarters of the work on a shirt. Mr. Pease said for this she was paid twelve cents a shirt; the other girls often received only eight cents. They worked, commonly, from seven o'clock till seven, and could stitch from three to four shirts a day—earning in the average $2 a week. Their board was never less than $1 50 per week, and their washing cost them, unless they did it themselves, 37½ or 50 cents. Then there were fuel and lights to buy, and though she did not say so, with it all the terrible chances of sickness and accident.

She herself worked from five in the morning till eleven at night, and could stitch six shirts a day, stopping only a very short time for her meals. Perhaps to the daughter of the religious man, the alternative which sickness and poverty might present was more terrible than to others, and she worked as if death was behind her. Her eyes had failed her, she said, during the last winter, from working so long by lamplight, and she feared she should get behind hand; but she was doing well now. How she bore it all was a wonder to me, though she looked much healthier than the seamstresses in the other room. Mr. Pease said afterwards that her constitution was breaking down, and that she spent hours in weeping. Her manner and appearance bore out all that he had said before hand. There was a natural refinement about her which made us involuntarily address her as we would any lady. She did not complain, except to say that she was certain she could get much safer and better work, if she knew where to find it. And so with all the sewing women; they do not dare to leave the shops which employ them, "for fear they shall lose everything!" Though she uttered no complaints, the weight of sadness in her expression of face spoke keenly.

"There is a very favorable specimen," said Mr. Pease, as we went out, "of a class numbering thousands and thousands in this city, many of them once in good circumstances. This woman is an uncommonly quick needle-woman, and can earn from $3 to $4 a week; still the slightest accident would put her back, and she has no friend but myself in the city. Many of them have not one human being who cares for them. They can earn eight cents for a shirt, or fifteen cents for a pair of pantaloons, and just keep above water. Let sickness come, and ——."

Capital.

In countries like England and America, the owner of capital really reaps the smallest portion of the advantages which flow from its possession; he is but a kind of book-keeper or head clerk to the business community. He may be as rich as Crœsus, but he can neither eat, drink, nor wear more than one man's portion. The houses and warehouses, the ships and railroads, which he builds or buys are for the accommodation of others—of the public. I remember hearing a jest made about Mr. Astor's property, which contained, I thought, a great deal of meaning—a latent, practical philosophy. Some one was asked whether he would be willing to take care of Mr. Astor's property—eight to ten millions of dollars, (and that we think a great property; with you, Sir, on the other side of the water, it would be a mere "flea-bite,") merely for his board and clothes? "No;" was the indignant answer; "do you think me a fool?" "Well," rejoins the other, "that is all that Mr. Astor himself gets for taking care of it; he's found, and that's all. The houses, the warehouses, the ships, and farms which he counts by the hundred, and is obliged to take care of, are for the accommodation of others." "But then he has the income, the rents of this mighty property, five or six hundred thousand dollars per annum." "Yes, but he can do nothing with this income but build more houses and warehouses and ships, or loan more on mortgage for the convenience of others. He's found, and you can make nothing else out of it."

The Leprosy.

The following painfully interesting description of the leprosy, as it still exists in an isolated quarter of Jerusalem, is from a correspondent of the National Intelligencer. This dreadful and loathsome disease, say, the Boston Traveler, still exists, in precisely the same from, and bearing all the peculiar characteristics of the leprosy as described by Moses, and as healed by the miracles of our Saviour. It exists not only in Jerusalem and Palestine generally, but by emigration and intermarriage of pilgrims to the Holy Land, it has been carried to Europe, and we are sorry to say is still spreading, and likely to become a disease of our own country. It is not, fortunately, a contagious disease. It is hereditary, and certain to be transmitted from generation to generation, without ever dying out, among those who are infected with it in the remotest degree. No remedy has hitherto been discovered, and nothing but absolute proscription and interdiction has ever been found effectual to stay its progress wherever it has been transplanted. It has been carried to the western coast on the North Sea, and is now said to prevail all along the coast of Norway, from the Naze to the North Cape. A letter from Rev. J. C. Richmond, dated at Bergen, in Norway, in Sept. last, and published in the Evangelical Catholic, an Episcopal newspaper, in New York, speaks of the Norwegian Leprosy, as it came under the writer's own observation. He says that, after having been confined to the coast for centuries, the disease has now begun to penetrate inland, and is sometimes found far in the interior. The Government has taken the matter in hand, and in addition to the system of exclusion in leprosy houses, has appropriated a large sum (37,000 dollars) for the erection of hospitals, where experiments are to be made in curing the disease—a Dr. Daiellsen having, as he thinks, discovered a cure.

Mr. Richmond calls attention to the important fact, that the emigration from Norway to this country is to a great extent from leprous districts; and that some individuals, actually known to be leprous, have already emigrated to the U. States. If it is introduced here, it is sure to become a prevalent disease in our Western States. Mr. Richmond recommends that the strictest surveillence be exercised over Norwegian immigrants, and that the most stringent measures be adopted to prevent the settlement among us of individuals found to be infected with the leprosy. He says, in concluding his letter, which is addressed to Bishop Wainwright, of New York:

"Could you have witnessed, as indeed you did in the East, the poor creatures, some afflicted with that type of the disease which covers the face, and even the eyelids with red tubercles, and, by the growth of the same within the throat, destroy the speech, or reduces it to a husky and hoarse effort, while the poor leper in a few days descends to the tomb; or could you behold the limbs by degrees dropping from the body, and while they remained so destitute of feeling, that the poor sufferers frequently burn themselves with deep scars before they are even aware of the heat, you would not wonder that I should wish to arouse such attention, before it be too late, as may secure our posterity against this loathsome infliction."

The Lepers in Jerusalem.

In my rambles about Jerusalem I passed, on several occasions, through the quarter of the Lepers. Apart from the interest attached to this unfortunate class of human beings, (arising from the frequent allusion made to them in the Scriptures,) there is much in the appearance and mode of life to attract attention and enlist the sympathy of the stranger. Dirt and disease go revoltingly together here; gaunt famine stalks through the streets; a constant moan of suffering swells upon the dead air, and sin broods darkly over the ruin it has wrought in that gloomy and ill-fated spot. Wasted forms sit in the doorways; faces covered with white scales and sightless eyes are turned upwards; skeleton arms, distorted and fœted with the ravages of leprosy, are outstretched from the foul moving mass; and a low howl is heard, the howl of the stricken for alms; alms, ho, stranger, for the love of God! alms to feed the inexorable destroyer! alms to prolong this dreary and hopeless misery!

Look upon it, stranger, you who walk forth in all your pride and strength and breathe the fresh air of heaven; you who have never known what it is to be shunned by your fellow-men as a thing unclean and accursed; you who deem yourself unblest with all the blessings that God has given you upon earth; look upon it and learn that there is a misery upon all that you have conceived in your gloomiest hours —a misery that can still be endured; learn that even the Leper, with death knawing at his vitals and unceasing tortures in his blood, cast out from the society of his fellow-man, forbidden to touch in friendship or affection the hand of the untainted, still struggles for life, and deems each hour precious that keeps him from the grave.

The quarter of the Lepers is a sad and impressive place. By the laws of the land, which have existed from scriptural times, they are isolated from all actual contact with their fellow-men; yet there seems to be no prohibition to their going out beyond the walls of Jerusalem, and begging by the road-side. Near the gate of Zion, on the way to Bethlehem, I saw many of them sitting on the rocks, their hideous faces uncovered, thrusting forth scaly hands for alms. Their huts are rudely constructed of earth and stones, seldom with more than one apartment, and this so filthy and loathsome that it seemed unfit to be occupied by swine. Here they live and propagate, whole families together, without distinction of sex; and their dreadful malady is perpetuated from generation to generation, and the groans of the aged and the dying are mingled with the feeble wail of the young that are brought forth branded for a life of misery.

Strange and mournful thoughts arise, in the contemplation of the sad condition and probable destiny of these ill-fated beings. Among so many, there must be some in whose breasts the power of true love is implanted; love for woman in its purest sense, for offspring, for all the endearments of domestic life which the untainted are capable of feeling; yet doomed never to exercise the affections without perpetuating the curse; some, too, in whom there are hidden powers of mind, unknown, save to themselves; ambition, that corrodes with unavailing aspirations; a thirst for action that burns within unceasingly, yet never can be assuaged; all the ruling passions that are im planted in man for great and noble purposes, never, never to give one moment's pleasure umixed with the perpetual gloom of that curse which dwells in their blood.

As I plodded my way for the last time through this den of sickening sights, a vision of human misery was impressed upon my mind that time cannot efface. I passed when the rays of the sun were cold, and the light was dimmed; and there came out from the reeking hovels leprous men, gaunt with famine, and they bared their hideous bodies, and howled like beasts; and women held out their loathsome babes, and tore away the rags that covered them, and pointing to the shapeless mass, shrieked for alms. All was disease and sin and sorrow wherever I went; and as I passed on unable to relieve a thousandth part of the misery, moans of despair and howling curses followed me, and Lepers crawled back into their hovels to rot in their filth and die when God willed.

The Jews.

A writer in the Congregational Journal says:—

"The Jews exist not only as a monument and a miracle; Jewish mind has exerted a powerful influence on the world. Favored by Napoleon, the Hebrew race at once developed powers which had never been suspected. Soult, Ney, and Massena, who thus altered his name from Manasseh, to escape the odium of being an Israelite, were all marshals of France under the eye of the greatest warrior of his age. In politics the Jews have Matternich in Austria, D'Israeli in England, a convert to the Christian faith, while the autocrat of Russia has had a Jew for his chief confidential counsellor, and Spain a prime minister of the same race, and Prussia her minister of finance. In the United States Jews begin to figure in our national councils, Mr. Yulee, late member of the House, and Mr. Soule, Senator from Louisiana, being of the Hebrew stock. Mr. Cremieux, one of the most eminent lawyers of France, was what we should call Attorney General upon the flight of Louis Philippe.

In money power the Jews hold in their hands the destiny of kindoms and empires, whose governments become and their sovereigns turn beggars at a Hebrew's nod. Half a dozen Jews can do more to preserve the peace of Europe by sitting behind their desks, and persistently saying No! to the royal applicants for money, than all the Peace Congresses and Conventions in christendom. The Rothschilds, the Barings, and Sir John Montefiere, are all Jews, and with their banking establishments scattered over Europe and Asia, wield a sceptre more powerful than monarchs hold.

Coming to the literary professions, and inquiring into the lineage of many of the most distinguished scholars and men of science, we find the Jews prominent here as well as in active life. The most renowned in astronomy have been Jews, as the Herschells in England, and Arago in France, the as astronomer royal under Louis Philippe, and who has filled the world with his fame. Those German works which are deluging the world, are for the most part the productions of christianized Jews, as those of John Hengstenberg, Tholuck, Schleirmacher, Krummacher, Gesenius, Neander, Niebur, and others, whose learned treatises on antiquities, biblical crititism, didactic theology, and general sacred literature are found in the library of every theological seminary and in the hands of every theological student. Spinoza, the famous infidel, who did so much to corrupt Europe in a past age, was a Jew, and so are Ronge and Czerski, who took the lead of a new religious reformation in Germany in our day, which has already fallen through.

Dr. Alexander's First Sermon.

Not many years since, it was my privilege to spend a few days under the hospitable roof of the venerable Dr. Alexander, at Princeton, New Jersey. He was, at the time, in good health and excellent spirits, and was disposed to live over again, in memory, at least, the scenes of his younger days. His conversation, in regard to the history of Presbyterianism in Virginia, and his own missionary labors, was remarkably entertaining and instructive. Among other topics, he touched upon his juvenile appearance at the time of his entering the ministry. "I suppose," said he, as his small, clear, dark eye lighted up, and a smile played upon his expressive countenance, "I suppose that I preached my trial sermon for licensure from a text that nobody else ever preached a trial sermon from." "What was the text, sir?" I inquired.

"Being very young at the time," said he, "and having a fair, ruddy complexion, I looked almost like a boy. So youthful was my appearance, indeed, that I did not think I could command the respect which was due to ministers, and I told the Presbytery so, expressing the opinion that my licensure had better be deferred; upon which, the Rev. Mr. Houston, (I think it was Mr. Houston,) arose, and tried to do away with my objections, and after some very pertinent remarks, proposed that the Presbytery proceed to assign parts of trial, and proposed as the text, the passage, 'Say not I am a child.'" The text was particularly appropriate to the circumstances, and especially in its connection with the preceding verse, "Ah, Lord God, behold I cannot speak, for I am a child." The Presbytery determined according to Mr. Houston's proposition, and from this singular text was preached the first of that long catalogue of sermons, which were so acceptable, and so greatly honored of God; and in the faithful services of his long and useful life, was remarkably fulfilled the whole passage, "Say not I am a child; for thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee; and whatsoever I command thee, thou shalt speak." The youthful appearance, which was a bug-bear in the way of the timid, modest candidate, proved one of the charms of the young preacher. His almost boyish look, and his flute-like voice, were among the elements which rendered his faithful, evangelical preaching so attractive, and so long remembered by those who heard him in his earlier days. Like David, to human judgment, he might have seemed too young and immature for the great work he essayed to do; but, like David, he proved to be a man after God's own heart. This little incident in the history of the honored and lamented patriarch, shows, 1st. The modesty which was always so characteristic of Dr. Alexander; and, 2d. The fact that God can turn what may seem to be defects into increased power for usefulness. [Presbyterian.

Poisonous Tea.

It is a singular fact that a Chinese never drinks cold water, thinks it destructive to health, and hates it. Uncolored tea is his beverage from morning till night—the essence of the herb drawn out in pure water, and swallowed without milk and sugar. If he travels, he stops in his chair to take his cup, not "his glass." If he pays a visit, he is offered tea; if he receives a visitor he proffers it. Before dinner he takes his tea as the French take oysters—as a zest. After dinner he sips his tea as a Scotchman takes his whiskey—as a digester. This is done not only without injuring their stomachs, but with positive advantage to their bodily health and general comfort. Yet, Englishmen will swallow tea, go to bed, turn and toss, keep awake, get up, complain of unstrung nerves, and weak digestion, and visit the doctor, who shakes his head, and solemnly says, "Tea!" This is what he says; but what he means, if he has given attention to the subject, is "Metallic paint." "Foreigners," say the Chinese, "like to have their tea uniform and pretty," so they poison the leaves for the advantage of the English and American merchants. The Chinese would not think of drinking dyed tea such as we daily imbibe; but the more gypsum and blue he can communicate to the plant, the higher becomes its value in the eyes of the English merchant, and the dyeing process, accordingly, goes on in China to an extent which is actually alarming. In every hundred pounds of colored green tea consumed in England, more than half a pound of coloring powder, made from blue and gypsum, is contained. The fact is not now made known to the British public for the first time; we therefore hope that this lucrative dyeing trade will decrease in the Celestial Empire. The Chinese may easily regard us with pity and surprise, as the coats of our stomachs may well rebel against the intrusion of so much mineral trash. Our venenerable ancestors, the ancient Britons, painted themselves, and lived upon acrons, and we, who live luxuriously, smile at their lamentable ignorance. In one respect, however, the Britons had the advantage of us: they painted their stomach blue, and used the color only on the outside—not in.

Singular Deformity and Surgical Operation.

A young woman from Maysville, came to this city some days since, (says the Cincinnati Commercial) for professional relief from a very remarkable deformity, with which she was born, and which has since rapidly increased in size. From one hand projected an enormous growth, apparently heterogeneous in its character, about the size of an adult foot, shaped somewhat like, but larger than a Florence flask, with a part of the neck broken off, on the end of which was a nail about twice as large as that of the great toe. This mass occupied the position, and seemed to substitute the middle and ring fingers, crowding the little and fore fingers and thumb from their natural positions, and altogether disabling them; extending in the palm of the hand up to and on the back of the hand nearly up to the wrist. From the other hand extended two similar tumors, reaching to the wrist, of five or six pounds weight, the little finger and thumb only being present, but useless in consequence of the encroachment of the growths. They constitute cumbrous masses, rendering the limbs entirely useless, repulsive to look upon, and a source of suffering and unhappiness to the person afflicted.

Upon consulting Dr. Baxley, Professor of Surgery in the Medical College of Ohio, he advised their removal; and on Saturday last, at the Commercial Hospital, we saw that gentleman, in the presence of a large number of physicians and students, operate upon one of the limbs, in such a manner as to remove completely the deformity, and yet preserve the existing two fingers and the thumb for future use. The patient was made insensible by chloroform before being carried into the operating theater, and having been returned to the ward before the effect passed off, was ignorant of the performance of the operation, or of her having been out of her room.

In consequence of constitutional feebleness, it was deemed prudent by Prof. Baxley not to perpetuate the effect of chloroform too long; hence the operation upon the other hand has been deferred until a future day, when, we have no doubt, it will be equally as successfully performed.

Thirst in the Arctic Regions.

The use of snow when persons are thirsty does not by any means allay the insatiable desire for water; on the contrary, it appears to be increased in proportion to the quantity used, and the frequency with which it is put into the mouth. For example, a person walking along feels intensely thirsty, and he looks to his feet with coveting eyes; but his good sense and firm resolution are not to be overcome so easily, and he withdraws the open hand that was to grasp the delicious morsel and convey it to his parching mouth. He has several miles of a journey to accomplish, and his thirst is every moment increasing, he is perspiring profusely, and feels quite hot and oppressed. At length his good resolutions stagger, and he partakes of the smallest particle, which produces a most exhilarating effect; in less than ten minutes he tastes again and again, always increasing the quantity; in half an hour he has a gum-stick of condensed snow which he masticates with avidity, and replaces with assiduity the moment that it has melted away. But his thirst is not allayed in the slightest degree; he is as hot as ever and still perspires; his mouth is in flames, and he is driven to the necessity of quenching them with snow, which adds fuel to the fire. The melting snow ceases to please the palate, and it feels like red hot coals, which, like a fire-eater, he shifts about with his tongue, and swallows without the addition of saliva. He is in despair; but habit has taken the place of his reasoning faculties; and he moves on with languid steps, lamenting the severe fate which in an unguarded moment he allowed to begin. * * * I believe that the true cause of such intense thirst is the extreme dryness of the air when the temperature is low.

Perhaps it is not generally known, as it should be, that salt put in the mouth will instantly relieve the convulsive movements in fits, either of children or animals.

INDUSTRIAL PLANTATION NEAR JERUSALEM.

Among the means for promoting the independence of the Jewish people, and thereby advancing the best interests of Jerusalem, one of the most likely to be efficient appears to be the establishment of industrial institutions. The Jews are an industrious and enterprising people, willing to relieve themselves, whenever the opportunity is afforded, from the state of pauperism in which, unfortunately, the greater number of those in Jerusalem exist and starve. The tailors, bakers, blacksmiths, shoemakers, watchmakers, glaziers, &c., are almost without exception Israelites; but the amount of employment afforded is inadequate to the wants of so many thousands. The Hebrew population of Jerusalem is variously estimated at from seven to ten thousand, and with the exception of a very few families, all are extremely poor. The fund contributed by pious brethren in every part of the world, is administered by the Rabbis, and when the various other claims upon it are satisfied, but a very small proportion is left for the poor and needy. The Ashkenay or German and Polish community is generally considered the wealthiest, and yet a common allowance to a poor man from its fund is 10 paras, or about 2½ farthings per diem, and even this starving pittance is liable to be withdrawn, if the Rabbis should take offense at any thing their pensioners may do. Surely, this is slavery and bondage of the worst description—bondage for the merest necessaries of life, in the holy city of their former Kings and Princes, where gold was like stones, and silver was nothing accounted of.

There are at present two industrial establishments in Jerusalem—one, the house of industry for men, has been opened by the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, for persons inquiring into or believing the truth of Christianity, and the number of those admissible bears but a small proportion as yet to those willing to earn their daily bread by the labor of their hands. The second, established by Miss Cooper, independently of any society, is for Jewish women and children, and is open to all who are willing to come. This institution has answered so well, that an assistant has been found necessary, and another English lady has joined Miss Cooper, in the beginning of this year, (1852.) The number rose to forty-five and forty-six, and it was impossible for one pair of hands to prepare the work fast enough for them, and many were refused admittance on this very account.

There is now an immense class wholly unprovided for, viz., such men as would work by the day, and at night return to their families, whether calling themselves inquirers into Christianity or not, who would be grateful for an honest and independent means of livelihood.

Agriculture is a branch of useful employment, and of great advantage, besides the happiness of clothing once more the barren hills, and cultivating again the waste places around Jerusalem.

Some have supposed that Hebrew people are unfitted at present for field or garden work, or at least unwilling to labor at it. Such as think thus cannot have witnessed Hebrew laborers, aye, and Hebrew Rabbis at work in Meshullum's farm, at Artass, (Artass or Solomon's gardens, near Bethlehem,) and the English Consul's plantation, near Jerusalem, and cannot be aware of the fact, that not a week passes without fresh applications for employment being made by poor Jews, or of the melancholy proofs that Israelites literally die for want of food in Jerusalem.

Others may suppose that the neighborhood of Jerusalem is insecure, and that people would be afraid to work. These, again, cannot have seen the summer employments of the European residents there, where, without guards, single families, including ladies and children, spend the hot season without the slightest annoyance by night or day.

Others there are, who believe Palestine to be an accursed land, incapable of producing any crops but stones and salt, and sulphur. Let them come and see two crops a year, produced by the poorest land we have. Let them behold quince trees groaning under the burden of 400 quinces, each larger than the largest apples of England—vines, with a hundred bunches of grapes, each bunch three feet long, and each grape 3 1-4 inches in circumference—a citron tree, bearing 510 lbs. weight of fruit—half grown broad beans from Meshullum's farm, the pod 13 inches long, and six clustering stems from each plant—Indian corn 11 feet high, on ground from which a similar crop had been taken four weeks before—water melons, 20, 30, 40 lbs. in weight.

The apathy, and unbelief, and indolence, and destructiveness of man—these are the curses on Palestine, but the land is being healed before our eyes.

Few persons are aware that the cultivation of land around Jerusalem has received much attention within the last three years, from an Archimandrite of the Greek Convent. The large plantations around the Convent of St. George, opposite the Jaffa Gate of Jerusalem; at Mt. Elias, half way towards Bethlehem; at the Convent of the Cross, &c., are the work of the Greeks, who have moreover purchased immense tracts in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, and elsewhere, which have not yet been planted. The value of land is very much enhanced in consequence. During the month of February, 1852, the Greeks planted 23,000 young mulberry trees, close to the Jaffa Gate of Jerusalem; those formerly planted answered well. Olives were planted at intervals, and small crops, with vines between. They have blown away the surface rocks with gunpowder, and exposed the rich clay beneath; the loose stones are gathered into terrace walls. The ancient rock-hewn cisterns, existing in every field, are repaired, and supply the trees with water during the first year, after which the rains are sufficient for them. The supply of rain has steadily increased during the last seven years. In 1848, the lower Kedron flowed, on account of the well of Eurogel rising to a height not known for eight or nine years before. Every year since, Eurogel has overflowed, and a fine stream poured down the Kedron bed, in the months of January to March. This year we have had the delightful latter rain, at the end of April and beginning of May—a thing unknown for years before. The new plantations have already yielded a considerable quantity of silk, which will increase every year.

The olive tree is at present one of the most valuable products of this country, but would be infinitely more so, did the inhabitants understand the art of crushing the berries and refining the oil. An Italian gentleman has declared that a handsome fortune might be derived from the residue, considered by the Arabs as worthless, when they have pressed the berries under their primitive and clumsy crushing mills. Two years ago the olive oil of this country had never been imported into England, and in the beginning of last year twenty ships of 100 tons each were loaded with this article alone, and merchants are endeavoring this year to open a trade in oil with Jerusalem, which would ensure handsome profits. Olive trees of 10 or 12 years old bear transplanting well, and begin to yield in three years. There is a piece of land near Jerusalem already secured, (though the purchase money is not all paid,) on which it is intended to establish industrial plantations for any Jews willing to work thereon. English residents, competent to judge, approve of the situation, and consider that there is every reason to expect success. A few hundred pounds are required for repairing the ancient cisterns, planting the trees, &c., &c., and for the first two or three years some funds will be necessary for paying laborers, &c. It is calculated that for about $300 the planting and clearing may be accomplished. The extent of the plot is about seven or eight acres. An oil and soap manufactory should be added. (The Kali plant is a product of the country.) As soon as the first arrangements are completed, the writer will put the whole into the hands of trustees, who shall carry out the object.

[The above article—which first appeared in an English Episcopal paper—is accompanied by a request that money for the benevolent purpose of relief proposed, should be sent to Mr. M. P. Bergheim, care of the British Consul. We have not yet learned that any of the funds remitted to the British Consul for Mr. Meshullum have been paid over to him; and, by the last accounts, positive information is furnished, that he had not yet received one dollar from that source. We hope, therefore, the real friends of Meshullum will send what little they may wish, to those who will not withhold it for sinister purposes, or to glorify the English Bishopric of Jerusalem. We fear that the large amount of money already sent from England and the United States to the British Consul is retained for the purpose of inducing Mr. M. to return to the domination of the Bishop, and surrender his independence, and the patronage of his enterprise, to the English Church. No greater calamity could befall the scheme of Mr. M. than to give up to the ambitious projects of the Bishop, whose treasury is already well supplied by the British Government, though but little is done with the enormous sums disbursed, except to aggrandize the few who yield implicitly to Royal dictation. We trust our brethren will soon be prepared to know for themselves all that can be gathered by their own missionaries from the land of promise in Palestine.] S.

INCONSISTENCY OF UNBELIEVERS.

The North British Review, in an article on a late work of Mr. Francis Newman, thus exposes the inconsistency of infidel interpreters of the sacred volume:—

"It is curious to see those who pride themselves on their free and loose views of Scripture history, adhering, when they come to details which suit their purpose, to as close and servilely literal an interpretation of individual texts as the most devoted advocate for the verbal inspiration of Scripture could desire. This is remarkably exemplified by Dr. Newman. While he throws aside large portions of the Old Testament as legendary, he clings with unreasoning fidelity not only to the verbal, but even to the traditionary meaning of such particular passages as imply moral wrong in the persons concerned. For instance, in an allusion to the story of Jepthah, he appears to take for granted the truth of the vulgar notion, that Jepthah slew his daughter for an offering to the Lord; overlooking the fact, that not only is there no express mention of her death in the narrative, but several of the most intelligent commentators consider the contrary to be implied in what the narrative does record. Hence we may see that it is not from a free interpretation of individual texts, nor from the employment of learning and knowledge of antiquity in the study of Scripture, that Christianity has any thing to fear. The real danger to our belief in revelation, lies in the resolution to believe nothing which does not agree with our previously formed fancies, and in the presumptous attempt to decide on what God is likely to have done, or not done, and to judge Him as if he were 'even such an one as ourselves.' This tendency, far from being produced by extensive learning, may be found equally in the minds of all men, whatever be the extent or deficiency of their knowledge, in whom humility and candor are wanting. Mr. Newman's interpretations of Scripture, indeed, do not bear the character of learned ones, but the contrary, to a degree which could not have been expected in an author of his attainments, and in a work, the subject of which would seem peculiarly and imperatively to require the application of learning."

THE CHRISTIAN IN AFFLICTION.

My rest is in heaven, my home is not here,
Then why should I murmur when trials appear?
Be hushed, my sad spirit, the worst that can come,
But shortens thy journey and hastens thee home.

A pilgrim and stranger, I seek not my bliss,
Nor lay up my treasures, in regions like this;
I look for a mansion which hands have not piled,
I long for a city by sin undefiled.

Tho' foes and afflictions my progress oppose,
They only make heaven more sweet at the close;
Come joy or come sorrow, whate'er may befall,
One moment in glory makes up for them all!

The thorn and the thistle around me may grow,
I would not repose me on roses below;
I ask not a portion, I seek not my rest,
Till seated with Jesus, I lean on his breast.

A scrip for my journey, a staff in my hand,
A pilgrim impatient, I press to that land;
The path may be rugged, it cannot be long;
With hope I beguile it, and cheer it with song.

THE LOCAL CHURCH:

Its Material Equipment.

As man in this world, inhabiting the body, has material wants, and must have material means and instruments for working; so the Church in this world, made up of souls not yet disembodied, and acting in the midst of material elements and forces, must be provided and equipped accordingly. The church, then, aware of its own dignity and importance as a local institution, and intent on its proper local work, will endeavor to provide for itself, as part of its permanent apparatus, all the material conveniences and instrumentalities which such a work, continued from year to year, and from age to age, may be found to require.

For example, a church in the weakness and poverty of its beginning, may be content to worship God in some hired apartment, inconvenient, cheerless, uncomfortable, and continually desecrated by uses that awaken in those who enter it for worship the most undesirable associations of thought and feeling. It may be constrained to occupy a moving tent, or to seek refuge from wintry storms in a barn. It may be compelled by persecution to hide itself in lonely retreats among the pathless mountains, or in old quarries and subterranean excavations. Or, having been led forth into the wilderness, it may assemble itself under some spreading tree, where the woods and waters, as the wind moves over them, mingle their murmurs with the voice of prayer and song. But as the church outlives the weakness of its beginning, or the perils of its age of persecution, it soon acquires a local habitation of its own. A society of Christian men, controlled by Christian principles and habits, if it can live in safety where ordinary industry receives its ordinary rewards, will become, in a few years, sufficiently increased in this world's goods to come out of its hired house, and to build for itself its own more convenient house of worship. At first, that house of worship may be a lowly, and to the scornful or critical eye an unsightly structure; but, in the progress of time, when that decays, it is replaced by another more comely, more convenient, more attractive, and better suited to the wants of a more numerous assembly.

So of other conveniences. Not only the assembly for public worship on the Lord's day, when the general suspension of labor brings multitudes to the house of prayer, but other and lesser meetings for devotion, or for the occasional business of the church, must be provided for. And then there are meetings of another description, which the church, in the prosecution of its proper work, cannot dispense with—meetings, for example, where the women of the church, like Dorcas of old, "full of good works and alms-deeds," meet to provide "coats and garments" for the poor, or to combine the contributions of their industry in other modes for the advancement of Christ's work and kingdom. Meetings must be held for the instruction of the children and youth, not only in Sabbath-schools and catechetical and Bible-classes, but in every mode which may be suited to win their attention and to impress their minds. There must be meetings of brethren, stated or occasional, for prayer or consultation, in their various associations for mutual improvement or for united beneficence; meetings of committees charged with the business of the church and of its affiliated societies; meetings of church officers, apart, for the better performance of their official work. At the first, and for a long course of years perhaps, all such meetings may be held in private houses, or, when that has become less convenient, in hired apartments. But after a time, in the progress of the church and the expansion of its usefulness, it naturally provides for itself apartments of its own, suited to all these various wants. For the week-day lecture; for the congregational Sabbath-school; for Bible exposition; for the conference in which awakened and inquiring minds meet with their pastor to receive the familiar instruction and personal guidance suited to their case; for friendly and social meetings, devotional or charitable; all suitable conveniences are provided, and made fixtures in the apparatus of the church's usefulness. Fifty years ago such things were no where thought of—or, at least, no where among Congregationalists in this country—as belonging to the equipment and furnishing of a local church. Less than forty years ago, for example, when the Congregational churches in New Haven erected those beautiful houses of worship on the Public Square, it did not occur to them that they might want a convenient place for a parochial Sabbath-school; and they seem hardly to have suspected that a place for prayer-meeting, or for a weekly evening lecture, would be necessary to the growth and usefulness of a church. But now, in all our larger towns at least, no church edifice is erected (unless by some half-formed and feeble congregation) which does not include, as a matter of course, apartments for such uses. A pioneer family in the wilderness builds itself a log-cabin with only one room for all domestic uses; and in that one room, with proper industry and a wise domestic discipline, the family may live, by God's blessing, comfortably, virtuously and happily. But as the wilderness and the habits of the wilderness disappear, and the family that lived in a forest finds itself surrounded by an expanse of cultivated landscape dotted over with the homes of a rich and prosperous community, the log cabin which sufficed for the wants of that pioneer family in its struggles, is altogether inadequate to the reasonable wants of the same family in its altered condition. Such a family, instead of building its new house after the type of the log cabin, with only one room in it, builds according to its present wants, with various apartments and accommodations for labor and rest, for fireside enjoyment, and for hospitality and the gathering of friends. Is there any reason why the church for whose use, when it inhabited the wilderness, a rude church edifice, including only one apartment, was sufficient, should always rebuild after the old type, with only one room in the meeting house?

Other accommodations will ultimately be demanded. As the local work of the church grows upon its hands, and the sphere of its local influence and usefulness expands, it finds the need of a material apparatus still more extended. The sons and daughters of the church go forth into the wretched streets and lanes haunted by poverty and ignorance, to gather the children into Sunday-schools and to rescue them from the life of degradation to which they seem destined but for such interposition; the church, in the sense of its own importance and responsibilities as a local institution, will see that no such effort, thus proceeding from itself, is permitted to fail, or to be embarrassed for want of any material accommodation. And if the Sunday-school begins to enlarge itself into a preaching station, and a chapel is called for in a district where a church cannot at present be established, why should not the church in its aggressive action on the domains of sin and sorrow, provide that chapel, and keep it open, and sustain the preaching of the Gospel there, till a new church can be instituted that shall be able to sustain itself?

Nor have we yet completed the inventory of what the church should have of material means and instrumentalities for its work as a local institution. Libraries of juvenile religious books for the Sabbath-schools—a parochial library of miscellaneous religious reading, doctrinal, devotional, and historical, for the use of all the members of the congregation, binding them to each other and to the church by an additional tie—and still more, a pastor's library of theological and biblical learning, accumulating from age to age by continued purchases and contributions, and stimulating and aiding the studies of successive pastors through successive centuries, are found to be important implements for increasing the local power and usefulness of the church; and they too are provided in due time, and with them all accommodations needful for their preservation and their greatest utility.

We must not forget the parsonage. If the church must have a pastor, and if the pastor must have a home, and especially if the pastor's home ought always to be if possible near to the place of worship, and convenient of access for the whole congregation—why should not a house for the pastor to live in, and such a house as the people are not ashamed to have their pastor inhabit, be always, if possible, a part of the church property? In these times, moreover, when hardly any pastor can safely regard himself as settled for life, and when, for one reason and another, the ministry in our churches is becoming, so far as permanency of settlement is concerned, so much like the itinerating ministry among the Methodists, the personage house is almost indispensable, in country parishes, to a church that would settle a pastor or that would keep him after he is settled. No small part of the present distress about the inadquate support of the ministry in our churches is owing to the want of parsonages for ministers to live in.

THE PROFFERED GIFT.

When that man of God, Summerfield, was charming the churches by his unrivaled eloquence, a gentleman in Baltimore, who was not a professor of religion, presented him a fine coat. His acknowledgment of the present beautifully exemplifies his character, and the love of his heart to all whom he could address:—

Your very agreeable present, and the manner in which it was bestowed, will never be forgotten. But what shall I render to you for this benefit? I have, I confess, scarcely any thing within my gift. If I could transmit to you the garment of salvation, I should indeed be able to recompense you fully; though not half so fully as if you receive it from the Author of salvation. This is a gift which is enhanced by the dignity of the Giver, and he has therefore reserved to himself to bestow it.

This gift, however, will not be yours in the same way in which your gift became mine, for he requires that you shall ask in order to receive it, and has promised his Holy Spirit to those that ask him. My coat indeed becomes me well; it fits me better than any coat I ever had, and its texture is superexcellent; but, my dear friend, the garment I would recommend to you would become you still more, and would adorn you better than any garment you ever wore. As to its texture it is emphatically said to be "fine," not comparatively so, but positively fine; this material alone is "fine, clean, and white." I could have dispensed with your present, inasmuch as my former dress would have fully answered all the purposes for which this was intended; but my dear friend cannot dispense with the garment I am recommending him, for the man who has it will not be turned out from the marriage supper, and cast into outer darkness.

Suffer me to speak freely, sincerely, lovingly, on this subject. What is the cause? Why, amid all the kindness that you ever show and delight to show to the meanest servants of my Lord—why, O why is it that you have not so fallen in love with the "Altogether Lovely," as to give him full possession of your heart? You give him your money, you give him your tongue to speak of his goodness, your feet employed in tracking the way to his sanctuary, and you delight to be seated among the flock of Christ. But then your heart. "My son, my son," says God, "give me thine heart!" Seek the kingdom of God first, rather, and then bring every other consideration into a state of inferiority. Let me ask you, my dear brother—for such I call you in anticipation of my very soul—is he not worthy of your heart? The language of angels is, "Thou alone art worthy." He has purchased you at the price of blood, and he claims you as his own. Will you continue to resist the claim? Has he not long been striving with you to yield yourself a willing sacrifice? Though he could use force, he prefers submission; he would honor you by proposing himself to your choice. He is an honorable lover. He woos, he supplicates, he stoops to ask your love; can you keep him out any longer? O, no; your heart says, No! Then answer him this moment,

"Come in, come in, thou heavenly guest,
And never hence remove;
But sup with me, and let the feast
Be everlasting love."

MORMON MARRIAGE.

The Mormon paper, The Seer, gives the following account of the formalities observed when a Saint espouses supplementary wives, after he already has one of those companions:—

In this Church of Latter Day Saints every man is strictly limited to one wife, unless the Lord, through the President and Prophet of the Church, gives a revelation permitting him to take more. Without such a revelation it would be sinful, according to the Book of Mormon, which this Church are required to obey. Hence the Book of Mormon is somewhat more strict than the Bible; for there is nothing in the Bible that limits mankind to one wife, but the Book of Mormon does absolutely forbid a man to have more than one wife, unless God shall command otherwise.

No man in Utah, who already has a wife, and who may desire to obtain another, has any right to make any propositions of marriage to a lady until he has consulted the President over the whole Church, and through him obtains a revelation from God, as to whether it would be pleasing in His sight. If he is forbidden by revelation, that ends the matter; if, by revelation, the privilege is granted, he still has no right to consult the feelings of the young lady until he has obtained the appprobation of her parents, provided they are living in Utah; if their consent cannot be obtained, this also ends the matter. But if the parents or guardians freely give their consent, then he may make propositions of marriage to the young lady; if she refuse these propositions, this also ends the matter; but if she accept, a day is generally set apart by the parties for the marriage ceremony to be celebrated. It is necessary to state that, before any man takes the least step toward getting another wife, it is his duty to consult the feelings of the wife which he already has, and obtain her consent, as recorded in the twenty-fourth paragraph of the revelation, published in the first number of The Seer.

When the day set apart for the solemnization of the marriage ceremony has arrived, the bridegroom and his wife, and also the bride, together with their relatives, and such other guests as may be invited, assemble at the place which they have appointed. The Scribe then proceeds to take the names, ages, native towns, counties, States and countries of the parties to be married, which he carefully enters on record. The President, who is the Prophet, Seer and Revelator over the whole Church throughout the world, and who alone holds the keys of authority in this solemn ordinance, (as recorded in the second and fifth paragraphs of the Revelation on Marriage,) calls upon the bridegroom and his wife, and the bride, to arise, which they do, fronting the President. The wife stands on the left hand of her husband, while the bride stands on her left. The President then puts this question to the wife: "Are you willing to give this woman to your husband to be his lawful and wedded wife for time and for all eternity? If you are, you will manifest it by placing her right hand within the right hand of your husband." The right hands of the bridegroom and bride, being thus joined, the wife takes her husband by the left arm, as if in the attitude of walking. The President then proceeds to ask the following question of the man: "Do you, brother, (calling him by name,) take sister, (calling the bride by her name,) by the right hand, to receive her unto yourself, to be your lawful and wedded wife, and you to be her lawful and wedded husband, for time and for all eternity, with a covenant and promise, on your part, that you will fulfill all the laws, rites and ordinances pertaining to this holy matrimony, in the new and everlasting covenant, doing this in the presence of God, angels, and these witnesses, of your own free will and choice?" The bridegroom answers, Yes. The President then puts the question to the bride: "Do you, sister, (calling her by name,) take brother, (calling him by name,) by the right hand, and give yourself to him, to be his lawful and wedded wife for time and for all eternity, with a covenant and promise, on your part, that you will fulfill all the laws, rites and ordinances pertaining to this holy matrimony, in the new and everlasting covenant, doing this in the presence of God, angels and these witnesses, of your own free will and choice?" The bride answers, Yes. The President then says, "In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the authority of the Holy Priesthood, I pronounce you legally and lawfully husband and wife for time and for all eternity; and I seal upon you the blessings of the holy resurrection, with power to come forth in the morning of the first resurrection, clothed with glory, immortality and eternal lives; and I seal upon you the blessings of thrones, and dominions, and principalities, and powers, and exaltations, together with the blessings of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and say unto you, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, that you may have joy and rejoicing in your posterity in the day of the Lord Jesus. All these blessings, together with all other blessings, pertaining to the new and everlasting covenant, I seal upon your heads, through your faithfulness unto the end, by the authority of the Holy Priesthood, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen." The Scribe then enters on the general record the date and place of the marriage, together with the names of two or three witnesses who were present.

THE TALE BEARER'S CONFESSION.

I remember, in a congregation where I once labored, one of my hearers told me a story of another, but begged I would say nothing about it. This, by the way, is a vile way. I gave full credit to the report; this, by the way, was wrong. I felt very much hurt on the occasion, and expressed myself with some degree of asperity. This was soon carried to the offender, and lost nothing of the asperity in its passage. Reports which tend to mischief are like snowballs, the further they roll the more they gather. The offender was in his turn offended; he spoke also with asperity; said "he would not be so treated, he would be no man's slave, he was not accountable to any one, he would go no more to the meeting," &c., &c. Soon, very soon, was all he said communicated to me. I was assuredly right, and would let him see I would not be his slave; nay, I would not be his servant; I would call no man master on earth; I had but one Master. This gentleman was one of the first characters in the meeting. He was not at meeting the next Sunday; I was not sorry; I secretly hoped he never would be there again.

The storm began to thicken, the parties began to form; some affirmed that he was very censurable; others thought I was as much so; I should have gone to him, in the first instance, and talked to him, not of him. I soon found I was wrong, but the difficulty was now to get right. Observe, not to know what was right, but to bring myself to do what was. You must know, when I first set out in my present mode of life, my gracious Maker provided me with a tutor who was to accompany me as a mentor. I could not see him, but I could very sensibly feel his reproofs and understand his admonitions. He advised me to retire with him awhile. I felt my face glow at the motion, I knew what it was for; I dreaded the severe account I was going to be brought to; but there was no avoiding it; with trembling dread I retired. "Come," said my mentor, "sit down."

I replied, "He certainly was wrong"—"Stop," said my mentor, "it is you I have now to deal with; you have done wrong; you, who by precept and example ought to lead in the way of peace."

"But I ought to exhort, and reprove, and rebuke."

"Stop, sir," said my mentor, "and call to mind that the snuffers on the altar should be pure gold. Reproofs and rebukes come with a very ill grace from an offender."

"An offender!"

"Yes, an offender; and of the worst cast; an offense in you, and of this nature, is peculiarly offensive."

"Suppose any of your hearers in like circumstances, what advice would you give them? Suppose them offended by a brother, you would advise them to be calm, to suspend their judgment, to seek an opportunity alone with the supposed offender, address him in the language of love, of charity, hope it was not so bad as was expected; at least you would hope the intention was not bad, &c., &c. Thus you would have advised your hearers; thus you have not done; you have by your conduct, in this instance, injured your cause—injured your Master's cause, and perhaps made wounds that may never be healed. You know not, at this moment, what this kind friend is suffering; what his dear wife, his venerable parent, each of whom having a regard for both can say nothing, but must suffer in silence. O! you have done very wrong."

The tears gushed in my eyes; I thought of praying. "No," said my mentor, "not yet; you should first do right. Go and acknowledge your fault."

"I cannot."

"You must; indeed, you must."

"But he will treat me roughly."

"You deserve it; you must bear it; you will at least have the pleasure of knowing you did all you could, in your present circumstances, to repair the wrong you have done. When thus you have done, should you not meet forgiveness and reconciliation from him, you may apply to your offended Master; and, peradventure, you may find forgiveness and reconciliation from him."

I went out with an aching heart, experiencing the full force of the truth as I went along. "The way of the transgressor is hard." I arrived at his dwelling; I entered his doors; but O! with what different sensations, when unconscious of offense! O! how painful is a guilty conscience! I found him reading; he did not lift up his head, he did not speak; I could not. His dear companion blushed, she trembled, she spoke. However, he read on. I attempted once and again to bring out what my mentor charged me to do—I failed. At length, for I must come to it, I said, with a faltering voice, "You are justified, sir, in your conduct on this occasion; I deserve it all; and all this, yes, more, I can bear, with much more ease than I can the reproaches of my own heart. I am come to give this troubled heart some ease, sir, by acknowledging my error; I have done wrong, sir, in taking up a report of you, or saying anything about you to any one but yourself; I beseech you forgive me"—and was going to add; but he got up, his countenance suffused with tears, and would have spoken, but could not; he gave me his hand, however, and it was filled with as warm a heart as ever beat in a friend's bosom; it has never cooled since, though this was many years ago. On my return I was congratulated by my kind mentor, and then poured out my soul to my Heavenly Father, whose consoling language was, "Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more." [London Ev. OUR NEIGHBOR.

Luke 10: 29–37.

Does Bro. Brown mean to say, that Jesus, in answer to the question, "Who is my neighbor?" did convey the idea, that Christians must love all men equally? If so, why did the Son of God specify the deeds of him who had [not only] met all the wants of a sufferer for the time then being, but pledged himself unreservedly to meet all coming wants? If it would not tax Bro. B. too highly, I should be gratified to have him explain this parable.

P.

Reply.

When the Son of God specified the deeds of the good Samaritan, he did not thereby hold up him, above the others represented in the parable, as the proper object of that love which the law enjoins, but as the one who, above the others, had exercised and manifested such love.

The scope of the parable is very obvious. The "lawyer" had been referred to that precept of the law, which says, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Not willing to be thought lacking in duty, but "willing to justify himself," he inquires, "Who is my neighbor?" and the "priest" and the "Levite" would, no doubt, have asked the same question. For the notion had obtained wide currency among the Jews, that only those of their own nation, or of their own creed, were neighbors in such a sense as to be the proper objects of love. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy," was their maxim. Matt. 5: 43.

Accordingly, when the "priest" saw the man who had been stripped and wounded by thieves, he said within himself, 'This is not my neighbor;' and so "passed by on the other side." The "Levite" who "came and looked on him," reasoned in the same way, and acted in the same manner. They both admitted the binding force of the precept requiring man to love his neighbor, but drew the unwarrantable inference; that they might treat with indifference such as were not neighbors in the sense of living near them, or being of their own party.

Not so with the "Samaritan." For though he saw in the person of the sufferer one who was not of his own nation—not his neighbor in the Pharisaic sense—he felt that he was his neighbor in a much higher sense. If he did not live near him, he was near, nevertheless, in that sense in which all are near to one another who have sprung from one common Father, "in whom they live, and move, and have their being." In the compassion which burned in the Samaritan's heart, therefore, and in all that he did for the relief of the poor sufferer, there was the exercise of just such love as the Divine Law requires.

In opposition to this simple and surpassingly beautiful illustration of duty, the corrupt heart suggests that he is our neighbor, and therefore the proper object of love, who acts a neighborly or kindly part. The parable, however, furnishes no justification of this idea. The "lawyer" had, indeed, asked the question, "Who is my neighbor?" and the parable brings out the fact that the Samaritan acted the neighborly part; which seems, at first view, to convey the idea that characters like the Samaritan are the neighbors whom the law requires us to love. But farther consideration will convince any one, that the design of the Saviour was to exhibit a portrait of the man who obeys the law of love, and that the introduction of one who was the recipient or object of that love, (who in this instance was the sufferer,) was but incidental to his main design. The wounded man had no claim upon the kindness of his benefactor, on account of having previously acted towards him the neighborly part. He was a stranger, and of another nation. Yet in the sense in which the term is used in the Divine Law, he was not less a neighbor to the Samaritan, than the Samaritan was neighbor to him.

As to the question whether "Christians must love all men equally?" we answer yes; understanding by the term "love," however, not complacency—delight in their character—approbation of their conduct, but that benevolence—that kindness of heart—which seeks their welfare here and hereafter. In this sense, we are to love our enemies. The Saviour explains what he means by it, when he adds, "Bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you."

As for taking complacency or delight in one who is a bad man, it is impossible for Christians to do it; neither is it their duty. Their delight can be only in "the excellent of the earth," (Ps. 16: 3,) in "the brethren," (1 John 3: 14.) It is because he can have no complacency in the wicked, that the Christian prays, "Gather not my soul with sinners." Ps. 26: 9. On the same principle, he says, "Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate thee? and am not I grieved with those that rise up against thee?" Ps. 139: 21. Indeed, he is expressly command to "come out from among them, and be separate." 2 Cor. 6: 17.

Our Father in Heaven loves the whole world with a love of benevolence. There is not a sinner on the earth, who is not the object of his regard—the recipient of his kindness. "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." Even among the heathen, "he leaves not himself without witness, in that he does good, and gives them rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling their hearts with food and gladness." And, what is above all other evidences of his love, he has sent his Son, that believers might have eternal life. John 3: 16. Yet, not one impenitent sinner does God love with a love of complacency. He hates all workers of iniquity, (Ps. 5: 5, and 11: 5.) and is angry with them every day. Ps. 7: 11.

As God is in his love, so are Christians required to be in theirs. They should love all men equally, with a love of benevolence; the truly good only, with a love of delight. By kindness to the unthankful and to the evil, they prove themselves to be the children of the Highest. Luke 6: 35. By delighting in the good, they prove themselves to be Christ's disciples. John 13: 35.

THE NORTH-WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

We have received a copy of the printed Minutes of the Sixth Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist North-Western Association, held at Albion, Dane Co., Wisconsin, Sept. 29th and 30th, and Oct. 1st and 2d, 1852. As our notice of the meeting at the time was quite brief, having reference mainly to a Report on Education which accompanied it, we give now the following items gathered from the Minutes.

The Introductory Discourse was preached by Eld. Julius M. Todd, of the church in Berlin, Wis., from Rom. 12: 2—"And be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God."

The officers of the Association were Eld. Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Moderator; C. A. Burdick, and A. C. Spicer, Clerks.

Among the Letters sent up to the Association was one from the recently-organized church at Southampton, Ill., requesting admittance to membership, which request was granted. The statistics, as gathered from the letters, show that the church at Milton has 184 members; Albion 76; Walworth 34; Farmington 47, of whom 16 were added last year; Berlin 58, of whom 25 were added last year; Christiana, 54; Southampton 11. Milton reports V. Hull as pastor, and D. Babcock and R. Bond preachers; Albion, A. W. Coon licentiate; Walworth, O. P. Hull pastor; Farmington, S. Davison, L. A. Davis, Joshua Hill, L. D. Ayars, James Hill, preachers; Berlin, J. M. Todd preacher; Christiana, Z. Campbell pastor, T. C. Maxson licentiate; Southampton, S. Coon preacher.

The following officers for the ensuing year were elected: Missionary Board, Z. Campbel, Z. Gilbert, J. A. Potter, A. F. Geer, E. M. Crandall; Treasurer, D. J. Green; Recording Secretary, C. A. Burdick; Corresponding Secretary, Varnum Hull; Board of Education, A. C. Spicer, Ezra Goodrich, J. M. Todd, Datus E. Lewis, Adin Burdick, J. H. Potter, Z. Campbell, E. M. Crandall, O. P. Hull, and Harlow M. Coon.

Stillman Coon was appointed delegate of the Association to the Anniversaries of our Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies. It was also voted, that any delegate to the Association be authorized to represent it at any anniversary he may attend during the coming year.

The subject of Education occupied a large place in the discussions of the Association; but as we have already given the Report adopted, and an account of the discussion, we have no occasion to refer to them here. A series of Resolutions was reported by a Committee, and adopted by the Association, after interesting remarks. We give the Resolutions, and the Report on the State of Religion.

The next meeting of the Association is to be held with the church in Walworth, Wis., on the fifth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath in September, 1853. Lewis A. Davis is to preach the Introductory Discourse; Eld. Varnum Hull, alternate.

The Resolutions.

Resolved, That the first and great business of this Association is, to promote vital piety in the individual members and churches of which it is composed, and in the world.

To the attainment of this end,

Resolved, That we recommend deep and thorough self-examination, as in the sight of God, secret and family prayer, close study of the word of God, and regular attendance at Divine service.

Resolved, That a faithful and competent ministry, together with the maintenance of a kind and strict gospel discipline, are among the most important means of promoting piety.

And whereas, such a ministry loses much of its efficiency, unless sustained and directed by intelligence in the church and community; and whereas, such effort at discipline loses much of its efficiency, unless guided by a cultivated reason and enlightened judgment; therefore, Resolved, That we believe the adoption and support of a thorough and proper system of education are among our most urgent religious duties.

Resolved, That this Association recommend to the several Churches composing the same, the vital importance of instituting and keeping up Sabbath-Schools and Bible-Classes, as a means of grace to the young.

Resolved, That we recommend to our Churches earnest prayer for the cause of Missions, both at home and abroad, and to give liberally for the support of the same.

Resolved, That the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing and Tract Societies deserve the liberal patronage and support of the members of our Churches.

Resolved, That we recommend to the several Churches composing this Association, to make frequent collections for the purchase of Sabbath Tracts for general distribution.

Resolved, That we regard the so-called Fugitive Slave Law as a production of wickedness, a violation of the Law of God and every principle of humanity; as extremely mischievous in its workings, and of no morally binding force upon us; and that, as Christians, we prefer rather to suffer its penalties than obey its mandates.

Resolved, That this Association, recognizing the organization of the Church as of Divine origin, recommend and urge upon the brethren living within the bounds of the respective Churches composing this Association, to attach themselves to the Church of Christ in such place; and that the refusal or neglect to comply with such arrangement of the Divine Government, operates directly against the cause of piety, whatever their sympathies may be to the contrary; and that they cannot, in the judgment of this body, vindicate themselves from the charge of "scattering abroad."

Report on the State of Religion.

Your Committee, on examining the letters from the different Churches, find much to encourage us. One Church has been added to our number, and nearly all the churches have kept up Sabbath-Schools, Bible-Classes, and Prayer Meetings. Missionary and Tract Societies have been encouraged, Sabbath Tracts have been circulated, and we trust those silent messengers have done much good. Some of the churches have been blessed with the outpourings of the Spirit of God, and sinners have been born into the kingdom. Other churches have apparently commenced a steady march heavenward, and, with one exception, have received additions; and that church has kept up its meetings on the Sabbath, and had a Sabbath-School and Bible-Class and Prayer-Meetings when there was no preaching. Nevertheless, we fear that the standard of piety and godliness is not as high among us as God requires. Holiness and perfect love is the standard set up by our Saviour, and nothing short of this will satisfy the soul, which is hungering and thirsting after righteousness. Let us continue to press forward toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Francisco Madiai—Affairs on the Continent—Bishop Ives.

GLASGOW, January 14th, 1852.

Francisco Madiai has gone "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest;" and his blood cries for vengeance against those who treated him as a malefactor for his love of God's most holy Word. The secrets of that prison-house in which he was confined at Volterra may never be known until the day which will bring to light the hidden works of darkness; but there seems reason to fear that willful murder has also been committed in his case. When visited by Lord Roden, in the beginning of November, his health was greatly broken up, and his intellect was considered impaired by his sufferings. He was much depressed, and he appeared to be in a state of lethargy; but when he roused himself he said "poison was mixed with all the food he received from his gaoler's hands." It is quite consistent with the wicked policy of Rome to seek by such means to be rid of one whose case has been the means of awakening Protestant feeling and alarm. But if their consciences were not seared, what would now be the reflection of the immediate agents in the bloody business. The martyr, though deprived of the advantage of Christian books, rejected the solicitations made to return to the Church of Rome, and it is some satisfaction to learn, that at the last he had the consolations of truth through M. Coloumb, a Swiss pastor, with whom he joined in commemoration of the death of Christ. His widowed Rosa still remains. How will the Grand Duke and his spiritual advisers deal with her? How will Protestants act concerning her? Let not the church cease to make prayer and supplication in her behalf—remembering the care and love of Jesus for His own.

The state of the Continent of Europe, in its relations with Popery, is becoming more and more alarming. France seems to be given over to its tender mercies. It is this morning stated, that twenty-four new Bishoprics are to be created for that country, which other manifestations of Imperial favor render highly probable. The accommodating system appears, indeed, by rather remarkable means, to be seeking to attach to itself the New Emperor. His feet are being entangled in her spiritual net. The London Church and State Gazette announces that Napoleon III., as he has been pleased to style himself, "is now a Right Reverend. The Church of Rome has exhibited its respect for divinity and divine offices by making him a 'canon.'" In this capacity he acted at the reïnauguration of the Pantheon as a place of worship, ten days ago—when, after a procession of ecclesiastics, a pinch of dust, called the bones of St. Genevieve, "the patroness saint," was removed from Notre Dame, and again deposited in the building which has served equally the purposes of infidel idolatry and Papal superstition. It is too consistent with such proceedings by the Head of the Government, to find that by a judgment of the Court of Troyes, the Protestant place of worship there is ordered to be closed; for what assigned reason, the intelligence to-day does not inform us. M. de Montalembert has just published a new work, celebrating in glowing terms the present revival of the Romish communion. He is known as the lay chief, the most eminent champion which that church has been able to boast for twenty years—and he tells us that she is now arming for universal conquest, and that opposing sects are to be destroyed. Yet the Jesuits, and the editors of their organ, The Univers, are highly displeased, and have violently attacked him, because he has still some sense of liberty, and is not enthusiastic in his admiration of their imperial 'canon.' The Romish having obtained the ascendancy over the Greeks at Jerusalem, measures will probably be taken to retain, if possible, their acquired advantages. Accordingly, the Abbe Lacordaire, accompained by several ecclesiastics and laics, is about to make a pilgrimage to Palestine, to visit the holy places. It is hardly to be expected, however, that we have yet seen the termination of the conflict of France and Russia for possession of the coveted means of promoting their respective superstitions.

Dr. Ives, Episcopal Bishop of Carolina, is stated to have joined the Church of Rome. He has made the avowal at head quarters, being at present resident in Rome. It is the natural result of those Puseyite views and practices he is said for a long time to have indulged. There is a want of consistency on the part of those among us who still abide within the walls of the Church of England, receiving her honors and eating of her bread, while teaching doctrines not only Romish in their tendency, but actually filling up the ranks of Popery with converts. Such is the result of introducing human inventions into the worship of God. Episcopacy, departing from Scripture, and receiving human tradition, is not permitted to keep her own, when she rejects that which is divine. The lesson we are thereby taught, surely, is to hold fast the faithful word.

J. A. BEGG.

THE JERRY RESCUE TRIALS.

P[illegible]ly most of our readers are familiar with the facts in this case. On the 1st day of October, 1851, an alledged fugitive from slavery in Missouri, called Jerry, was arrested at Syracuse, N. Y. An Anti-Slavery Convention was in session there at the time, and some of its members, as well as many citizens, naturally interested themselves in the case of the poor fugitive. In the evening, while he was incarcerated in the police office, an uproar was created thereabouts, in the course of which Jerry was spirited away.

A number of persons supposed to have taken part in the transaction were arrested, and on Third-day of last week their cases came up for trial before the United States Circuit Court at Albany, Hon. N. K. Hall presiding. The defendants, some fourteen in number, (of whom five or six are colored,) were all present, together with some fifty witnesses. The Government was represented by Hon. James R. Lawrence, U. S. District Attorney, and Hon. Henry G. Wheaton. The counsel for the defendants were J. W. Nye, D. D. Hillis, C. B. Sedgwick, A. J. Collin, and Gerrit Smith. After considerable delay, a jury was empanneled, and the case of Enoch Reed was taken up. The examination of witnesses, pleading of counsel, charge by the Judge, &c., occupied the time till Sabbath evening, Jan 29, when this case was given to the jury, who brought in a verdict of guilty. Mr. Hillis then gave notice that he would move an arrest of Judgment, and requested that Reed be not committed. To this the Judge consented, on receiving good bail in $2,000 for Reed's appearance in Court from day to day. The Court then adjourned till Second-day of the present week.

The legal punishment in this case is not over six months imprisonment and a fine not exceeding $1,000.

MR. EVERETT'S SPEECH.

In these days one occasionally meets an out-and-out pro-slavery man, who maintains that the negro race is incapable of civilization and improvement—that on this account their condition is bettered by slavery—that the system of servitude does no injustice to the colored man or the community, but is actually a blessing to both. For the benefit of such we copied, last week, the speech of Hon. Edward Everett before the American Colonization Society, in which, without seeming to aim at any such thing, he most effectually demolishes this doctrine. Referring to that speech, the editor of the N. Y. Tribune says:

"Mr. Everett is no fanatic, no radical, but a leading devotee and magnifier of the lower law, who has proclaimed on the floor of Congress his readiness to shoulder a musket in bloody resistance to any slave insurrection, whose ruling tendencies are all pro-slavery, and who never yet publicly expressed an anti-slavery sentiment but when he was in quest of anti-slavery votes. This high functionary, speaking to the most influential auditory that could be collected in the land—an auditory preponderantly Southern and one qualifiedly pro-slavery—has argued and proved that the Negro Race is susceptible of intellectual culture and progress, and of rising as rapidly in the social scale as any other. He has therein pointed most significantly to our own Anglo-Saxon progenitors, as barbarous and benighted some ten centuries ago, as the African tribes of to-day—nay, to a great majority of the inhabitants of Europe at this hour, very slightly elevated above the level of average barbarism, though their intellectual condition is obscured by the diffusion among them of a few millions more fortunate and cultivated than they. No zealous abolitionist ever made—we hardly know one who could make—a more forcible and conclusive argument against Slavery on the question immediately pending than did Mr. Everett to applauding thousands of anti-fanatics in Washington. Such testimony cannot be invalidated. It cannot be set aside. It cannot perish unnoted or fruitless. It is bound to reverberate, and to tell. The Secretary of State has stormed and carried the fortress wherein Human Bondage had deliberately taken refuge. He has shown that the fundamental assumptions whereon it bases its right to dispense stripes instead of wages, and make merchandise of God's image have no basis in fact nor in reason. He has branded those assumptions as fallacies, and given judgment against their upholders."

THE "PRINCIPLE" OF "THE CATHOLIC GOVERNMENT."—The Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register, New York, has a communication on Civil Toleration, suggested by the Madiai case in Tuscany, which contains the following very significant and suggestive sentence:—

"I would conclude by observing, that it is easy to show that, while the Catholic Government of the entirely Catholic community is not bound, in order to be consistent to its principles, to tolerate any other religious teaching, the Protestant State, though having no Catholics established in its realms, could not, without denying the essential principles of Protestantism, oppose the introduction of Catholicity or any other religion."

CONVERSION OF CATHOLICS.—At a meeting held in London, Dec. 15, in aid of the Society for Irish Missions to Roman Catholics, Rev. Mr. Bickersteth made the following encouraging statements:—

"Between thirty and forty thousand people have within these four years abandoned the idolatry of Romanism, and made an open and bold profession of their conversion to the truth of the gospel, and who are now living to the praise and glory of God. In one district in the West of Ireland alone, in a union where this movement commenced, and where, between four and five years ago, there were not more than five or six hundred converts, there are now between five and six thousand. In the Society's schools there are between five and six thousand children regularly attending and receiving instruction in Protestant truth. In the western part of Galway, the Bishop has confirmed no fewer than one thousand nine hundred and forty-eight converts from Romanism. In the same district where, at the commencement of the movement, there were only two Protestant clergymen, there are now eighteen. Eight new churches have been erected, where crowded congregations assemble every Sabbath to hear the gospel of Christ; many additional schools have been built, in which thousands of children, the children of Roman Catholic parents, are taught from week to week God's Holy Word."

THE MISSION TO MICRONESIA.—A Sandwich Island paper notices the return to Honolulu of the schooner Caroline, which sailed thence on the 15th of July last, for the purpose of carrying to Micronesia Rev. Messrs. Snow, Gulick, and Sturges, with their wives, and four natives of the Hawaiian Islands, to establish a mission in that extensive archipelago, under the patronage of the A. B. C. F. M., in conjunction with the Hawaiian Missionary Society. Rev. Mr. Snow and lady concluded to locate at Strong's Island, in lat. 5 N., lon. 164 E., 300 miles north-west of Ascension. The population of Strong's Island is about 1,500, and extensive groups of islands are near by, which have never been explored with reference to missionary operations. Mr. and Mrs. Sturges and Mr. and Mrs. Gulick proceeded to Ascension, where they were left comfortably situated in their "own hired house," with a wide field of usefulness before them.

A NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.—A Convention to take into consideration the establishment of a National University, assembled at Albany, Jan. 26th, and was attended by a large number of scholars from different parts of the country. The design seems to be, to establish an institution which shall furnish facilities for those engaged in scientific pursuits to go farther than they can in any institution now existing in this country. A location is not fixed upon, though the general drift of remark indicated that Albany was considered a favorable point, especially as it is the capital of a State which is able to do very liberally for the proposed institution. A Committee of twenty-one, with Henry S. Randall, Secretary of State, for Chairman, was appointed to report a plan for a National University.

A CHURCH FOR MUTES.—An undertaking has recently been commenced in New York, by Rev. Thomas Gallaudet, in behalf of the educated deaf mutes, of whom there are at least 125 in this city, the great majority gaining a respectable livelihood in various pursuits. He proposes to form a parish and build a church, in which he can gather around him these persons for religious worship and instruction. With this end in view Mr. G. holds service, every Sunday, in the small chapel of the University on Washington Square, in order that the parents and children, and other relatives and friends of deaf mutes may be joined with them in one parish. The morning service is conducted with the voice, but the afternoon is for the deaf mutes themselves, and is carried on by means of the silent language of signs.

BAPTIST HEAD-QUARTERS IN NEW YORK.—The American Bible Society having erected a splendid building for the transaction of its business in the upper part of New York, last week sold at auction its old quarters in Nassau-st. They had asked $125,000 for it previous to the sale, but it was bid off for $105,000, by a number of gentlemen, who intend to have it used by the Baptist Home Mission Society, the American and Foreign Bible Society, and perhaps some other Baptist Societies. The building will be known hereafter as "The Baptist Missionary and Bible Rooms."

THE NEW ENGLAND ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.—This Society held a two-days session in Boston last week, with rather small attendance. The Treasurer's Report showed that $6,618 64 were received last year, of which $323 62 remains in the treasury. The Annual Report of the Managers says, in reference to the progress of anti-slavery, that it shall sweep over the ruins of the Constitution and the Union, when a fairer edifice than our fathers knew how to build shall arise. Alluding to Daniel Webster, the report says: "He sold his soul to the devil of slavery, was cheated out of the price, and in mortification turned his face to the wall and died."

HELP FOR MADEIRA.—The almost entire failure of the last vintage and potato crop in Madeira, has left the inhabitants of that island in a condition bordering on starvation, and induced them to appeal to other countries for aid. A ship-load of provisions were sent them from Boston last week, mostly paid for by voluntary contributions. Another ship-load will soon go from New York, where contributions to a large amount have already been made.

PROGRESS OF SUNDAY DESECRATION.—There has been no regular Sunday Mail from New York eastward these many years. But now such a mail between New York and Boston is under consideration by the Post-Office Department, and will probably soon be established. It is proposed to have it leave each city by the land route at 6 o'clock P. M.

MR. GOODELL'S BOOKS.—In our advertising column, will be found a notice of two books by Wm. Goodell—one on the Democracy of Christianity, and the other on the Slavery and Anti-Slavery Controversy. The design and scope of these works is very clearly set forth in the advertisement, to which the reader is referred. The work on the Democracy of Christianity strikes us as peculiarly suited to the present time, refuting, as it does, the false notion that Democracy and Christianity are opposed to each other, and establishing the all-important truth, that Christianity and Democracy are so vitally connected that the one can not exist in purity and integrity without the other. The work on the Slavery and Anti-Slavery Controversy, is invaluable for reference, or for the perusal of one who desires to be posted up in regard to the question of the age. Perhaps no man living is better qualified to write a history of the slavery agitation, pro and con, than Wm. Goodell, who has been at the same time a candid observer of it and an active participant in it.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE for February has, if possible, more than its usual variety of reading matter and illustrations Jacob Abbott's "Memoirs of the Holy Land" are continued, and this article, on Mount Lebanon, has eight illustrations. "Crusoe Life—Adventures in the Island of Juan Fernandez," by J. Ross Browne, is profusely illustrated, having over twenty engravings. "Napoleon Bonaparte," by John S. C. Abbott, has six engravings. The number contains articles on Making Hay while the Sun Shines, The two Skulls, Captain Bart and the Sea-Fox, The Queen of the Canary Islands, Good Advice from Sir Walter Scott, My Novel, The Living Authors of England, Bleak House, Christmas Stories, Instinct in a Hyena, The Old Soldier's Story, Monthly Record of Current Events, Editor's Easy Chair, Editor's Drawer, Literary Notices, Comicalities, Fashions, &c.

MADAME SONTAG is still singing in New York, at Niblo's, to large and delighted audiences. It is stated in the daily papers, that she has engaged Castle Garden for three months during the coming spring. Although her object in visiting this country was to earn money to educate her children, she does not decline assistance for objects of general benevolence. She recently sang for the benefit of an Institution established in this city for the purpose of supplying work and the necessaries of life to poor families.

MR. JUDD'S RETURN.—Rev. W. L. Judd, the Missionary to Hayti of the Baptist Free Mission Society, has been in this country several months, engaged in raising money to build a Chapel at Port au-Prince. Having succeeded in collecting some three thousand dollars, he sailed for his field of labor on the 8th Jan. A meeting was held in one of the Baptist churches of New York on the occasion, in which eight or ten clergymen took part, and much interest in the condition and prospects of Hayti was expressed.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

The Christian Watchman and Reflector says that religious services in connection with the designation of missionaries of the American Baptist Missionary Union, about to sail for the East, were held in the Rowe Street church in Boston, on Sunday evening, Jan. 16. The missionaries were Rev. Moses H. Bixby and wife, Rev. Daniel Whitaker and wife, Rev. A. Taylor Rose and wife, and Mrs. S. K. Bennett, missionary to Tavoy, who now returns to that station. It is an interesting fact connected with her return, that she is accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. Whitaker, who came to this country in her early childhood to be educated, and now goes back as a missionary.

The Lutherans have a Theological Seminary at Gettysburg, Penn.; a second at Hartwick, N. Y.; a third at Lexington, S. C.; a fourth and fifth at Columbus and Springfield, Ohio; a sixth at Springfield, Illinois. In addition to all these, the Old School, or so-called "Old" Lutherans, have two, viz. one at Fort Wayne, Ohio, and another at St. Louis, Missouri. The former is designed for the accommodation of those students for the ministry, whose circumstances do not admit of passing through a full course of study, and the latter for the benefit of such as have time and means, and aspire to a thorough education.

The British and Foreign Bible Society enters on its fiftieth year on the seventh of March next, and its managers have made arrangements for celebrating its jubilee. Not only are public meetings to be held by the parent society, and its auxiliaries, but special efforts are to be made to raise a large fund, to be called the Jubilee Fund, and appropriated to the purposes of the society.

A Methodist missionary among the Indians complains of drunkenness as the greatest obstacle to his labors. The "low groggeries" are so many fountains of corruption. He has become tired, he says, of moral suasion, and has resolved to "appeal unto Cæsar," persuaded that "there's no way to reach a confirmed whiskey-vender, but through his purse."

Geo. Hadfield, Esq., of Manchester, England, a member of Parliament, is giving a strong impulse to Church Extension among the Congregationalists in England. He has offered a sum equal to $25,000, to be appropriated in sums of $500 for each new enterprise; thus giving "material aid" towards the erection of fifty churches, besides the influence of his example in stimulating men of kindred minds to similar acts of Christian enterprise and beneficence.

The Lafayette (Ia.) Daily Courier of January 3d, says: "The Baptist church in this city has been enjoying a powerful revival of religion during the past three weeks, under the plain, pointed, searching ministrations of Elder Knapp. About fifty persons have united with that church, and some have connected themselves with other churches."

A grandson of the celebrated William Paley was ordained recently in England. He is going out to Africa as a missionary of the Established Church.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JAN. 24.

In the Senate, Mr. Hale offered a resolution of inquiry, which was referred to the Naval Committee, in relation to frauds upon seamen. He said that Congress passed a law at its last session, granting extra pay to petty officers and seamen engaged on the coast of California, and he could prove by reliable witnesses, that, on the arrival of the Vandalia and Vincennes, the purser was informed that a certain individual had obtained the passage of that act, and a tax on the seamen's wages, amounting to $3,000, was withheld from seamen to pay this person for his services. Mr. Sebastian made a report, giving the history of the Seminoles since 1832, in which prompt and decisive measures are recommended to carry out the original plan of their removal. In Executive Session two Messages from the President were received, one communicating correspondence relative to Central America, the other containing the award of Louis Napoleon in the case of the General Armstrong. Another communication to the Senate shows that the State of Arkansas owes the United States the nice little sum of $867,356, principal and interest.

In the House, but little of general interest was done. Four unimportant Senate bills were passed; also a bill regulating the reports of the Patent Office, and providing four additional officers, the object being to make the mechanical part of the report more intelligible by, among other things accompanying them, engraved outlines hereafter.

THIRD-DAY, JAN. 25.

The Senate passed the bill for the suppression of frauds in the prosecution of claims by members of Congress, and others. Mr. Soule made a long set speech on Cuba and the Monroe doctrine, which, with a speech by Mr. Cass, occupied most of the day.

In the House, the New York Mint bill came up and was further discussed until the expiration of the morning hour, after which the bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the past fiscal year was the prominent topic.

FOURTH-DAY, JAN. 26.

In the Senate, among the petitions presented, was one from Boston praying the establishment of uniform rates of ocean postage of two cents per half ounce, and several from citizens of Brooklyn and from naturalized Germans, Swedes and Norwegians, in favor of establishing mail steamships between Brooklyn, Germany, and St. Petersburg. Mr. Cass's resolutions then came up, and Mr. Seward made a speech. Considerable debate followed, and it was proposed to postpone the matter until after the 4th of March next, but after considerable discussion the Senate adjourned without voting upon it.

In the House, the New York Branch Mint was finally killed, and the deficiency bill taken up. A motion to appropriate a sum of money to pay for the pedestal of the Jackson Statue gave an opportunity for a discussion of the weighty point, whether the bank-killer put an end to South Carolina nullification or not.

FIFTH-DAY, JAN. 27.

Before the commencement of proceedings, the Aztec Children were brought into the Senate Chamber, and placed on the Secretary's table. The exhibitor of them addressed the crowd of Senators and others, explaining their history, &c. Mr. Seward presented petitions from various parts of New York, in favor of grants of land to aid in the construction of a Ship Canal around the Falls of Niagara. Mr. Cass's resolution directing inquiry by the Committee on Foreign Relations as to what action of the Senate, if any, is necessary in consequence of the qualifications added to the Bulwer and Clayton Treaty, came up, and after considerable discussion was adopted. The rest of the proceedings were unimportant.

The House refused to entertain a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit with the several States the fourth installment of the money authorized to be deposited with the several States under the act of June, 1836, by which New York would receive $1,338,000, and Pennsylvania $955,838—the money to be devoted to the transportation of free people of color in those States to Liberia. The bill appropriating $3,000 to finish the pedestal of the equestrian statue of Gen. Jackson, and enclose the same with an iron fence, was adopted.

SIXTH-DAY, JAN. 28.

The Senate passed several private bills, ordered a new Pacific Railroad Bill printed, and adjourned to Second-day.

The House spent the day upon private bills, of which it passed twenty-two.

The Roman Catholics and Common Schools.—Apprehension is expressed in some quarters, that a disruption of the Common School System of New York will soon result from a concerted (if not commanded) withdrawal of the children of Roman Catholics. Archbishop Hughes recently preached a sermon on the subject, in which he expressed a conviction that our present system of Common School Education is inveterately hostile to religious, or at least to Catholic, impressions and principles—that it tends to imbue the pupils' minds with indifference, if not infidelity, with regard to Christian Doctrine. He also intimated, that the time must soon come, if it has not come already, when Catholics must not only withdraw their children from our Common Schools, but make war upon the system, unless it be radically changed. Indeed, the drift of the Archbishop's remarks indicated that he doubts whether any system of really common instruction is possible in a community of diverse faiths like ours; but, assuming that Protestants will not consent to have their children taught Catholic doctrines, he clearly implied throughout, that the Catholics must withdraw their children from the Public Schools, and provide for their education in parochial or private schools; and that it will then have become the duty of the State to either—1. Apportion them their equal share of the School Money, according to the number of their children; or, 2. Relieve them from all taxation for the support of schools, and allot them their proportion of the existing School Funds; or, 3. Abolish the Common Schools, and abandon the idea of Popular Education under the control and patronage of the State.

European News.

We have one week later news from Europe, of which the following is a summary.

Francis Madiai, whose case has excited so much attention in the religious world, is dead in prison at Florence. Mr. Wilbraham Taylor, writing in The Times, expresses his "firm conviction" that Madiai was poisoned, and says that the unfortunate man himself complained that some slow poison was mixed with his food. It will be remembered that Madiai and his wife were imprisoned about 18 months since on the charge of reading the Scriptures. For some time past Madiai had been in a state of impaired intellect, but, the newspaper accounts say, had been treated without severity, owing to the interference of the King of Prussia in his behalf. Madame M. remains in prison. [Some papers discredit this report of Madiai's death.

During the past season much astonishment was created in the London Corn market by the purchase on the Continent of many cargoes of grain, which were imported and sold at a price less than the cost. It was immediately surmised that such transactions could only be carried on for political objects. At one time it was rumored that they had been undertaken by the Protectionist party, with a view of depressing the Wheat market at the time of the elections, so as to increase the dislike of the agriculturists to free trade; but this met with little credence, and another equally unlikely surmise was offered, to the effect that they had been conducted at the expense of the French Government, to lessen the English demand for French Flour, and thus to keep prices in that country down to a point that would insure popular contentment during the arrangements for bringing about a declaration of the Empire. The general calculations were that the sum lost by the operation was not less than £100,000. It now transpires, that a grain merchant named Preis had been engaged in forgery to an incredible extent, and it is expected that the investigation into his affairs will show that these cargoes were purchased by him and forced into the market at any sacrifice, to meet his forged engagements as they fell due. Being discovered at last, he fled, but was retaken, and is now in custody.

The Universe says: A general subject of conversation at Rome is the recent conversion to the Catholic faith of Dr. Ives, the Anglican Bishop of Carolina in the United States. Dr. Ives had, for a long time, embraced Puseyite opinions, and felt strong sympathy for the Catholic religion, which had subjected him to much remonstrance. Since he has been at Rome, he has put himself in relation with Monsignor Gill, the Catholic Bishop of Virginia, United States, and addressed himself to Monsignor Talbot, the private Cameriere of the Pope, in order to make his solemn abduration, and publicly profess Catholicism. This ceremony took place on the 26th of December, the Pope in person administering the sacrament to the convert.

The answers from American Diplomatists abroad to the circular making inquiries as to the expenses of living, have been widely copied into the English journals, and are commented upon extensively, and generally exhibit a preference for the American system of small salaries to the British system of highly paid sinecures.

During the year just ended 621 ships, conveying 217,459 passengers, left the port of Liverpool for America and Australia. In the year 1851 the number was 607 ships and 196,890 passengers, being an increase of 14 ships and 20,569 passengers.

Rev. John Scoble, known in America from his connection with the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, is retiring from office, and over £1,000 have been subscribed to present him with a testimonial.

A man named Henry Horler was executed on the 10th in front of the jail of Newgate, for the murder of his wife. The wretched criminal was so prostrated by fear, that he had to be supported by stimulants to enable him to make a decent appearance on the scaffold. An immense crowd was on hand to be edified by the spectacle.

California News.

California news to Jan. 1st, being two weeks later, was received in New York, Jan. 28th.

The amount of Gold by the shipments from San Francisco of Jan. 1st falls short of $2,000,000, a less sum than has been recently received by the semi-monthly arrivals, but as large as could be expected during the present inclement season.

An important decision has been rendered by the U. S. Land Commissioners, confirming the title of Col. Fremont to a large tract of land containing ten square leagues.

The Alta California of Jan. 1st says that the present winter is conceded to be the most severe experienced in California since it has been populated by Americans. During the last fortnight it has been raining and snowing continually in the mountains and vallies, and we are daily in the receipt of accounts of distress and suffering in all parts of the State. The waters have been unusually high, and communication through the mining regions almost entirely cut off, either by snow or overflowed streams.

The rivers have been swelled to such an extent as to inundate all the low lands, causing immense damage, destroying stock and agricultural products. The whole country between Tehama and Sacramento City was entirely under water, while Marysville was partly inundated, and though Sacramento City was well protected by a levee, the lower portions were submerged. The waters at the present time have subsided, although the rains still continue. On the mountain streams the loss of mining implements has been great, and all work for the present is suspended. Bridges have been swept away, and ferries destroyed, and some few lives lost.

The southern portion of the mining district has suffered equally with the northern. Stockton has been inundated partially, and property to a considerable amount destroyed. The bridges on the Calaveras, Stanislaus and other streams have been swept away, and communication with the mining towns for a while suspended. The flood has been universal, and the waters higher than in the memorable winter of 1849.

The great scarcity of provisions, and the consequent high price, has occasioned much suffering and distress already, and it is feared that many will actually die from starvation. Many miners subsist entirely on beef and potatoes, whilst in other portions of the mines there are hundreds who have nothing at all but barley and potatoes. In portions of Yuba and Sierra County the snow was already ten feet deep and still falling, and the miners actually reduced to absolute want.

Dates from Oregon are to Dec. 18. There was much ice running in the Columbia river, and the bark Ocean Bird and brig Hodgdon were frozen in near the mouth. The Legislature were in session, but were doing nothing of importance. The Message of the Governor had been voted out of the Legislature by a majority of two votes.

Eastern Oregon has been generally much underrated. That portion including the valley of Flathead Lake, the Valley of St. Mary's, the head waters of Kooskook or Clearwater, and the Spokane, and other districts in that region, afford fine pasturage, and many beautiful sites for agricultural communities. Sufficient information has already been obtained to render it probable that many portions of Oregon will prove rich in useful minerals, and its soil for many agricultural products is unsurpassed. It also affords a rich and interesting field for scientific research.

Dates from China are to Oct. 31st, and from the Sandwich Islands to Dec. 4. The news is not of much importance.

Not all Gold that Glitters.—The Dansville Herald says: "We learn that great excitement existed for a few days, last week, at Canisteo, Steuben County, by the supposed discovery of gold. Of course all sorts of rumors are afloat, but as near as we can ascertain, by a gentleman who was in that vicinity, and saw specimens of the metal taken out, the facts appear to be that the "gold mine" was discovered by a boy, on the banks of Bennett's Creek, near Canisteo, and some ten or twelve miles from Hornellsville. It was supposed to be gold, and the announcement that the boy had dug $500 worth in three days, flew like wildfire, and, as might well be supposed, excitement was at fever heat. Some two hundred men are reported to have assembled in the vicinity, upon short notice. Rumors prevail as to the owners of the farms along the creek getting out their "shooting irons," and peremptorily ordering all intruders off their premises. It is also said that warrants were issued, and some thirty arrests made for trespass. Our informant, who is a jeweler, examined the metal, and reports it of a bright color, quite malleable, and he, in connection with others who are capable of judging, pronounces it almost pure copper. Whether explorations will lead to the discovery of an extensive deposit of copper, remains to be seen. It is thought by many, however, that there is some connivance in its discovery.

Railroads in Cities.—It is generally reported and believed, that permission to lay down a railroad track in Broadway, N. Y., was obtained from the Common Council by a pretty free use of money. Hence the various injunctions upon the measure. As a last resort, the opponents of the road, or of its being built by the parties to whom the Common Council gave authority, have applied to the Legislature for protection; and on the 28th Jan. the State Senate, by a vote of 20 to 6, passed a Bill to prevent Injustice in the construction of Railroads, which provides that no railroads shall be constructed in New York, or any other City, without a special act of the Legislature authorizing the same, and stating the terms and conditions. The Assembly will doubtless pass the bill.

Routes for the Pacific Railraod.—In an editorial on the subject of a Railroad to the Pacific, the N. Y. Tribune has the following reference to the different routes:—

"The shortest route is that from Lake Superior and the Falls of St. Anthony to the north branch of the Columbia, and so down to the Dalles and to Puget's Sound. The most obvious and best route is that from St. Louis to the Platte, and up to the South Pass; thence by Salt Lake to Sacramento. The third or southern route is longer, and encounters great engineering difficulties through New Mexico, but it enjoys the great advantage of comparative exemption from snow. There may be still other routes, or modifications of these, to be discovered hereafter; but it is probable that one of these must for the most part be followed."

Double Execution.—Two men, named Nicholas Howlett and William Saul, were hung in New York on Sixth-day, Jan. 28th, for shooting a watchman on board a ship they were attempting to rob in August last. Another man, named Johnson, was to have been executed with them for the same crime; but a few days previous to their execution, these two made a confession, showing that although Johnson was in their company, he was so drunk that he lay all the while on the bottom of the small boat with which they went to the ship. His punishment was therefore commuted by the Governor to imprisonment for life.

Disasters on Western Waters.—The Louisville Courier publishes a list of disasters on Western Waters during the year 1852. It is a formidable one, embracing 78 steamboats, 4 barges, 73 coalboats, 32 saltboats, and 4 others, flatboats. It appears that 48 boats were lost by being snagged, 16 by explosions, 4 were burnt, and the rest by collision and other mishaps. The greater number of the flatboats were destroyed by the breaking up of ice last winter. The greatest number of lives lost by one disaster was by the explosion of the Saluda, 100. The total loss of life was 458 persons.

Free Soil in Rhode Island.—A Free Soil State Convention was held at Mechanic's Hall, Providence, R. I., on Fifth-day, Jan. 27. The attendance was respectable in numbers, but not much business was done. The nomination of State Officers and other matters connected with the politics of the party, were confided to the State Central Committee. A committee was also appointed to superintend the publication of a party organ.

Temperance Movements in New Jersey.—The Friends of Temperance held a great Convention at Trenton, N. J., on Fifth-day, Jan. 27, when a Silver Pitcher was presented to Hon. Neale Dow, the author of the Maine Liquor Law. A mammoth petition, containing over 30,000 names, was presented to the Legislature, in favor of a law similar to that of Maine.

SUMMARY.

The large English ship Successor, lying in Madras Roads, having on board 244 persons and a great number of horses, foundered at her anchors, in sight of hundreds of people, on the 9th of October last. The captain and second officer had gone on shore, leaving the ship in the care of the mate. A squall arose, the mate at the time being too drunk to take the measures necessary to save the ship. She was totally lost, drowning eighty-six men and all the horses. Safety lines were projected from shore by means of rockets, but the helplessness of the officer in charge rendered them of no avail.

Gov. Bigler, of Pennsylvania, has recalled the requisition for the arrest of Richard Neel from the Governor of Maryland, for enticing away his own wife and children from the service of their master, Capt. Mayo, of Anne Arundel County. The case is a singular one. Neel, when free, worked Mayo's farm for several years, and subsequently tried to bring his wife and children away, but they were recaptured, and Neel escaped. Mayo sold the family for punishment, and Neel went South and bought them with his own money. The alledged enticing away antedates the purchase of his own flesh and blood by Neel!

There are in Cincinnati 175 persons and companies that pay an annual tax of between five and ten thousand dollars; 54 who pay between one and two thousand; 15 who pay between two and three thousand; 7 who pay between three and four thousand; 1 who pays between four and five thousand; and two who pay between five and six thousand. Nicholas Longworth pays a tax of $10,177 39.

The Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company have published their annual report of its affairs for the year ending 31st December, 1852. The road was opened to Janesville on the 3d Jan., by a branch road from Milton, eight miles long, contracted under the charter of the Southern Wisconsin Railroad Company. The main road is finished from Milwaukee to Milton, 62 miles long.

M. Francisco Lisboa, second son of the Minister of Brazil, at Paris, who had for the last four years served as Midshipman in the Royal Navy of England, lately met with his death at Madras in a most tragical manner. He was shot by the discharge of a gun, which went off accidentally in the hands of his comrad and friend Prince Ernest of Linange, nephew of the Queen of England.

On Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 26th, as the mail train, consisting of three cars, on the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad, was passing New Brighton Bridge, an axle of the middle car broke, and the car was precipitated down an embankment a distance of 40 feet. The other cars passed on. Several of the passengers in the middle car were badly injured, but none killed.

Mr. James Beck, the well-known merchant of Broadway, died on Monday morning, Jan. 24, after a short illness. His disease was inflammation of the bowels. Mr. B. had for several years been one of the "Dry Goods Princes" of the City, and had an immense trade, principally from the fashionable faubourgs. He was about 35 years of age.

In the Supreme Court, Judge McLean delivered an opinion in the case of the Trustees of Vincennes University vs. the State of Indiana, reversing the decree of the Supreme Court, and securing to the University two townships of land which were in dispute, a portion of which the State had appropriated to its own uses. Justices Taney and Daniels dissented.

The statement of the New Jersey Free Banks presents the following aggregate: Banks, 19; securities, $785,120. Notes issued prior to Jan. 1, 1852, $916,311; ditto during 1852, $598,038. Redeemed prior to Jan. 1, 1852, $1,149,209; ditto in 1852, $598,398. Circulation, $766,742.

In the criminal Court of Lancaster County, Pa., recently, a man named John Anderson was tried and convicted for kidnapping another colored man named John McKinney, of Maytown, on the 19th of November last. The sentence has not yet been pronounced, as a motion for a new trial is pending.

The quantity of wheat raised in Canada West, in the year 1852, as we learn from the North American, was 12,692,852 bushels, valued at $9,519,639. The cultivated land of the Province for the same time amounted to 3,697,724 acres. The amount devoted to the production of wheat was 782,115, showing a yield of about 16¼ bushels to the acre.

It is estimated by De Bow, that the trade of Japan with this country, if she opens her ports, will be worth $200,000,000 annually. This is more than the entire value of the annual exports of the United States to Great Britain. The population is put at fifty millions.

We see by the Buffalo Courier, that it is in contemplation to found an Agricultural Department for the University of Buffalo. The thought is to endow seven Professorships through Scholarships at $150 each.

At midnight on Tuesday, Jan. 26th, the steamer Edward Howard, bound for Nashville, came in collision, near Bonnet Carrie Church, with the Swallow, from Cincinnati. The latter was immediately sunk, and would probably prove a total loss. One negro man was drowned.

Reese's Medical Gazette says, "In case of any burn or scald, however extensive, all the acute suffering of the patient may be at once and permanently relieved, and that in a moment, by sprinkling over the surface a thick layer of wheat flour."

The fare from New York to Albany, over the Harlem Railroad, has been reduced to one dollar, only two-thirds of a cent per mile. The Dépôt for through passengers has also been changed to the new building corner of Center and White-sts.

Gov. Herbert, of Louisiana, was inaugurated on the 20th ult., at his own plantation, in the presence of a Committee of the Legislature, he being too ill to go to Baton Rogue—something new in the political world.

On Monday afternoon, Jan. 24, a sloop engaged in freighting sand from Duck Bar, at the eastern extremity of Barren Island, to New York, was capsized while crossing a sand bar in Rockaway Inlet, and the Captain, Adam Stilwell, and two seamen, were drowned.

The number of meeting-houses of the Friend (Quakers) in 21 of our principal States and the District of Columbia, is 715, and the aggregate accommodation is stated at 283,923 seats.

The Postmaster-General publishes an official notice ordering that on all letters to and from France through England, the single rate of United States postage be 21 cents, and on newspapers 4 cents; such postage to be collected in and retained by the United States.

The bridges on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, between Cumberland and Wheeling, number one hundred and fourteen. One of them is 600 feet long, and is elevated 40 feet above the Monongahela River, which it spans.

The Whig Legislative Caucus, at Boston, nominated Hon. Edward Everett as candidate for the office of U. S. Senator to succeed Gov. Davis.

The Woonsocket Patriot acknowledges the reception of some apples which have the peculiarity of being very sweet on one side and wholly sour on the other.

A sign over the door of a house of entertainment in California read thus: "Rest for the weary, and storage for trunks;" a most attractive and inviting announcement, truly.

The Ashtabula (O.) Telegraph announces that it is to be suspended, for the reason that it has too many long winded subscribers, while its creditors are like hungry wolves.

Stephen Spaulding, one of the veterans which composed Washington's life guard, died on the 30th ult., at Monroe, Me., aged ~~ninety~~ seven years.

It is understood that the late Amos Lawrence left $35,000 to Mrs. Pierce, wife of the President elect. She is a relation of the family.

The Logansport (Ind.) Journal says that lead ore of remarkable purity has recently been found in the neighborhood of that place.

By the arrival of the Isabel at Charleston we learn that the small pox had disappeared at Havana.

MARRIED,

Jan. 25th, by Rev. A. H. Taylor, Mr. Percival F. Davis, of Walworth, Wis., to Miss Harriet L. Nash, of Norwich, Conn.

At Walworth, Wis., Dec. 26th, 1852, by Eld. O. P. Hull, Mr. Lucian L. Covey to Miss Phebe Sherburn.

In Verona, N. Y., January 20th, by Eld. C. Chester, Mr. Edwin C. Satterlee to Miss Catherine E. Coppeinoll, all of Verona.

DIED,

In Verona, N. Y., of inflammation on the brain, an infant son of Orrin P. and Rhoda A. Williams, aged 3 months.

January 19th, of consumption, Calista M. Sherman, daughter of Dea. Hiram and Saloma Sherman, aged 20 years. The subject of this notice obtained a hope in the Saviour when about eleven years old, and united with the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Verona; and she adorned her profession with a Christian character. During her protracted illness, she bore her suffering with Christian patience and fortitude; and when death laid his cold hand upon her emaciated frame, her countenance brightened, and a smile hung upon her lips; she called her friends around her, and took her leave of them, and said, This is a good time. She then closed her eyes, and in a few moments her spirit took its flight to the spirit land, without a struggle or a groan. On the following Sabbath her remains were removed to the meeting-house, where a large congregation assembled and listened to a discourse from the last five verses of the fourth chapter of 1st Thessalonians.

C. C.

On the 23d of January, at his residence at Marlboro, N. J., of consumption, John Ayars, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. He was the first that united with the church in Marlboro after it was organized, and for more than forty years has, amid many trying providences, maintained his profession. Funeral on the 25th; sermon by Eld. D. Clawson from the following words, "But now he is comforted." Luke 16: 25.

At Elgin, Kane Co., Ill., Nov. 28, 1851, of scrofula consumption, Meranda, daughter of Varnum M. and Melissa Burdick. In her illness she found peace in believing in Jesus, and hope anchored her soul in heaven.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Just Published.

THE DEMOCRACY OF CHRISTIANITY, or an Analysis of the Bible and its Doctrines, in their relation to the principle of democracy. By Wm. Goodell. Cady and Burgess, New York. Sold also by William Harned, 48 Beekman-street, New York. The first volume is occupied with an examination of the Old Testament; the second volume carries the investigation into the New, shows the bearing of the leading doctrines of the Gospel upon the principle of democracy, examines the institutions of the New Testament, traces the progress and the influence of Christianity in promoting human liberty, to the present time, and, in the light of Scripture prophecy, as illustrated by the signs of the times, unfolds the future prospects of humanity. The work is designed to promote liberty, both in the Church and the State, and to show that the cause of human freedom is identified with the Christian religion.

Price $1 50 at retail, $12 per dozen, or $90 per hundred.

SLAVERY AND ANTI-SLAVERY: A History of the Great Struggle in Both Hemispheres; with a View of the Slavery Question in the United States. By William Goodell, author of "The Democracy of Christianity."

This work is designed to embody a great amount of historical information in a single volume, conveniently arranged for reference. It contains fifty chapters on as many distinct topics, embracing the most important facts in the political and ecclesiastical history of the contest, together with an account of the Anti-Slavery agitation in England and the United States up to the present time; the divisions among American Abolitionists, and the various measures advocated among them; and closing with a brief discussion of the question, "What ought to be done?" The book is an abstract of several volumes, besides the Anti-Slavery history of the last twenty years, a great part of which has never before been collected into any volume, but lies scattered in the newspapers of that period. The Table of Contents and a copious Alphabetical Index will facilitate a reference to particular facts, and to dates when desirable.

It is a large royal 12mo. volume, of about six hundred pages, well printed, on handsome paper, neatly bound in cloth, and lettered. Price one dollar per copy, at retail; $9 per dozen, or $65 per hundred, to booksellers and book-pedlars, for cash.

The postage on a single copy will be 30 cents to any part of the United States, and must be prepaid.

For sale by the publisher, William Harned, 48 Beekman-street, New York.

Miscellaneous.

Kidnapping Case—Narrative of Solomon Northrop.

From the New York Daily Times.

Solomon Northrop, the subject of the following narrative, is a free colored citizen of the United States; was born in Essex County, New York, about the year 1808; became early a resident of Washington County, and married there in 1829. His father and mother resided in the County of Washington about 50 years, till their decease, and were both free. With his wife and children he resided at Saratoga Springs in the winter of 1841, and while there was employed by two gentlemen to drive a team South, at the rate of a dollar a day. In fulfillment of his employment he proceeded to New York, and having taken out free papers, to show that he was a citizen, he went on to Washington City, where he arrived the second day of April, the same year, and put up at Gadsby's Hotel. Soon after he arrived, he felt unwell, and went to bed.

While suffering with severe pain, some persons came in, and, seeing the condition he was in, proposed to give him some medicine, and did so. That is the last thing of which he has any recollection until he found himself chained to the floor of Williams's slave-pen in that city, and handcuffed. In the course of a few hours, Jas. H. Burch, a slave-dealer, came in, and the colored man asked him to take the irons off from him, and wanted to know why they were put on. Burch told him it was none of his business. The colored man said he was free, and told where he was born. Burch called in a man by the name of Ebenezer Rodbury, and the two stripped the man and laid him across a bench, Rodbury holding him down by his wrists. Burch whipped him with a paddle until he broke that, and then with a cat o'nine tails, giving him a hundred lashes, and he swore he would kill him if he ever stated to any one that he was a free man. From that time forward the man says he did not communicate the fact from fear, either that he was a free man, or what his name was, until the last summer.

He was kept in the slave pen about ten days, when he, with others, was taken out of the pen in the night by Burch, handcuffed and shackled, and taken down the river by a steamboat, and then to Richmond, where he, with forty-eight others, was put on board the brig Orleans. There Burch left them. The brig sailed for New Orleans, and on arriving there, before she was fastened to the wharf, Theophilus Freeman, another slave-dealer, belonging in the City of New Orleans, and who, in 1838, had been a partner with Burch in the slave trade, came to the wharf and received the slaves as they landed, under his direction. This man was immediately taken by Freeman and shut up in his pen in that city. He was taken sick with the small-pox immediately after getting there, and was sent to a hospital, where he lay two or three weeks. When he had sufficiently recovered to leave the hospital, Freeman declined to sell him to any person in that vicinity, and sold him to a Mr. Ford, who resided in Rapides parish, in Louisiana, where he was taken and lived a little more than a year, and worked as a carpenter, working with Ford at that business.

Ford became involved and had to sell him. A Mr. Tibaut became the purchaser. He in a short time sold him to Edwin Eppes, in Bayou Beouf, about one hundred and thirty miles from the mouth of Red River, where Eppes has retained him on a cotton plantation since the year 1843.

To go back a step in the narrative, the man wrote a letter in June, 1841, to Henry B. Northrop, of the State of New York, dated and post-marked at New Orleans, stating that he had been kidnapped and was on board a vessel, but was unable to state what his destination was; but requesting Mr. N. to aid him in recovering his freedom if possible. Mr. N. was unable to do anything in his behalf in consequence of not knowing where he had gone, and not being able to find any trace of him. His place of residence remained unknown until the month of September last, when the following letter was received by his friends:

Bayou Beouf, August, 1852.

Mr. Wm. Pray or Mr. Lewis Parker:

Gentlemen: It having been a long time since I have seen or heard from you, and not knowing that you are living, it is with uncertainty that I write to you; but the necessity of the case must be my excuse. Having been born free just across the river from you, I am certain you must know me; and I am here now a slave. I wish you to obtain free papers for me, and forward them to me at Marksville, La., Parish of Avoyelles, and oblige,

Yours, Solomon Northrop.

On receiving the above letter, Mr. N. applied to Gov. Hunt, of New York, for such authority as was necessary for him to proceed to Louisiana, as an agent, to procure the liberation of Solomon. Proof of his freedom was furnished to Gov. Hunt, by affidavits of several gentlemen, Gen. Clarke among others. Accordingly, in pursuance of the laws of New York, Henry B. Northrop was constituted an agent to take such steps, by procuring evidence, retaining counsel, &c., as were necessary to secure the freedom of Solomon, and to execute all the duties of his agency. He left Sandy Hill, in New York, on the 14th of December last, and came to the City of Washington, and stated the facts of the case to Hon. Pierre Soule, of Louisiana; Hon. Mr. Conrad, Secretary of War, from New Orleans, and Judge Nelson, of the Supreme Court of the United States, and other gentlemen. They furnished Mr. N. with strong letters to gentlemen residing in Louisiana, urging their assistance in accomplishing the object of restoring the man to freedom.

From Washington, Mr. N. went, by the way of Pittsburgh and the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, to the mouth of the Red River, and thence up that river to Marksville, in the parish of Avoyelles, where he employed Hon. John P. Waddill, an eminent lawyer of that place, and consulted with him as to the best means of finding and obtaining possession of the man. He soon ascertained there was no such man at Marksville nor in that vicinity. Bayou Beouf, the place where the letter was dated, was twenty-three miles distant, at its nearest point, and is seventy miles in length. For reasons which it is unnecessary to give, the very providential manner in which the residence of the man was ascertained cannot now be given, although the circumstances would add much to the interest of the narrative. But he was found without great difficulty, and legal proceedings commenced. A process was placed in the hands of a Sheriff, directing him to proceed to Bayou Beouf, and take the colored man into his possession, and wait the order of the Court in regard to his right to freedom. The next day, the owner, with his counsel, came to Marksville, and called upon Mr. N., who exhibited to them the commission which he had received from the Governor of New York, and the evidence in his posession relating to the man's being a free citizen of New York.

Eppes' counsel, after examining it, stated to his client that the evidence was ample and satisfactory; that it was perfectly useless to litigate the question further, and advised him by all means to deliver the colored man up, in order that he might be carried back to the State of New York, in pursuance of the Governor's requisition. An article was drawn up between the claimant and Mr. Northrop, the counsel for the colored man, and recorded in accordance with the laws of the place, showing that the colored man was free. Having settled everything satisfactorily, the agent and the rescued man started for New Orleans on the 4th of January, and on arriving there traced the titles of the colored man from Tibaut to Eppes, from Lord to Tibaut, and from Freeman to Ford—all the titles being recorded in the proper books kept for that purpose.

It is but justice to say that the authorities of Avoyelles, and indeed at New Orleans, rendered all the assistance in their power to secure the establishment of the freedom of this unfortunate man, who had been snatched so villainously from the land of freedom, and compelled to undergo sufferings almost inconceivable in this land of heathenism, where slavery exists with features more revolting than those described in "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

Having traced the titles back as far as possible in New Orleans, the party then proceeded to the City of Washington, where Burch lived; and, on making inquiry, found who was the keeper of the slave-pen in that city in 1841; and also ascertained from the keeper, upon the colored man (Solomon N.) being pointed out to him, that he was placed in that pen in the spring of 1841, and there kept for a short period by Burch.

Immediately upon the receipt of this information, complaint was made before the police of Washington against Burch, for kidnapping and selling into slavery this free colored man. The warrant for his arrest was issued on the 17th January by Justice Goddard, and returned before Justice Mansell. Burch was arrested and held to bail in the sum of $3,000, Shekels, a slave-trader of seventeen years standing, going his bail.

On the 18th Jan., at 10 o'clock both parties appeared before the magistrate. Senator Chase, from Ohio, Gen. Clark and Henry B. Northrop, being counsel for the plaintiff, and I. H. Bradley, for the defendant. Gen. Clark and E. H. Northrop, were sworn as witnesses on the part of the prosecution, and established the foregoing facts. On the part of the defendant, Benjamin Shekels and B. A. Thorn were sworn. The prosecution offered the colored man who had been kidnapped, as a witness on the part of the prosecution, but it was objected to, and the Court decided that it was inadmissable. The evidence of this colored man was absolutely necessary to prove some facts on the part of the prosecution, as he alone was cognizant of them.

Mr. Shekels, who had been, as before stated, a salve-trader in the City of Washington seventeen years, testified that some ten or twelve years ago he was keeping a public house in that city; that Burch boarded at the house and carried on the business of buying and selling slaves; that in that year, two white men came into his bar-room and stated that they had a slave for slave. Mr. Burch immediately entered into a negotiation for his purchase. The white men stated that they were from Georgia; had brought the negro with them from that State, and wished to sell him to be carried back to that State; that the negro expressed a willingness to be sold in order to return to Georgia; Shekels, however, was unable to state the names of either of the white men, or the name of the colored man; was unacquainted with either of them previous to that time, and had never seen either since that transaction; that he saw them execute a bill of sale to Burch, saw Burch pay him $625 and take the bill of sale, and that he read that bill, but could not tell who was the vender nor who was the person sold, as appeared by the bill of sale.

Mr. Thorn was next called upon the stand, and testified that he was in this tavern in the Spring of the year 1841, and saw a white man negotiating a trade with Burch for a colored man; but whether this was the colored man or not, he could not tell—for he never saw either white man or colored man but that once, and did not know whether or not Burch bought and paid for him.

Burch himself was next offered as a witness in his own behalf, to prove the loss of the bill of sale. His evidence was objected to by the prosecution, but was allowed by the Court. He testified that he had the bill of sale and lost it, and did not know what had become of it. The Counsel for the prosecution requested the Court to send a Police officer to bring the books of Burch, containing his bills of sale of negroes for year 1841 and previous years. They were fortunately procured, but no bill of sale was found of this colored man by any name. Upon this positive evidence that the man had been in the possession of Burch, and that he had been in Slavery for a period of more than eleven years, the Court decided that the testimony of the slave-trader established the fact that Burch came honestly by him, and consequently discharged the defendant.

The counsel for the defendant had drawn up, before the defendant was discharged, an affidavit signed by Burch, and had a warrant out against the colored man, for a conspiracy with the two white men before referred to, to defraud Burch out of $625. The warrant was served, and the colored man arrested and brought before Officer Goddard. Burch and his witnesses appeared in Court, and H. B. Northrop appeared as counsel for the colored man, stating that he was ready to proceed as counsel on the part of the defendant, and asking no delay whatever. Burch, after consulting privately for a short time with Shekels, stated to the Magistrate that he wished him to dismiss the complaint, as he would not proceed further with it. Defendant's counsel stated to the Magistrate that, if the complaint was withdrawn, it must be withdrawn without the request or consent of the defendant. Burch then asked the Magistrate to let him have the complaint and the warrant, and he took them. The counsel for the defendant objected to his receiving them, and insisted that they should remain as a part of the records of the Court, and that the Court should indorse the proceedings which had been under the process. Burch delivered them up, and the Court rendered a judgment of discontinuance by the request of the prosecutor, and filed it in his office.

The condition of this colored man during the nine years that he was in the hands of Eppes, was of a character nearly approaching that described by Mrs. Stowe as the condition of "Uncle Tom" while in that region. During that whole period his hut contained neither a floor, nor a chair, nor a bed, nor a mattrass, nor any thing for him to lie upon except a board about twelve inches wide, with a block of wood for his pillow, and with a single blanket to cover him, while the walls of his hut did not by any means protect him from the inclemency of the weather. He was sometimes compelled to perform acts revolting to humanity, and outrageous in the highest degree. On one occasion, a colored girl belonging to Eppes, about 17 years of age, went one Sunday without the permission of her master, to the nearest plantation, about half a mile distant, to visit another colored girl of her acquaintance. She returned in the course of two or three hours, and for that offense she was called up for punishment, which Solomon was required to inflict.

Eppes compelled him to drive four stakes into the ground, at such distances that the hands and ankles of the girl might be tied to them, as she lay with her face upon the ground; and thus having fastened her down he compelled him, while standing by himself, to inflict one hundred lashes upon her bare flesh, she being stripped naked. Having inflicted the hundred blows, Solomon refused to proceed any further. Eppes tried to compel him to go on, but he absolutely set him at defiance, and refused to murder the girl. Eppes then seized the whip and applied it until he was too weary to continue it. Blood flowed from her neck to her feet, and in this condition she was compelled the next day to go into the field to work as a field hand. She bears the marks still upon her body, although the punishment was inflicted four years ago.

When Solomon was about to leave, under the care of Mr. Northrop, this girl came from behind her hut, unseen by her master, and throwing her arms around the neck of Solomon, congratulated him on his escape from slavery and his return to his family, at the same time in language of despair exclaiming, "But, oh, God! what will become of me?"

These statements regarding the condition of Solomon while with Eppes, and the punishment and brutal treatment of the colored girl, are taken from Solomon himself. It has been stated that the nearest plantation was distant from Eppes a half mile, and of course there could be no interference on the part of neighbors in any punishment however cruel, or however well disposed to interfere they might be.

By the laws of Louisiana no man can be punished there for having sold Solomon into slavery wrongfully, because more than two years had elapsed since he was sold; and no recovery can be had for his services, because he was bought without the knowledge that he was a free citizen.

A Rising District.

The Allegany River rises partly in the Counties of Allegany, Cattaraugus and Chautauque, N. Y., and partly in Erie, Crawford, Warren, Potter and Union Counties, Pennsylvania, running a devious South-Westerly course to Pittsburgh, where it unites with the Monongahela, from the South-West, to form the noble Ohio. Small steamboats ascend the Allegany in high stages of water as far as Franklin, the shire-town of Venango County, and have ascended to Warren, the shire-town of Warren County, some ten miles south of the Chautauque County line. Practically, however, the Allegany is navigable only for the immense rafts of lumber which have for many years descended it during its fuller stages, and for the arks or rude boats wherein Pig Iron is floated down to Pittsburgh. The small steamboats already mentioned are only familiar to its lower half, and are of no great practical account.

The Allegany Valley is perhaps 150 miles long, by an average of 100 in breadth. Its eastern edge is ragged and mountainous, and most of the remainder is diversified by high hills and steep ravines, but its soil is generally fertile and much of it still covered by a heavy growth of primitive forest, whence the Pine has mainly been cut out, sawed up, and rafted away. The whole Valley has till recently been difficult of access, and is still thinly peopled. It would support many times its present population by Agriculture alone.

But it is not destined to thrive mainly by Agriculture. The upper part of it is best adapted to Grazing, though it produces Grain very fairly, and will do still better at it when the last Pine shall have been cut, sawed, and rafted away. But the soil of this Valley is rich in Coal and Iron; the former bituminous, the latter easily mined and smelted. The impediments to transportation have hitherto been so great as to limit the Iron business, especially during the low prices of the last two or three years; but the new prospects for Iron and the new channels of intercommunication have opened a brighter day for this hitherto secluded region.

The first impulse to the Allegany Valley, since the development of Iron-making at Pittsburgh, was given by the construction of the Erie Railroad. This traverses the upper portion of the Valley, just north of the State line, for some sixty or seventy miles, bending Northward from Olean to strike Lake Erie at Dunkirk. Olean is a smart lumbering village, near the head of the North line, so far as ascertained, of the Allegany Coal basin, but it is highly probable that further explorations and discoveries will carry both Iron and Coal considerably further North than they have yet been found.

'It never rains but it pours.' The first Railroad piercing the Allegany Valley was only effected through great exertion, perseverance and sacrifices on the part of its projectors and friends; but this is destined to be rapidly followed by others. A Railroad from Cleveland to Pittsburgh has been some months in operation, and will soon be part of an unbroken line from Cincinnati to Philadelphia; while the Sunbury Railroad, stretching from Philadelphia to Erie, will soon traverse the Allegany Valley diagonally through two-thirds of its extent. Then Pittsburgh and Rochester have resolved on a connection by Railroad through the whole length of the Allegany and Genesee Valleys. And, beside these, a strong Ohio and local influence is now at work to construct a Railroad of six-feet guage due West from the bend of the Erie at Olean, by Jamestown, N. Y., Meadville, Pa., Warren, Ohio, &c., to form part of a great East and West line from New York to St. Louis and ultimately to San Francisco. We are assured that this line, like the others above recited, is destined not only to a certain but to a prompt construction.

When these lines shall have been completed, the Allegany Valley, no longer secluded, will be practically the heart of the Free States, rapidly becoming the focus of its Mineral and Manufacturing industry. No longer dependent on the capricious navigation of its rivers, it will be within a day's ride of New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Buffalo, &c., with inexhaustable beds of Iron and Coal, its villages will rapidly expand into cities, and its forests be transformed into fruitful fields and gardens. Olean may very probably become another Rochester, while Warren, Franklin, &c., will rapidly double and quadruble their population. We shall be disappointed if the Allegany Valley does not more than double its population during the decennial period between 1850 and 1860, and more than quadruple it between 1860 and 1870. If Great Britain will but allow us to make a fair proportion of the Iron we consume—as she now seems likely to do—or if Congress will only put our Iron Industry out of her reach—that Valley may very probably have Three Millions of inhabitants before the close of the present century. Fight with a Jaguar, or American Tiger.

A correspondent of the Galveston News gives the following account of a desperate fight between Mr. Absolem Williams, who is about seventy years of age, his wife, and an enormous tiger, which occurred about the 1st of December, at Mr. W.'s residence:—

The tiger was first discovered on the premises of Mr. James Drake, who lives in the north portion of Jefferson County, where it entered his enclosure, attacked his horses, and killed one, besides wounding two others. While the tiger was committing its depredations, it was discovered by Francis Drake, son of the proprietor of the premises, who fired a shot-gun at it, wounding it in the side, but not dangerously, when it made its escape. The next day, while Mr. and Mrs. Williams were sitting in their house, (the rest of the family being absent,) they were startled by a strange noise in the yard, in front of their house. Mr. W., on going out, discovered his dog engaged with a tiger, when he seized an ox-yoke and aimed a blow at the "varmint," but, missing it, struck his dog. The dog then got away from the tiger and retreated. In an instant the tiger sprung on Mr. Williams, and, seizing him by the hand, jerked him about twenty feet. The old gentleman, finding himself in the too powerful grasp of the wild animal, courageously determined to give it the best "rough and tumble fight" in his power, and, having no weapons within reach, he seized the tiger by the throat with his other hand, and, throwing his whole strength forward, crushed the tiger to the ground, both falling side by side. At this time Mrs. Williams came to the rescue, with a gun, which she snapped at the tiger, but there being no priming in the pan, it did not go off. Mr. W. then, with one arm round the tiger's body, and grasping its throat with his other hand, by an effort, disengaged himself. The tiger, discovering a new adversary in the person of Mrs. W., jumped at her, and attempted to grasp her head within its jaws, while it struck and lacerated her breast with its fore paws. She tried to avoid the monster, but was felled to the ground. The tiger made another grasp at her head, his upper teeth penetrating at the top of the skull and sliding along the bone, peeled off the skin till they met the lower teeth, which penetrated on the right side of her face.

In the meantime, Mr. W. had seized the ox-yoke again, and, giving the tiger a tremendous blow, caused it to leave Mrs. W., when it leaped into the house and got under the bed. The door was immediately closed and the monster secured. Mr. W. was exhausted from the effects of his wounds, from which the blood flowed in streams; but not so his better half. When she saw their mutual foe thus attempt to take possession of their house, she determined to finish the battle, and, notwithstanding the severity of her wounds, her dress almost entirely torn from her person, and covered with blood, she deliberately took the gun, and, shaking some powder from the barrel into the pan, placed the muzzle between one of the openings which the logs of the house afforded, and fired with steady and deadly aim. The tiger was killed. When subsequently measured, it was found to be twelve feet from the tip of its tail to its nose.

Interesting Statistics.

We cut the folllowing synopsis of the Report on Births, Marriages and Deaths in Massachusetts from The Boston Atlas:—

It appears from the tenth annual report of the births, marriages, and deaths in this Commonwealth, just made to the Legislature, that the number of births during the year was 28,861, and of marriages 11,966. The number of deaths was 18,934. During the three years past, the annual average of births, marriages, and deaths to the population, was respectively one birth in 36, one marriage in 102, and one death in 58. During the same period, the proportion of males to females has been 106 of the former to 100 of the latter. According to the last centennial census, there were in Boston 22,143 children of native, and 12,132 of foreign parentage. Of the births and marriages in Boston during the past three years, the foreign are nearly two to one over the native. During the year, eight females of fourteen, and about forty of fifteen years, have become wives. The youngest couple were each sixteen only. In Boston, one male of nineteen married a female of twenty-eight, and in Worcester County a lad of seventeen married a female invalid, who has been unable to stand for a number of years, aged thirty-eight. Fourth, fifth and sixth marriages are to be found on the records. One man of thirty-eight married for the fifth time, and in Boston a negro of fifty-eight committed the same absurdity for the sixth time. The oldest person noticed among the returns of marriages during the year was a male of seventy-two years, who was united to a female under thirty.

Next to Zymotic diseases, (epidemic, endemic and contagious,) consumption is the great destroyer. It has removed from the citizens of Massachusetts more than ten persons every day during the last three years. In 1851, typhus fever produced about 4½ per cent. of the whole number of deaths, diseases of the nervous system over 10½, those of the circulative organs nearly 2½, and old age about 5. Deaths by violence, including accidents and drowning, constituted about 4 per cent. Agriculturists stand the best chance for long life, their average standing being twelve years above the general average, nearly nineteen above that of those returned as laborers, and eighteen per cent. above the average of mechanics. Blacksmiths, carpenters, and shoe makers, are represented in the abstract by the largest numbers. A fraction over forty-two years is the average of the last of these. Starting at the commencement of the 21st year of life, then, these useful artisans have the prospect of living only about 23 years, while the farmer has the prospect of 44 years before him—a difference of nearly one half.

Sardines.

A Paris letter gives the following curious information in regard to the delicious little fish—the sardine:—

How many sardines do you suppose have been taken this year upon the coast of Brittany, two hundred miles long? Five hundred and seventy-six millions. Half of them are to be preserved and sold fresh, and half are to be put down in oil. One hundred and sixty vessels, manned by five thousand five hundred sailors and fishermen, are engaged in the trade. The preparation, transport, and sale of the fish employ ten thousand persons. Nine thousand of these are occupied all winter in the making and mending of nets. The fishing lasts two hundred days, and yields a net profit to all concerned of three millions francs. The sardines disappear in November and return in April. Where they go during these four months, why they go, or what they do while gone, has never been discovered. The fishermen say that the same individuals never come twice; that every successive arrival is composed of fish much smaller than those that last left, and that they appear to be their young. At any rate they count implicitly on their appearance; and no sardine was ever known yet to break an engagement thus tacitly entered into.

Change of Color in Fish.—The change of color in fish is very remarkable, and takes place with great rapidity. Put a living black burn trout into a white basin of water, and it becomes, within half an hour, of a light color. Keep him living in a white jar for some days, and it becomes absolutely white; but put it into a dark colored or black vessel, and although on first being placed there the white colored fish shows most conspicuously on the back ground, in a quarter of an hour it becomes as dark colored as the bottom of the jar, and consequently difficult to be seen. No doubt this facility of adapting its color to the bottom of the water in which it lives, is of the greatest service to the fish in protecting it from its numerous enemies. All anglers must have observed that in every stream the trout are very much of the same color as the gravel or sand on which they live; whether this change of color is a voluntary or involuntary act on the part of the fish, I leave it for the scientific to determine.

Mad Through Excessive Joy.—A writer describing the Lunatic Asylum at Blackwell's Island, says:—

Here is a woman whom joy has deprived of her senses. Her husband and child were on board a vessel which was wrecked. Going down to the shore every day, as if with the wish of being nearer the beloved objects that lay buried beneath the sea, suddenly she beheld them landing from a vessel which had picked them up and saved them. An overwhelming flood of joy pervaded her bosom—and then reason was gone forever. She never has known them since, but sits on what she thinks the same rock, where she used to bewail their fate, wringing her hands, and moaning most piteously—while every week the husband and son come and gaze on her face, in hope to rouse one gleam of memory—but in vain.

Rachel Parker and her Sister.—It will be remembered that more than a year since, a young colored woman named Mary Elizabeth Parker, was abducted from Chester County, Pa., and conveyed to Baltimore, where she was transported to New Orleans. A few days after, her sister, Rachel Parker, was also abducted in like manner, and taken to Baltimore, and detained there in consequence of the interference of her Chester County friends. In the first case, Mary Elizabeth was, by an arrangement with the individual who had her in charge, brought back to Baltimore, to await her trial on a petition for freedom. So also, with regard to Rachel. Both after trial—the proof in their favor being so overwhelming—were discharged, and are now among their friends in Chester Co.

A dispatch dated Binghampton, Saturday, Jan. 22, 1853, says: A train of thirty-nine cars of live stock passed this station last night, en route for New York, conveying six hundred head. An extra train also followed, with thirty cars, ten filled with live cattle and twenty with merchandise.

George Clency, a soldier of the Revolution, died near Germantown, Ohio, on Sunday, the 9th inst., at the advanced age of 108 years and 17 days, having been born on the 22d December, 1774. He received a small pension, but not sufficient to provide more than the mere necessaries of life, and died in indigent circumstances.

POPULAR AMUSEMENTS.

The winter is usually very prolific in amusements. Every village, and almost every town, must have its parties, cotillons, balls, or sprees, according to the taste and refinement of the place. And these are all "fashionable and popular," besides being schools for the cultivation of "refinement of manners." And it is even thought that they are not hostile to religion, and are really essential for social intercourse.

I propose to examine them in their bearing upon morality and religion. It will not be pretended, by the advocates of such parties, that they contain any of the elements of religion, or that they at all serve to cultivate religious feelings. Their religious character, if they have any, must be purely negative. A combination of negatives in religion never amount to an affirmative. Abstinence from profanity, theft, drunkenness, never amount to holiness, piety, and charity.

So it may be said that "civil parties" are not cultivators of goodness. But they are cultivators of something. They serve some purpose, or they would have no existence. Are they schools of morality? They do not propose the cultivation of morality. Their moral character, if they have any, must be purely negative, and it can only be plead that they are not immoral; and this plea must always be made before, and never after a party, as the observation of all men testifies. Negative morality is equivalent to immorality. In morals, as in religion, there is no middle ground. There is no word by which we could express a quality that lies between morality and immorality. The actions of a moral being are pure or impure. There can be no blending of truth and falsehood, so as to create from them a new quality. There are no false truths, or true falsehoods. Nor can there be a moral immorality. Nor can there be an act of a moral agent, that is neither good nor bad, right nor wrong, pure nor impure, justifiable nor unjustifiable. Popular amusements do not propose to cultivate morality; but they cultivate something.

Are they intellectual? There is nothing in them, as we have been informed, that requires an exercise of the reason, the understanding, the memory, or any power of the mind. It is not for the exercise or cultivation of the intellect that popular amusements have an existence. In the whirl of the dance, in the triple measure of the waltz, in the measured step of the "polka," there is no cultivation of the mind. Nor are they "intellectual treats." Analyze the dance, and what is it? A company of ladies and gentlemen, standing on a floor, take up one foot, and shake it, and put it down, and then take up the other foot, and skake it, and put that down, to the music of Cuffy in the corner drawing a horse-hair across a cat-gut. Those who do not like this analysis, may give a better if they have it.

The dance is neither a religious, moral, nor intellectual exercise. But it is some exercise. Is it innocent? The simple exercise of dancing is innocent. There is no harm in the abstract thing. There is no sin in the use of the letters "B-y G-o-d," abstractly; but there is sin in using them in their association. So there may be sin in that which is neither religious, moral, nor intellectual. It is something. If it is not good, it is bad. What it is may be learned from its own character, from the governing motive that prompts it, from the effects that follow. The dance, then, we call a social recreation. Perhaps this will suit its lovers. Of what does that social recreation consist. Not of moral, intellectual, or religious exercises, but of physical or animal exercises. It is for the gaiety of the scene, the exercise of the dance, the feast of the supper. All of these, merely to please the senses, to pander to a depraved appetite, to indulge in sensuality, and none of them to improve the mind, benefit others, or please God. And, to adopt a scriptural definition, we say that they are carnal amusements. And does not the observation of all witness, that those who delight in them "are carnal, sold under sin."

The accompaniments of the occasion are some of them always immoral or irreligious. They must of necessity be so. There is either profanity, drunkenness, lewdness, or fighting, connected with almost the whole of them. They are more common than uncommon. Hundreds of persons attribute their downfall and ruin to this cause. The bad, the lewd, the profane, the drunken, love them, and always attend them, and find there their greatest enjoyment. If dancing parties are not schools of vice, why do the vicious so love them? If they are not corrupters of morals, why do those most corrupt become their greatest patrons? Now we know that carnal exercises must of necessity minister to carnality, and dances are nothing better than carnal amusements. From them spring almost every variety of vice; and seldom, if ever, does one retire from them without contamination.

Dances are also opposed to religion. The dancing church-member does not love the mercy-seat, the altar of prayer. His voice is not heard in supplication with those who meet to ask the salvation of sinners. He has no religious joys to tell—no exhortations to the ungodly. He has no part nor lot in the matter of laboring for the salvation of sinners, or the purity of the church. How could he have? The dancing party and the prayer meeting are unlike in all their characteristics, and what is like one of them can not be like the other. And he who likes one of them, can not like the other. Thus is it seen, that dances are opposed to religion. Moreover, Satan has never shaped a delusion so artfully as this. It is his own bantling, bearing in its fruits the lineaments of its paternity, although so clothed by its name and its fascinations, as to deceive the simple, and beguile the lover of pleasure. As a last effort, when all others fail to hinder the work of religion and the salvation of souls, the great deceiver calls for the dance, or oyster party, with a private room for those who do not wish to dance. By this he knows full well that he can drive every religious feeling from those who attend. And the signs of seriousness that began to inspire hope with the lovers of religion, are all dissipated. The minister's soul sinks in sadness. He sees in the place of weeping eyes and throbbing bosoms, the stare of vacancy, and the sneer of disapprobation. Satan has triumphed, and souls are led captive by him at his will. Who, that has stood a watchman on the walls of Zion, has not often witnessed this game, and seen the utter prostration of his hopes?

Such parties afford the greatest diversion for the impenitent who may become serious. They have been known, many a time, to turn the scale with the serious, and leave them utterly hopeless. It is a most hopeless task to win to God and religion the lover of such popular amusements.

But it is said that churches encourage them, and church members engage in them, with their children. Fashionable churches do so—such as are courting the favor of the world, and in this thing are lowering down the sanctity of religion to the impiety of the world. But the churches of Jesus Christ do not do it. They who hold themselves bound to do all to the glory of God, whether they eat or drink, can not see how they can glorify God by exercises that have neither religion nor morality as constituent elements in them. Nor do persons in the enjoyment of religion delight in them. The whole arrangement is made so as to keep souls fast bound in sin. They are delusions of the evil deceiver; and the church, in consenting to them, prepares the way for satan to grasp as his prey whoever he will.

AGRICULTURAL LECTURES.

During last winter, Prof. Evans delivered a course of lectures on Practical and Scientific Farming, before the Agricultural Association connected with Union Academy, Shiloh, N. J. The instruction embodied in those lectures, seems to have been well appreciated by the farmers of this community, and beneficially applied, during the past season, in the cultivation of their soil. Desirous of more information, they have employed Prof. Evans to give another course of lectures on Agriculture this winter. The Introductory Lecture was given Jan. 22d.

The Lecturer commenced by remarking, that since last we met, "day and night, seed-time and harvest," have visited us with their wonted blessings. Trusting in the Divine promise of their return, you have sowed, and in due time reaped, with grateful acknowledgments, the abundant harvest. With religious faith, trusting in the promise of God, that "while the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, and day and day and night, shall not cease," you are eagerly seeking how you may best comply with the injunction to subdue the earth.

The farmer can realize, while he is hardening his hands by severe toil, facing the cold winds and the driving rain, and up-turning the "stubborn glebe," that he has a direct sanction from Deity "to till the ground" and labor "in the sweat of his brow." Thus he may experience a glow of honest pride when reflecting that his occupation, while the most ancient, has the approval of Heaven, and is ever attended, if judiciously pursued, with the blessings of sound health and manly strength. Who can withhold the meed of praise from the sun-burnt and honest countenance, the vigorous frame, and the noble pursuit of the farmer, the bone and sinew of our land, the yeomen of our country? The pampered gentry may sneer at his hardened hand and dusky toil, yet the tiller of the ground, with an upright heart and a conscious independence, may regard himself as elevated, in avocation, above the official sycophant, the monied spendthrift, or the conceited coxcomb. Agriculture is honorable. It is your duty as farmers, by the aid of science and literature, to exalt your profession, render it as much respected as its deserts demand, and occupy, yourselves, the vantage ground presented you by its nature and importance. Three-fourths of the human race are now engaged in it, directly or indirectly. A majority of the capital is invested in it. All are sustained by it.

Though so great a number are employed in cultivating the soil, yet only a small portion of the earth has been subdued, and that but partially. In proof of this, look at the immense wastes and uninhabited regions of nearly every country. We need not go far to find barrens, either never yet cultivated, or completely exhausted by constant cropping. To redeem or make productive this kind of soil, is among your best attainments. Yearly experiments have convinced us, that even our cultivated lands yield but a moiety of the produce of which they are susceptible, and which even with proportionate expense would reward more abundantly your labors. In view of these facts, we see great opportunities opened for enterprise and exertion. The energetic young man may here find ample scope for investing his money, and exercising the more laudable desires to improve "the mind and the soil," and benefit his fellow man.

But it may be asked, What do you mean by subduing the earth? It is that preparation of the soil, by which it is enabled to yield the greatest amount of produce possible. The consideration of this subject embraces the three substances—earth, air, and water. The earth is subdued by clearing away the trees, so as to permit the rays of the sun to shine upon and warm the soil; by eradicating all noxious weeds, so that the land may be exhausted by grains and grasses alone; and by pulverizing and enriching it in such a manner that every field shall produce the greatest income. The air is laid under contribution by preparing the soil and cultivating the plant to extract and retain its fertilizing gases; by protecting the land, animals, and ourselves, from its inclemency. Our lands, in a level country, are best shielded from the cold and boisterous winds by allowing rows of trees or bushes to grow along the sides of the fields, by which their force is broken, and the surface of the ground is not swept over by the cold air, extracting its heat. The relations of water to cultivation are included in the ditching and draining of our lands, so as to remove the surplus moisture from the soil; supplying deficiencies in the soil, so as to meet the demands of the plant and the necessities of our flocks; compelling it to drive our machinery, and rendering it in many ways subservient to our wishes. By this general view, it will be noticed that a few portions of the earth only are subdued. Some places in China are said to be so thoroughly cultivated, that no hurtful weeds ever spring up from the soil, and very small areas afford an income equal to that of our large farms.

The seasons of the year, commencing with Spring—

> "The Queen of the year. as she passed down the vale,

present many reflections embodying peculiar interest. Every school-boy is familiar with the beautiful allegories in which the seasons are likened to childhood, youth, manhood, and old age. Surely, no one more than the farmer is surrounded with emblems of Christian faith. As he commits his seed to the dark bosom of the earth, how forcibly is he reminded of the beautiful simile of the holy apostle, illustrative of death and the resurrection. How his faith and hope are yearly strengthened by the recurrence of seed-time and harvest; and as he looks abroad upon his whitened harvest field, his philanthropy is moved to contribute a part of his stores to the gathering in of the great harvest of souls.

Here the Lecturer alluded to the cause of the seasons of the year, the inclination of the earth's axis to the plane of its orbit, and enlarged upon the beneficial consequences arising from a succession of seasons. If the earth's axis were not thus inclined, the sun would always shine vertically upon the earth at the equator, and that region would continually be drenched by rain, hence made uninhabitable. Only two strips of land around the earth, on both sides of this region, would be at all inhabitable or capable of cultivation. The remaining portion of the earth would experience an endless winter.

SHILOH, N. J., Jan. 23, 1853.

FOLLIES OF GREAT MEN.

The Sublime History of Fools is a book which ought to be written, and which, we doubt not, would sell greatly. All great men have had their follies, and the field open for gleaning is almost boundless. For instance, we have such facts as the following recorded in biographies and histories: Tycho Brahe, the astronomer, changed color, and his legs shook under him, on meeting with a hare or a fox. Dr. Johnson would never enter a room with his left foot foremost; if, by mistake, it did get in first, he would step back and place his right foot foremost. Julius Cæsar was almost convulsed by the sound of thunder, and always wanted to get in a cellar, or under ground, to escape the dreadful noise. To Queen Elizabeth the simple word "death" was full of horrors. Even Talleyrand trembled and changed color, on hearing the word pronounced. Marshall Saxe, who met and overthrew opposing armies, fled and screamed in terror at the sight of a cat. Peter the Great could never be persuaded to cross a bridge; and though he tried to master the terror, he failed to do so. Whenever he set foot on one he would shriek out in distress and agony. Byron would never help any one to salt at the table, nor would he be helped himself. If any of the article happened to be spilled on the table, he would jump up and leave his meal unfinished. The story of the great Frenchman, Malebranche, is well known, and is well authenticated. He fancied he carried an enormous leg of mutton at the tip of his nose. No one could convince him to the contrary. One day a gentleman visiting him adopted this plan to cure him of his folly. He approached him with the intention of embracing him, when he suddenly exclaimed, "Ha! your leg of mutton has struck me in the face!" at which Malebranche expressed regret. The friend went on, "May I not remove the incumbrance with a razor?" "Ah, my friend! my friend! I owe you more than life. Yes, yes; by all means cut it off!" In a twinkling the friend lightly cut the tip of the philosopher's nose, and adroitly taking from under his cloak a superb leg of mutton, raised it in triumph. "Ah!" cried Malebranche, "I live! I breathe! I am saved! My nose is free; my head is free; but—but—it was raw, and that is cooked." "Truly; but then you have been seated near the fire—that must be the reason." Malebranche was satisfied, and from that time forward he made no more complaints about any mutton-leg, or any other monstrous protuberance, on his nose.

THE VALUE OF A GOOD NAME.—When quite a little fellow, Fowell Buxton was sent to Dr. Burney's school. Upon one occasion he was accused by one of the teachers of talking during school hours, for which he was about to be punished. When Dr. Burney came in, the boy appealed to him, and stoutly denied the charge. The teacher as stoutly maintained it; but Dr. Burney stopped him, saying, "I never found the boy telling a lie, and I will not disbelieve him now."

JERUSALEM.

Jerusalem! Jerusalem!
  Thou city of our God!
Long hast thou bowed in wretchedness,
  Beneath th' oppressor's rod.

A long night, sad and dreary,
  Hath shrouded thee in gloom;
And all thy glory and thy power
  Lie buried in the tomb.

Long have thy mourning children
  Been scattered o'er the earth;
Long hath been hushed the voice of joy,
  Unheard the song of mirth.

Wise men and holy prophets,
  Foretold thy fearful doom—
The poverty and wretchedness,
  Which fill thy streets with gloom.

And then, in strains of gladness,
  They struck the sounding lyre;
And echoed promises of good,
  Burning with holy fire.

And now the light is dawning
  Upon thy hills at last;
Oppression's long and dreary reign
  O'er thee, is almost past.

Arise! arise, O Zion!
  Put on thy robes of light,
For lo! the glory of our God
  Is beaming through the night.

Rise! in thy strength and beauty;
  Shake off thy gloomy fear;
Lift up thy voice in prayer and praise,
  For God the Lord is near.

Shout! for the day of gladness
  Is dawning on thy sight;
Sing! desolate and mourning one,
  Behold the morning light!

SHILOH, N. J., Jan., 1853.

DO WE EVER FORGET?

From the German of Seyguern.

One of the most startling and mysterious phenomena of our nature is the sudden revival of the recollection of scenes, events, and thoughts which had apparently been long forgotten. In many instances we can explain this by the law of association; but not unfrequently the recollection flashes without warning upon the mind. It is as though we had been gazing out into the blank darkness, which, lighted up all at once by a sudden flash, should become a theater upon which the minutest events of our past life are reenacted.

Phenomena of this kind, more or less distinctly marked, occur in the experience of every individual, in his ordinary and normal states. But here, as in so many other cases, great light is thrown upon the latent capabilities of the mind by its action when physical disease has induced changes in the conditions which regulate its manifestation. The bodily organs, in their healthy state, seem to act as checks and limitations upon the operations of the mind, somewhat as the balance-wheel of a watch checks and regulates the uncoiling of the spring. We do not know how rapidly the wheels may be impelled until this check is taken off. The balance-wheel makes the watch move in time; and it may be the limitations of the bodily organs only which compel the mind to act in reference to time. A disembodied spirit may have as little to do with time as with space. To all spirits, in their degree, as well as to the Supreme Spirit, one day may, in the most literal acceptation of the words, be as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day; so that in the future life we may continually live over again every portion of our past existence, not piecemeal and fragmentarily, but as an undivided whole; just as the eye takes in at a single glance the whole prospect before it, no matter though it be bounded only by the remotest distance from which the farthest ray of light has come which has been coasting earthward since creation.

Something of this sort has been remarked by those few who have so nearly overpassed the boundaries between the present and the future life, that they have won a glimpse into that "undiscovered country from whose bourne," the great dramatist assumes, falsely perhaps, "no traveler returns." De Quincey, the "English opium-eater," relates an incident of this kind of a friend who was once at the point of death by drowning. At the moment when she was on the verge of death, she saw her whole life, down to its most minute and apparently most trivial incident, arrayed before her, as in a mirror; and at the same time she felt within herself the sudden development of a faculty for comprehending the whole and every part. And he intimates that the possibility of this mighty development is confirmed by experiences of his own during that abnormal relation between his spiritual and physical nature which had been induced by the use of opium. Abercrombie relates the case of a boy who, at the age of four years, was rendered insensible by some violence, which fractured the skull. In this state he underwent the operation of trepanning. After his recovery he retained no recollection of the operation or of the accident which occasioned it. More than ten years after, he was seized with a violent fever, during which he became delirious. And now the faint traces made so long ago upon his consciousness—traces so faint that there was no reason to suspect their existence—were brought out under the fierce alchemy of disease with the utmost distinctness, and he related the whole occurrence with the utmost minuteness.

One of the most common phenomena in respect to old age is the reawakening of the dormant recollections of childhood. Many cases are on record of emigrants who have left our German fatherland, and have sought a new home in America, at so early an age as to have forgotten their native language; but when, often in the extremest age, they lay upon the bed of death, those long-forgotten words came back to their recollection, and their latest prayers were breathed in that language in which their cradle-hymns were sung. One of the most affecting and truthful delineations in modern fiction is that in the beautiful English novel, "Mary Barton," where the aged peasant woman, when just passing the boundaries of the better land, lives over again the days of her childhood.

Carsten Niebuhr, the Oriental traveler, father of our beloved historian and statesman, furnishes a striking example of the revived recollection of scenes and events long past. When old and blind, and so feeble that he had barely strength to be borne from his bed to his chair, the dim rememberances of his early adventures thronged before his memory with such vividness, that they painted themselves as pictures upon his sightless eyeballs. As he lay upon his bed, pictures of the gorgeous Orient flashed upon his darkness as distinctly as though he had just closed his eyes to shut them out for an instant. The cloudless blue of the Eastern heavens bending by day over the broad deserts, and studded by night with constellations, shone as vividly before him, after the lapse of half a century, as they did upon the first Chaldean shepherds whom they won to the worship of the hosts of heaven; and he discoursed with strange and thrilling eloquence upon those scenes which thus in the hours of stillness and darkness were reflected upon his inmost soul.

The case of Tennent, a well-known American clergyman of the last century, opens up many interesting trains of thought; but none more worthy of consideration than this of the sudden revival of recollection. He was attacked by a dangerous illness, occasioned, apparently, by severe and protracted study. One morning after his life had been despaired of, while conversing in Latin with his brother, he suddenly became insensible, and, to all appearance, dead. His funeral was appointed after the usual interval. But his physician, who was an intimate friend, refused to believe that he could be dead; which conviction was somewhat supported by the averment of one of the persons who assisted in laying out the body, that he thought he had perceived a slight warmth in the region of the heart. So earnest was the physician, that the funeral was postponed; the time was again appointed, and again and again the friend pleaded for a little delay—first an hour, then half an hour, then a quarter—but still no signs of life appeared, and it was determined that the ceremony should proceed. But just at the supreme moment, the sunken eyelids were raised for an instant, and a deep groan sounded from the livid lips, and the body became once more an apparent corpse. An hour passed away, and another groan was heard, and again the body sunk into apparent death. Another hour, and there was another groan, followed now by slight tokens of returning life. The feeble spark was carefully tended, and the patient was slowly restored to health. But it was soon apparent that his memory was a complete blank. The past was as entirely forgotten as though he had drunk of the waters of Lethe. One day, seeing his sister reading, he asked her what it was that she held in her hand. On being answered that it was the Bible, he rejoined, "What is the Bible? I do not know what you mean." In every respect, as far as acquired knowledge was concerned, he was a child again. Slowly and laboriously he recommenced his education, beginning at the simplest rudiments. He was one day reading an elementary Latin book with the brother with whom he was speaking in that language at the time of his apparent decease, when all at once he stopped as though he had received a sudden shock, and declared that the book seemed familiar to him. In a very short time the veil was wholly lifted, and his past acquirements and experience became once more portions of his conscious being. During all this time, as he uniformly asserted, he had the most intense and vivid recollection of all that transpired during those days of apparent, or, as he firmly believed, of real death. He dared not, he said, relate fully what he had witnessed in that spirit-land; but an account of it would be found among his papers after his decease. That event, however, took place during the disturbances of the war of the American Revolution, and these papers, by a series of singular accidents, were lost before falling into the hands of his executor, and so were never examined. But if his own testimony—the testimony of a man of unimpeached veracity, who for more than half a century thereafter maintained a character of remarkable soberness and circumspection—is to be relied upon, his soul passed from the body and entered the world of spirits, where he stood in the full presence of that ineffable glory upon which no man may look and live. Did he, in fact, pass those viewless portals which, we are told, deny all return? Was his recall to life a new birth from the dead? Who knows?

Whatever may be the bearings of this case of Tennent upon the subject of dreams and trances, or apparent death, it is certain that a forgetfulness apparently as absolute as can be conceived was in fact only apparent; that the light from his past existence was invisible only because obscured by the brighter light from the spirit-land; just as the faint stars are invisible when concealed by the obscuring daylight, and wait to be revealed when that shall be withdrawn. It is one of those numerous instances which go far towards warranting the belief that there is no such thing as absolute forgetfulness; that every impression made upon the mind is ineffaceable, every inscription incapable of obliteration. A veil may be drawn between the after-consciousness and the inscription; the characters may be filled up; but this veil is ready at any moment to be withdrawn, the filling up to fall away, when the characters will become as legible as when first traced.

There is another well-authenticated case, in some respects still more striking, showing as it does how slight may be the impressions made upon the mind, which shall yet prove ineffaceable. A poor servant-girl, in a German town, was attacked by a violent fever. She was unable to read or write; but during the paroxysms of her disease she became possessed—so the priests said—by a very polyglot devil. She would keep spouting forth in a loud and monotonous voice unconnected sentences of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. Sheet after sheet of these ravings were taken down; but those who attempted to find the elucidation of some deep mysteries in this Babel of unknown tongues, got their labor for their pains. At length her physician determined to trace out her antecedents. He succeeded in ascertaining that, many years before, while a mere child, she had been employed as a servant by a learned ecclesiastic, whose habit it was to pace up and down a passage in his house, communicating with the kitchen, and read aloud his favorite books. These scattered and unconnected phrases, caught in the intervals of her labor, were now reproduced by her, after an interval of many years. Passage after passage of the notes taken down from her feverish lips was identified among the old priest's favorite authors; so that not the least doubt remained as to the origin of the girl's "possession."

Coleridge, in speaking of this case, adds to it one of the weightiest comments ever uttered. "This instance," he says, "contributes to make it even probable that all thoughts are in themselves imperishable; and that if the intelligent faculty should be rendered more comprehensive," (and that this is probable, the instance cited above from the "Opium-eater" shows conclusively,) "it would require only a different and apportioned organization—the body celestial instead of the body terrestrial—to bring before every human soul the collective experience of his whole past existence. And this, perchance, is the dread Book of Judgment in whose mysterious hieroglyphics every idle, world is recorded. Yea, in the very nature of a living spirit it may be more possible that heaven and earth should pass away, than that a single act, a single thought, should be loosened or lost from that living chain of causes, to all whose links, conscious or unconscious, the free will, our only absolute self, is co-extensive and co-present."

It is no idle question, "Do we ever forget?"

ENGLISH CONGREGATIONS.

Rev. Dr. Kendrick, in a letter to the New York Recorder, states his impressions of English congregations, after having attended divine service at Liverpool, in the Independent and Baptist congregations, and subsequently at other places. He says:

Two or three things struck me on my first visit to an English house of worship, and subsequent observations have confirmed my impressions. In several respects, I am sorry to say, my comparisons were not favorable to my own country.

1. I was struck with the air of greater seriousness and solemnity than usually pervades an American audience.

2. The house had a more comfortable and cosy appearance, owing, I think, in part, to the fact that the pulpit is thrown forward somewhat towards the centre of the church, and the slips or pews are accommodated, both in length and position, to the convenience of the auditory.

3. Ladies coming into a slip partially occupied by gentlemen, quietly take the vacant seats, without requiring or expecting the gentlemen to rise.

4. The singing was strictly congregational; the tunes were simple; the organ merely aided the voice, without attracting any special attention to itself; and the whole assembly seemed to sing with the spirit and the understanding also. The pews were also more liberally supplied with Bibles and hymn books than is common with us.

5. Greater prominence was given than I think is usual with us to the devotional parts of the service. In several dissenting chapels which I have attended there have been two prayers and two readings of the Scriptures previous to the sermon.

6. At the close of the service, none seemed in a hurry to escape from the house. There was no seizing of hats, buttoning of coats, putting on of gloves, and opening of pew doors, during the utterance of the benediction. Whole families would remain for one, or two, or three minutes in their seats, without making a movement towards leaving, as if they loved to linger in the house of God. The effect was beautiful, and I would earnestly commend the example to my countrymen.

SORROW'S TEACHINGS.

"How is it," said I, despondingly, to Aunt Milly, "that you, who have been steeped to the lips in trouble, can be so cheerful?"

"Listen to me, Ellen. You know my first great sorrow, the loss of my husband. When the grave closed over him, the star of hope faded from my sky. I could see no mercy in the Hand that dealt that blow. The green earth became one wide sepulchre; the sweet ministrations of nature had no healing power. In my selfish despair, I would have shrouded the blue heavens in sable, and thrown a pall of gloom over every happy heart. Months passed by, slowly, wearily, and I found no alleviation of my sorrow; no tears came to ease that dull, dead pain, that seemed crushing the life from out my heart; no star of Bethlehem shone through the dark cloud over my head.

"I was sitting one afternoon, as usual, motionless and speechless. It was dark and gloomy without, as my soul within. The driving sleet beat heavily against the windows. Twilight had set in. My little Charley had patiently tried for hours to amuse himself with his toys, now and then glancing sadly at my mournful face. But the oppressive gloom was becoming unendurable to the child. At length, creeping slowly to my side, and leaning heavily against my shoulder, he said, in a half sob, 'Does God love to see you look so, mamma?'

"'No, no, Charley!' said I, as I clasped him to my heart with repentant tears. 'No, no! I'll cloud your sunny face no longer.'

"Alas! dear Ellen, I but turned from one idol to another; I gave God the second place, and lived only for my boy; and so my wayward heart needed another lesson. The grave took in my last earthly treasure. But when the Smiter had done his work, those little lips, though silent, still said to me, 'God loveth the cheerful giver;' and so, smiling through my tears, I learned to say, 'Thy will be done.' Dear Ellen, if the good Father takes away with one hand, He gives with the other. There is always some blessing. 'Ilka blade of grass keeps ain drop o' dew.'"

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, February 10, 1853.

ELDER JAMES H. COCHRAN.

The dust of this dear brother has returned to the earth as it was, and his spirit to God who gave it. The event took place at Plainfield, N. J., on Tuesday evening, the 1st inst., about twenty minutes before seven. By this dispensation, his family has been deprived of a kind husband and affectionate parent, the church of a faithful pastor, and the denomination of a minister greatly beloved.

Bro. Cochran had been ill about two months, of a complication of disorders, causing great suffering of body, and baffling all medical skill. Between thirty and forty abscesses appeared outwardly, and it was supposed by his physician, as we were informed, that there was not an organ in his body which was not, to a greater or less extent, affected in the same way. Gangrene of the lungs closed the scene.

Throughout his illness, he evinced entire submission to the will of God, and an unwavering confidence in the Lord Jesus Christ. The way of salvation, which he had so earnestly and plainly preached to others, was precious to him while on the bed of sickness. The Holy Spirit had well convinced him of his fallen nature, and how helpless he was in himself; he knew that the sacrifice of Christ was the only ground of acceptance with God; and there, with all the simplicity of a little child, he rested, and feared no evil. In that happy state of mind he died, and by his patient endurance of what was ordained as the means of taking him out of the world, he has shown how a Christian can die.

Bro. C. was a native of Scotland. He came to this country some twenty years ago, or more, "having no hope, and without God in the world." Born of wealthy parentage, and furnished with ample means, he had indulged the ardor of his youth in a career of pleasure, extravagance, and dissipation, which seemed to mock the prayers of a pious mother, and to make him as a "vessel of wrath fitted to destruction."

But God had mercy on him. Dropping in at a religious meeting in Albany, one evening, the Spirit of God directed an arrow to his heart. He saw himself dead in trespasses and sins, and under wrath. The good work was carried on his soul, till he was made to see how God could be just and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus. Some time afterward, he was baptized in the Passaic River, at Paterson, N. J., by Elder Z. Grenell, the worthy pastor of the Baptist Church in that place.

From Paterson, he removed to Newark, and became connected with what was, at that time, the 2d Baptist Church of that city. He was highly esteemed during his residence there, and, if we are not mistaken, officiated as clerk of the church a part of the time.

After some other changes, he settled in Clarence, Erie Co., New York. There he was brought into intercourse with the people of our denomination, which led him to examine the Sabbath question. The result was a firm conviction that he could not discharge his duty to God, without observing the seventh day of the week as holy time. Seeing his duty, he "made haste and delayed not to keep the commandment." He was received as a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Clarence, then under the pastoral care of Elder N. V. Hull; and being found to be a man of promising gifts, as well as of ardent piety, he was, soon after, licensed to preach the gospel.

In 1840, he was ordained. His first pastoral charge was the 2d Alfred Church, Allegany Co., New York. Under his ministry, the church prospered; Christians were comforted, and sinners directed to the only Refuge. Many families in that community will long remember his labors of love among them.

Being under the necessity of returning to Clarence, to look after his temporal affairs, his connection with the 2d Alfred Church became temporarily suspended; and, for a short period, he took the pastoral oversight of the church in Clarence, which had become destitute by the removal of Bro. Hull. His business being satisfactorily arranged, he again repaired to Alfred, resumed the charge of the church there, and continued to exercise the same till the spring of 1849, when he removed to Berlin, in Rensselaer county.

The Berlin Church enjoyed his services two years. His usefulness in that place is borne witness to by all the inhabitants. Faithful in reproving the errors of the people, earnest in seeking their salvation, and diligent in preaching the word, he acquired a standing in that community worthy of the gospel minister. The people loved him, the church clung to him, and nothing but his own convictions of duty made them consent that he should go to another field.

From Berlin he removed to Plainfield, there to labor actively seven short months, to suffer two months, and then to die. His remains rest there, to await the morning when the upright shall have the dominion. A numerous concourse of people, including the resident ministers of different denominations in the village, paid the last tribute of respect, on Thursday, the 3d instant, on which occasion a funeral discourse was delivered by Elder T. B. Brown.

As a preacher, Bro. C. stood high among us. He was also very highly esteemed by other denominations. His statements of divine truth were clear and evangelical. He gave great prominence to the grace of God in the salvation of sinners; at the same time, he never failed to press home upon the sinner his awful responsibility. The utter depravity of the human heart, the consequent inability of the sinner to do anything spiritually good, the divinity of Christ, the doctrine of Atonement, Justification by Faith, the necessity of the New Birth; these were themes upon which he loved to dwell, and ably did he handle them. He was, in short, "a workman that needed not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

His manner in the pulpit was earnest and impressive. The rapidity of his diction, joined with a slight Scotch brogue, made it somewhat difficult for strangers to follow him; but this difficulty very quickly wore away, and those who were accustomed to him could listen with as much ease as to the most deliberate speakers. None listened but to feel themselves benefited.

As a Christian, showing by his daily life his faith in the Gospel, there is but one opinion among all who knew him. Rigidly conscientious, he could not be bribed to depart from the strictest integrity. He was not merely honest; he was (as a Christian should be) highly honorable. We doubt whether he was ever guilty of a "small" action. He was honest in his opinions, and candid in the expression of them. Above all, he was heavenly-minded. His conversation savored of the good things of a better world. God and eternity seemed to be always near to him. We have had but few men among us, if any, who gave stronger proof that they lived in daily communion with Christ.

In all our public gatherings—Associations, Missionary Meetings, &c.—he was a most valuable counsellor. Here, his loss will be felt deeply. Clear-sighted and comprehensive in his views, correct in his notions of discipline, and zealous for the promotion of every good cause, his presence was always welcomed by his brethren. Of the missionary cause he was a most ardent supporter. It was a day of new life to him, when our denomination first set out in the work of foreign missions. We well remember how his eyes filled with tears of joy, when the subject was first brought before the Western Association, (of which he was at the time a member,) and how animated he became when he pleaded the cause, and urged his brethren to go into it with all their might. He never faltered in his devotion to the work; nor, indeed, in his devotion to the other benevolent enterprises in which we were engaged, for he was a friend to them all.

The Plainfield Church will feel his loss very sensibly. For though his relation to it had been of but a few months' standing, he had obtained a strong hold upon the affections of its members. Their unwearied attention to him during his sickness, their anxiety as to the result, the tears they shed over his remains, attested their attachment.

Of the loss sustained by his family, we need not speak. God only knows the depth of that sorrow which this dispensation of his providence has stirred in the heart of her who shared the anxieties of his life; and God only knows how to comfort her. We trust that she, and her little children, will not be forgotten in the prayers of them who knew the worth of her husband.

Bro. C. was forty-five years old at the time of his death. He has fallen in the prime of life. His death is not without its lesson to us all, and especially to his associates in the ministry, of whom the number is discouragingly small. May they be stimulated to renewed activity!—for one so useful being removed, greater is the responsibility devolved upon those that remain.

Our sketch of Bro. C.'s life is very meagre, and may be somewhat inaccurate, though we believe it is substantially correct. We trust that some one better posted up in the details, will furnish a more complete biography for the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial.

"Brother, rest from sin and sorrow;
Death is o'er, and life is won;
On thy slumber dawns no morrow:
Rest—thine earthly race is run." T. B. B.

DENOMINATIONAL LITERATURE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In an article in the Recorder of December 23d, a correspondent refers to a remark made by one of the speakers at our late Anniversaries at Plainfield, N. J., that the Seventh-day Baptists "have no literature." Your correspondent supposes him correct in the sense in which he would wish to be understood, and as far as he had been informed, probably alluding to the English Seventh-day Baptists; but he shows that the German Seventh-day Baptists are an exception—that from their earliest history they were a literary and scientific people. In that he is doubtless correct. I have had some opportunity of examining the remnant of those ancient works, which show plainly that that people are not now what they have been. May we not hope that among them some one will be raised up who may be instrumental in redeeming the past.

But I am not fully satisfied that the remark was correct, when applied to us, the English Seventh-day Baptists. As one of that number, I have had some acquaintance with our history, and I am not ready to acknowledge the charge just. Webster's definition of literature is, "learning, acquaintance with letters or books." I am of the opinion that, according to our numbers, we have an equal proportion of literary men among us with our sister denominations, both among the ministry and the laity. The time has not been, for nearly a century past, when we have not been blessed with some educated men, who would compare with those of other denominations. I hope the time will never come when we shall be so ungrateful as to forget those noted and worthy servants of God, the STENNETTS, whose works are so universally esteemed among Protestants, and are to be found occupying a place in the libraries of the principal institutions of learning in America and Europe. The writings of BAMPFIELD have long been considered a rich legacy, though but few copies of his works are to be found in this country. We may mention, also, CARLOW, BURNSIDE, and others, who have been ornaments to the truth they professed, and are now defending it with their works, though they have gone to their eternal rest.

And in this country, though our fathers have left but little, yet some of them have left enough to perpetuate their memories, while we can read their names and their productions upon the page of history. Some of the old manuscripts recently found, show that the attainments of some of those men were of no ordinary kind. The circumstances in which they were placed, or their poverty, probably forbade their giving them to the world.

As a denomination, we have not been entirely idle, or uninterested in this work. We have some literary productions that are no disparagement to us. Carlow's "Defense of the Sabbath" was republished at New London, Ct., in 1802, and again revised and published by the Sabbath Tract Society in 1847. Rev. Samuel Stennett's "Discourses on the Parable of the Sower," were republished by Jedediah Davis and John Bright, of Shiloh, N. J., in 1823, and very generally circulated. Rev. Robert Burnside's work, "On the different Sentiments entertained in Christendom relative to the Weekly Sabbath," a book of three hundred pages 12mo., was republished by Joseph Stillman, of Schenectady, N. Y., in 1827.

In 1821, a book of Psalmody was published for the benefit of the denomination, consisting of nearly six hundred hymns, by W. B. Maxson, E. S. Bailey, and Henry Clarke, a Committee appointed by the General Conference. In 1833, a second edition of this work was published by John Maxson, of Homer, N. Y.

In 1847, a new selection of Hymns was prepared by a committee appointed by the General Conference, and published by Geo. B. Utter and E. G. Champlin, in a volume entitled Christian Psalmody, including one thousand and ten hymns, now in general use among the churches and families of the denomination.

In 1836, a Discussion on the subject of the Sabbath, between Rev. W. B. Maxson, pastor of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Piscataway, N. J., and Rev. William Parkinson, pastor of the first Baptist Church in New York, was published by John Maxson, of Schenectady, N. Y., a book of three hundred and twenty-four pages, and well worth perusal, by any one wishing to be informed on that important subject.

In 1821, The Seventh-day Baptist Magazine was commenced, under the superintendence of W. B. Maxson, E. S. Bailey, and Henry Clarke, of Brookfield, N. Y., a committee appointed by the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society. It was published quarterly, and was continued until 1825.

In 1827, a weekly religious paper was issued, to advocate and defend the doctrines held by the denomination, called the Protestant Sentinel. John Maxson, of Homer, N. Y., was its editor and proprietor. It was removed from Homer to Schenectady, and thence to De Ruyter, N. Y., and in 1840 it passed into the hands of Green, Bailey, & Burdick, and was edited by an association of ministers, assuming the name of the Seventh-day Baptist Register. At the close of the first volume, Rev. James Bailey became editor and proprietor, who continued the weekly publication of the paper until 1844.

In 1844, an association of brethren purchased Mr. Bailey's interest in the paper, removed it to the city of New York, and employed George B. Utter as Editor and General Agent, by whom it was published five years, under the name of The Sabbath Recorder.

In 1848, the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society was formed, having its seat of operations in New York City. Since that time the Sabbath Recorder has been published under the direction of a Board of Managers appointed by that Society, George B. Utter and Thomas B. Brown being its editors. The literary character of this paper needs no comment. It is a lasting evidence of the literary qualifications of its able editors and its numerous correspondents, and it is acknowledged to be one of the best conducted papers published in the city of New York.

In 1850, a monthly paper, called the Sabbath-School Visitor, was commenced, which has been regularly issued up to the present time.

In 1851, the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial was commenced, a quarterly magazine, edited by a committee appointed by the Executive Board of the Publishing Society. Four numbers have been issued. This work will bring to light some of the productions of our early distinguished men, that have been for years in obscurity, and may yet be of some use to the living.

The American Sabbath Tract Society has been in operation ten years, and during that time it has published and sent abroad edition after edition of some twenty different tracts, of various sizes; and the bound volume of tracts makes a book of which we are not ashamed, either on account of its appearance, the doctrines advocated, or the literary ability of the writers. From first to last, not one of those little messengers has been refuted by any one of the thousands of writers of the popular denominations, whose literary productions on other subjects flood the land.

Who can take a glance at the few works that I have mentioned—twenty-four or twenty-five volumes of a well-conducted and well-received weekly religious newspaper, handsomely bound, and lying upon the table in the study, with the other publications of the denomination, and still say that we have no literature? Such things thrown out in our public assemblies, and published in our denominational paper, are discouraging to those who have led the way, gone before us, and under great discouragement done what they could. No! instead of thus oppressing them, let us be thankful that, by the grace of God, they have done so much; and may they, by successive generations, be had in everlasting remembrance. The Seventh-day Baptist literature will make a better library than we find in many a splendid palace, whose occupants may be decked with gold, and clothed in fine linen, and fare sumptuously every day.

If our Literary Institutions continue to flourish, we may well expect that literary men and their productions will increase. Suitable encouragement should be given. We should labor to make our people a reading people, and try to place a proper estimate upon the productions of our own writers. This has not been done. The bound volume of Tracts, we find in the parlors where the colporteur has been; but ask about the contents of the book, and hardly one in the family has read it, or knows any thing about it. Is this as it should be? Here by its side lies "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "Aunt Phillis's Cabin," "The Wide, Wide World;" and not a soul, from the old grandmother down to the little girl of six years, but can give you the outlines of the whole story. I love the literature that has blessed this nation, and while we have been sharers in common with others, we have been distinguished from others by a literature of our own, that teaches us to honor God and his righteous institutions. W. B. G.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY.

Many of the early settlers of this country were educated men. They felt the importance of learning, as the hand-maid of religion. Their only hope of the perpetuity of the faith they cherished rested in an enlightened piety. They felt the necessity of right early providing for the education of the young.

Accordingly, as early as the fall of 1636, the following enactment passed the General Court of Massachusetts:—"The Court agree to give four hundred pounds towards a School or College, whereof two hundred pounds shall be paid the next year, and two hundred pounds when the work is finished, and the next Court to appoint where and what building." Newton was selected as the seat of the College, being a "place very pleasant and accommodate," and its name changed to Cambridge, in honor of the English institution by that name, at which many of their leading men had received their education.

The colony, however, on the account of its poverty, dangers and disunion, found it impossible to raise the money proposed, and the project would have failed, if an unexpected Providence had not supplied the resources. John Harvard, a clergyman residing at Charlestown, died about this time, bequeathing one half of his property, besides his library, to the Institution. In the language of Josiah Quincy, late President of the University, to whom we are indebted for most of our statistics, "The Pilgrims considered it as an omen of Divine favor, and with prayer and thanksgiving, they immediately commenced the Seminary, and conferred upon it the name of Harvard, thus acknowledging him as its founder." Private contributions came pouring in from various quarters—the wealthier of their number contributing money—the farmer from the products of his lands and flocks—the merchant from his store—the mechanic from the fruits of his trade. We find one man giving sheep, another cotton cloth, a third a pewter flaggon—one gives a fruit dish, another a sugar spoon, &c.

The insignificance of their gifts, perhaps, tempts a smile at first; but on a second thought, such a feeling is changed into admiration. Mark the spirit here manifested. These exiles from a far distant land, had but just begun to make an impression upon the far-spreading wilderness—their slumbers disturbed by the howl of beasts and the yell of savages—continually harrassed with Indian wars and midnight massacres—religious discord prevailing among themselves—yet, amid all these difficulties, this weak band, with one accord, set about building a Seminary that might be a blessing to the world. They waited not for a vast accumulation of means, for a long circuit of preperation, nor for quietness, security, and harmony; but whatever they found to do, they did willingly, cheerfully, promptly, and the Lord blessed them in their endeavors.

Eaton and Shepard were the first principals of the institution, before it had received a full college organization. Dunster, followed by Chauncy, was the first regular President. Both of these men had to bear the labor, privation, suffering, and poverty, incident to starting a new institution in a new country. The poverty of the times and the institution may be inferred from the petition circulated for the purpose of raising means for the support of poor students. It was as follows: "That the Commonwealth may be furnished with knowing and understanding men, and the churches with an able ministry," it entreats "every family throughout the plantations, which is able and willing to give, to contribute a fourth part of a bushel of corn, or something equivalent thereto, which would be a blessed means of provision for the diet of such students as stand in need of support." The lot of the first Presidents was that of "thankless labor, unrequited services, arrearages unpaid, posthumous applause, a doggerel dirge, and a Latin epitaph." Hoar, Oakes, Rogers, and Increase Mather, followed in the Presidency. Thus far it had been considered and conducted as a theological school, having for its prime object the preparing of a learned ministry. The Pilgrims familiarly called it the School of the Prophets, and cherished it as the Hope of the Church and the State. Its morals and discipline were high and rigid, so much so that many sent their sons from England, to receive here a higher moral culture than they could receive in their native country. But in 1692, a new charter was given by William and Mary, granting the power of conferring the various academic degrees. From this time, it began to depart from the design of its founders. Hitherto it had been under the clergy; but under the new charters of the control of the church, and conducted by the college and colonies, they began to lose power, and the college departed from their control.

From the founding of the Institution, until the American Revolution, it struggled hard with poverty and the various political and religious influences brought to bear upon it. It was deeply affected by the war. For over a year the students and teachers were compelled to reside at Concord, and the apparatus, library, &c., were removed to Andover. General Washington first took command of the American Army in front of the college, and during the absence of the faculty and students, quartered his troops in the college buildings. After thus presiding in college halls in a military manner for some fourteen months, the faculty and trustees were so well pleased with his Presidency, that they conferred upon him the degree of LL. D. The Institution had been hitherto quite chary of those honorary degrees that are now scattered with such a lavish hand, having never before conferred the degree of LL. D., and that of D. D. but twice—the first in 1693, upon Increase Mather—the second in 1771, upon Nathaniel Appleton. Since the establishment of American Independence, the prosperity of the University has been uninterrupted—in a measure keeping pace with the growth and prosperity of the country.

Harvard University, commencing with such scanty means, and struggling though nearly one hundred and fifty years of poverty and difficulty, is now the richest, the best endowed, possessing faculties the most ample for study, of any institution in America. It has some ten College Halls—also Law, Scientific, Medical, and Divinity Halls—the whole costing not far from half a million of dollars. These Halls—except the medical, which is located in Boston—are situated in the western part of Cambridge, embowered in shrubbery, presenting—as also does the city—a half sylvan, half urban appearance—the whole pervaded by a classic atmosphere. Besides the buildings, library and apparatus, it has a property of nearly a million of dollars. Its library contains ninety-two thousand volumes—its apparatus, &c., is most ample. Its yearly income is from one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand dollars—its expenditures, nearly the same. The Faculty consists of between forty and fifty professors and teachers, many of them leading minds in literature—some stand at the head of the scientific researches of the age. Among its Presidents, beside those mentioned above, we find the names of Leverette, Wadsworth, Holyoke, Locke, and Langdon, of Joseph Willard, Samuel Webber, John T. Kirkland, Josiah Quincy, Edward Everett, and Jared Sparks. The whole number graduating from the institution since its founding is about eight thousand. The present number of students is about six hundred.

With such ample means for doing good, it has long been proverbial for its aristocratic and conservative tendencies, its anti-evangelical influence. Its history, in this respect, is extremely interesting, especially to those engaged in founding new institutions, or in any way shaping and molding the educational interests of the future.

At the founding of the College, Congregationalists had control of all matters, both in church and state. Having such control, we should naturally expect to find some reference to doctrinal points in their chartered college privileges, some sectarian tests for both teacher and student in their "School of the Prophets"—especially should we expect this, when we consider, that at this time, of all others, sectarian zeal was running high—most of the religious denominations persecuting each other with rigor—all thinking that they were doing God service. But "piety" and "godliness" were the only requirements. Being thus left in the moorage of orthodoxy, without any anchors or cables to confine it there, it was tossed and driven about by all the political and religious storms that swept over the colonies. Unitarianism crept in, and it early began to drift away from orthodoxy. The Congregationalists strove long and hard, but in vain, to bring it back to its former position. The excitement consequent on such efforts was great, especially in President Mather's administration. Some of its Professors, after striving several years to eradicate the evils that were gaining ground, gave up in despair, and resigned their professorships. The Trustees, on receiving their resignation, would endeavor to calm the fears that were raised among the orthodox, by assuring them that there was no danger. Attempts were made to introduce religious tests, by which to bind the Faculty, but it was too late. The Presbyterians, [whose interests at first were identified with Harvard, turned their attention to the founding of Yale—many of the Congregationalists went with them.

Left thus to drift comparatively at random, it has followed the eddyings of politics and popular favor. Its Faculty depending upon legislative action for promotion, are ever under great temptation to be obsequious to the dominant party of the Commonwealth. Although orthodoxy has ever retained a nominal power in the University, it is but nominal; while those very denominations that established, or at first supported it for their benefit, find it one of their most subtile and powerful antagonists. While in the domain of science and literature its light has ever been growing brighter and brighter, in that of religion and vital piety its light long since became darkness. It is fast tending towards the Philosophic Theism of Germany. Its history in this respect is but the history of similar institutions, left thus without a definite religious guide and head. There is ever a proneness, in such institutions, to sacrifice spirituality to intellectuality—to sacrifice religion upon the altar of science and literature. An institution founded without any particular religious denomination for its head and guide, will be pretty sure to be found ultimately either fighting against evangelical religion in all its forms, or else drifting towards the most popular and influential denominations. Hence a denomination, founding an institution for its own good, or through which to bless the world, should make the institution subservient to the denominational faith, by firm an enduring arrangements—should make religion the guiding star of learning. PASTORS AND NEWSPAPERS.

That a well-conducted religious newspaper is a great help to the faithful pastor, no one who has marked the influence of such a paper will for a moment presume to question. Strange that so many pastors are apparently indifferent—certainly inactive—in regard to the circulation of religious papers among their people. One would suppose that self-interest, if no higher motive, would induce them to exert themselves in this work. From the following paragraph, which we find in The Presbyterian, it appears that some pastors are alive to the subject:—

"We have repeatedly stated that, in our opinion, pastors have things very much in their own hands in regard to the circulation of religious newspapers among their people. Their recommendation, either from the pulpit or privately, will almost uniformly secure the introduction of such papers into many families where they are not taken. We have had cheering instances of such success, in statements recently received from pastors sending the names of new subscribers to the Presbyterian. An esteemed clerical brother writes us, that in making his pastoral visits during the last few weeks, he determined to endeavor to induce the families in his congregation who were without a religious paper, to become subscribers; and had already succeeded in introducing into thirty-eight families a religious newspaper, where none had been taken before. Does any one doubt that this brother will reap the benefits of his efforts in the increasing intelligence and efficiency of these families? Were not his labors and time well spent? We live in a day of stirring things, and for a whole Christian household to be trained up without the means of information as to what is doing in the religious world, is one of the most effectual methods for unfitting them for the important obligations they owe to their generation and to the Church of God."

ANOTHER DOCUMENT ON SLAVERY.—Mrs. Julia Gardner Tyler, consort of Ex-President John Tyler, has published a letter in reply to the Address of the Duchess of Sutherland and other English ladies to the Women of America on the subject of Slavery. The letter attempts to palliate the evils of slavery, and to fix the responsibility upon England; it enumerates some of the evils which exist under the sanction of the British Government, and concludes by recommending English ladies to mind their own business, instead of troubling themselves about slavery in America. The whole affair strikes us as coarse and unwomanly, and contrasting strongly with the meek and sympathizing Address of the ladies of England. The following extracts from the letter happily illustrate its spirit:—

"The crocodile, good sisters of England, is said to cry most piteously; but woe to the unhappy traveler who is beguiled by its tears!"

"The newspaper press of England affects a mawkish sensibility on a subject with which it has nothing properly to do, and all for ends which every reflecting person cannot fail to understand."

"The African, under her [England's] policy, and by her laws, became property. That property has descended from father to son, and constitutes a large part of Southern wealth. We desire no intrusion of advice as to our individual property rights, at home or abroad. We meddle not with your laws of primogeniture and entail, although they are obnoxious to all our notions of justice, and are in violation of the laws of nature."

"We are content to leave England in the enjoyment of her peculiar institutions; and we insist upon the right to regulate ours without her aid. I pray you to bear in mind that the golden rule of life is for each to attend to his own business and let his neighbor's alone."

FRANCESCO MADIAI.—A person who visited Francesco Madiai in his prison, gives the following account of him:—

"I found in Francesco Madiai a simple-minded Christian, greatly depressed and worn down by severe suffering, mental and bodily. He made no complaint, and spoke with the greatest respect of the Grand-Duke, his sovereign, to whom, I had previously heard, he had been always a most attached and loyal subject. He evidently would have entered more at length into the particulars of his case, but I told him that I already knew them. When I asked him if I could do anything for him, he said, 'Nothing but to pray for me.' I then offered up a short prayer with him for the continuance of God's favor and support toward him and his wife, and bade him farewell."

The same writer speaks thus of Madiai's feelings when informed of the interest which had been taken in his case, and of the fact that the King of Prussia had sent Count Arnim to plead with the Duke:—

"His eyes then filled with tears, and he exclaimed, 'How can I ever be grateful enough to God for his mercies to me?' He spoke of his own nothingness, and that, therefore, it could have been only God who had put it into the hearts of kings and nobles, and of Christians of distant countries, to be so interested in their behalf. He added, that he felt that he was in God's hands, and that He would do with him as He pleased."

DEVISES TO ECCLESIASTICS.—The following bill, designed no doubt to prevent the accumulation of large estates in the hands of Roman Catholic bishops and priests, has been introduced into the Senate of New York:—

SEC. 1. No grant or devise of real or personal estate to, nor any trust of such estate for, the benefit of any person and his successors in any ecclesiastical office, or to or for any person, by the designation of any such office, shall vest any estate or interest in any successor of such person.

THE VISITOR.—The second number of the third volume of the Sabbath-School Visitor was issued last week. That and the previous number were sent to all last year's subscribers for more than five copies. We hope to have returns from all before issuing the March number.

The following is a list of the articles in the number for February: My little Playmate and her Grandfather, "She died like a Lamb," Singing in Sabbath Schools, Early Impressions abiding, Missionary Contributions of Children, The Unconscious Orphan, Enigmas, Blind Arthur and Little Alice, "The hardest part of the Verse," "This Hand never struck me," The Minister's Story, Dorcas-Work, The Sabbath-School Teacher, The Lazy Boy, The Breakfast, An Olive Plant, Something left to live for, "That is a Boy I can trust."

THE MEMORIAL.—The fifth number of the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial has been delayed in order to obtain information necessary to complete one of the biographies. The copy is now all in the hands of the printer, and the number will be issued in a few days. It will contain the conclusion of Eld. Satterlee's biography, with an Essay on Church Discipline, prepared by him at the request of the General Conference in 1812; a biography of Eld. Eli S. Bailey, with a life-like portrait; a biography of Eld. John Davis; a continuation of the history of the Newport Church, History of Missions, engraving of the Pawcatuck Meeting-House, &c.

MORE DISUNION.—It seems that the Garrisonian Abolitionists are not the only disunionists in the world. "The Corner Stone" is the title of a new weekly paper about to be started at Columbus, Georgia, and devoted to the advocacy of a dissolution of the Federal Union. Gen. James N. Bethune will be its editor, and Messrs. Reynolds and Yarborough publishers. The following paragraph from the prospectus affords an insight into the future policy of The Corner Stone:—

"Believing the General Government to be corrupt in all its parts—holding that it belongs to, and is, and will be, administered for the benefit of the North alone—that it is an engine by which the power and resources of the South are wielded to her injury—that in all respects, and under all circumstances, the political connection between the two sections is productive of evil to the South, we shall advocate its dissolution."

THE JERRY RESCUE TRIALS.—These trials were continued at Albany throughout last week. A Mr. Salmon's case was examined, and he was acquitted. Ira H. Cobb was on trial at last accounts.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JAN. 31.

In the SENATE, Mr. Hale presented a memorial of the Pennsylvania Society for the abrogation of Slavery, for the relief of free negroes unlawfully hold in bondage, asking the repeal or modification of the Fugitive Slave Act to some conformity with the provisions of the Constitution. Also, a petition of the Grand River Quarterly Meeting of the Free-Will Baptists of Michigan, declaring the Fugitive Slave Law contrary to the law of God, and praying its immediate repeal. Mr. Cass presented several additional petitions, praying the intervention of this Government to protect American citizens abroad in religious worship. Messrs. Hunter, Bright and Pearce were appointed on the Joint Committee to examine and count the Electoral votes, &c. After which the death of Mr. A. H. Buell was formally announced, and Mr. Seward, after a touching speech, offered the usual resolutions, which were supported by Senators Fish and Hamlin, and passed. The Senate then adjourned.

In the HOUSE. Mr. Buell's death was formally announced by Mr. Jenkins, who pronounced a brief eulogy upon the deceased. Mr. Ives followed with some remarks, after which the usual resolutions passed, and the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, FEB. 1.

In the SENATE, the resolutions of the Legislature of New York in relation to the Madiai, were presented; also petitions for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law. Several bills for the relief of individuals were passed. Mr. Rusk's Pacific Railroad Bill was talked of a while. This bill provides that the Government shall issue twenty millions of twenty years' national securities, which, with alternate sections of six miles square of the public domain, shall be given to the private Company who will construct the work on the most favorable terms. The proposals are to be advertised for, and, on being opened, the best bidders (for the Government) are to receive the work. The bill also provides for immediate surveys of all probable routes at the expense of the National Treasury; and further, that after the surveys and estimates shall have been made, the selection of the route shall be devolved on the President of the United States, who shall take into consideration the comparative length of the routes, the comparative feasibility of constructing the work on each, and the general national advantages each may offer.

In the HOUSE, a bill was reported providing for the survey and location of a wagon road from Missouri to the settlements of California and Oregon. Farther than this we see nothing in the proceedings worth reporting.

FOURTH-DAY, FEB. 2.

In the SENATE, the Private Warehouse bill, the Tehuantepec Resolutions, and the Emigrant Route (to the Pacific) bills were the principal topics of discussion. No action was taken on either of them.

In the HOUSE, the proposition to lower the standard value of the coinage was a subject of discussion. After which the bills granting lands for the construction of railroads in Missouri and Wisconsin were taken up. Attempts were made to lay the latter on the table, but they were unsuccessful.

FIFTH-DAY, FEB. 3.

The SENATE, after disposing of some private claims, proceeded to a further discussion of the Private Warehouse bill. Mr. Miller strongly opposed it, as opening a way for new frauds upon the customs, and working injuriously to the interests of our own manufactures. The bill was postponed, and that for reörganizing the Navy came up, to which Com. Stockton reported sixty-six amendments, all of which passed. Mr. Brodhead's substitute for the Pacific Railroad bill was then brought up.

In the HOUSE, a number of petitions, asking protection to Americans abroad, were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Coinage bill came up, and was debated until the morning hour expired. The bill introduced last session, to remove the duties from railroad iron, was put at rest, by the refusal of the House to reconsider an old motion by which it was formerly laid upon the table. The Army bill was before the House when it adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, FEB. 4.

In the SENATE, the usual resolutions making arrangements for the official count of the Presidential votes were adopted; after which, the bill granting right of way through the military reservation near Niagara for a ship canal, was considered and passed. The Warehouse bill came up again. The principal point discussed in this bill is the provision extending the time of paying duties from one to three years; and Messrs. Hunter, Seward and other leading Senators argued strongly for retaining it. Mr. Davis, however, took the other side, and moved an amendment limiting the time for withdrawing goods for consumption to one year. This was agreed to. Other amendments were proposed; some were adopted, some not; and the bill finally passed. A communication from the President, in relation to the Postal treaty with Great Britain was received, containing a note from the Postmaster-General, in which he gives it as his opinion that Great Britain has violated that instrument.

In the HOUSE, the usual plan of counting the Electoral vote was adopted, a point of order in relation to the old Wisconsin Railroad grant bill, was raised, by which it was at length resuscitated and sent to the Speaker's desk.

SABBATH-DAY, FEB. 5.

In the SENATE, the principal points of interest were the introduction of a bill by Mr. Davis, of Mass., in relation to the Fisheries, and intended to lead to perfect reciprocity between this country and the British Provinces in regard to them—the passage of the bill granting lands to build an immense railroad in the Slave States of Missouri, Arkansas and Texas—and an onslaught by Mr. Butler upon the Pacific Railroad.

In the HOUSE, a joint resolution providing for printing and binding the returns of the last census, occupied the session, and passed.

European News.

By the steamers Canada and Atlantic, we have European dates to January 27.

The English news is of little importance. There is evidently some fear that Louis Napoleon is secretly meditating hostile designs against his neighbors across the Channel. Among other symptoms, it appears that Government is making inquiries of the various Railroad Companies, how many men and horses, with munitions of war, they could carry to any specified point in case of emergency. Arrangements are also making to have the regular troops and militia available at a moment's notice. A large military station is to be founded near Birmingham, and no more of the regulars are to be sent from home at present. In the Navy Yards the greatest activity prevails.

The celebrated case of Achilli vs. Newman is again before the Court, and is exciting some interest among the partisans of those gentlemen.

Nearly £2,000,000 gold is reported shipped from Australia to England since previous advices.

Rev. Dr. Rice, of London, has committed suicide.

Charles S. Lawrence, Governor of the Falkland Islands, announces that Guano has been discovered there.

From France, the news, to the exclusion of everything else, is the Emperor's marriage to M'lle Montigo, which has taken Paris by surprise, and was unfavorably received by the Bourse. M'lle is a Spaniard, 25 years of age, a blonde, and grand daughter of the British Consul at Malaga. Her mother was an Irish woman named Fitzpatrick, and her father, the younger son of a Spanish family, who fortunately, by the death of his elder brother, succeeded to the titles of Count Montigo, Duke of Teba and Pennamando. Her sister is Duchess of Abba, and Mademoiselle is herself Countess of Teba. The proposal for her hand was formally made by the Emperor on Sunday, and was of course acceded to. The next day the happy bridegroom communicated to his ministers that his determination was taken, and that it was a marriage of affection. One report says that the Ministers, except one, resigned, but that the Emperor refused to accept their resignations. It is said that the civil marriage has already taken place, and that the religious ceremonies will be held on the 29th instant, (January.)

Twenty line-of-battle ships, eighteen frigates, and fifteen smaller ships-of-war, fitted with the screw-propeller, are building in the French navy yards.

Napier, the ship-builder in the Clyde, recently received orders for sixteen frigates from France, but the British Admiralty canceled the order, and gave similar orders for England.

Accounts of the floods in the Departments are deplorable. The Loire, Seine, Moselle, Aisle, Villaine, Dnolle and Sarthe are overflown, doing great injury to the towns along their banks.

Hong Kong dates to Nov. 29 say that in the early part of the month the rebellion was successful, but latterly rumor states that the Imperial troops had gained decisive advantages. The transit through the disturbed districts was uninterrupted.

The Florida Indians.

A message to the Senate, from the President of the United States, is accompanied by a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, which gives a succinct statement of the relation which the Florida Indians now hold to the authorities of the United States:—

As early as the 9th of May, 1832, a treaty was entered into with the Seminoles, known as the Treaty of Payne's Landing, by which they relinquished all their claims to lands in Florida, and bound themselves to remove therefrom within three years. When that time had expired, they refused to comply with the terms of the treaty, and resort was had to military force to expel them from the country. A fierce struggle ensued, which lasted for more than six years; and, after a vast expenditure of blood and treasure, the Government found itself baffled in all its attempts to drive them from their haunts in the swamps and forests with which the country abounds, and which were inaccessible to the regular troops.

Finding the efforts of the army fruitless, an arrangement was subsequently made in 1845, by Mr. Polk, which established a neutral territory of twenty miles in width, (in which all white settlements were forbidden,) along the entire border of a district within which the Indians were allowed to remain.

Things stood in this way till last summer, when a deputation of Indians, headed by the Chief of the tribe, Captain Billy Bowlegs, visited Washington, and there concluded a treaty with Mr. Lea, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, by which they agreed to go home and get their people to emigrate at the "earliest possible day." But the Indians held a council in December and repudiated that treaty, and threatened to depose Billy and elevate his sister to the chief command.

The plan now recommended by Gen. Blake, (who was sent down with Billy to superintend the execution of the treaty,) to accomplish the final expulsion of the remnant of this little band of Seminoles, is to send out surveying parties under a military escort, and so corner and capture, or shoot them in detail. This plan is sanctioned by the Commissioner, Mr. Lea. Meantime, Mr. Senator Mallory, in a letter dated the 9th of January, calls upon the Secretary of the Interior for "prompt measures to compel the removal of this band of cut-throats, who have outraged every feeling of humanity, and whose treachery demands the sternest correction."

And the Governor of Florida announces, under date of the 12th ult., to Secretary Stuart, that he has, in consequence of the unprotected state of the frontier, ordered a regiment of mounted volunteers into service for its protection. [Tribune.

Important and Righteous Decision.

A Kentucky Court has lately made a decision, recognizing as correct the principle laid down lately in New York, in the decision upon the case of the negroes which had been the slaves of Mr. Lemmon. The case was as follows:—

Some years ago a Mrs. Trigg, of Kentucky, determined to send her slave, Clarissa, to Philadelphia with a relative, Mrs. Alexander, as her waiter, to remain there over six months, if Mrs. A. should find it convenient. She was aware that under the law of Pennsylvania the slave would be entitled to her freedom if she did so, but concluded to risk it. Clarissa was much attached to the family, and believed that she was to be freed on the death of her mistress. Having remained in Philadelphia the appointed time, she returned to Kentucky, and again entered the service of Mrs. Trigg. The latter having occasion to borrow money of her adopted daughter, secured the debt by a conditional bill of sale of her slave Clarissa, never meaning, however, that she should be actually sold. Mrs. Trigg died, and in her will liberated her other slaves, and made provisions for the payment of the debt due her daughter, and the emancipation of Clarissa. But the daughter claims Clarissa as her property, and declines to enter into the arrangements by which she may be freed. At this point Clarissa institutes a suit for her freedom, relying principally upon the fact that she had, with her mistress' consent, remained in the State of Pennsylvania for more than six months. The Judge decided that the laws of Pennsylvania had made her free, and that her freedom went with her on her return to a Slave State.

Arrest of an Alledged Murderer.

On the 6th of January, 1852, the steamboat Martha Washington was burned on her way down the Mississippi River to New Orleans, and thirteen of her passengers lost their lives. Suspicion was excited that she had been purposely fired with a view to obtain the sum of $240,000, for which she and her cargo had been insured, and warrants were issued for the arrest of the owners, whose names are Lyman Cole, Lewis Choate, John A. Cummings, Wm. Kissane, G. B. Stevens, J. G. Nicholson, James Chandler, Wm. Holland, and Adam, Amos, James, Rufus, and Lorenzo Chapin. Six of these men were arrested and committed to prison, and while there, one of their number died, as is supposed, by poison administered by himself; but previous to his decease he made confession, of which the following is the substance: In December, 1851, the parties above named purchased the Martha Washington at Cincinnati, Ohio, after which they commenced freighting her with merchandise, to be conveyed to New Orleans, for which insurance was effected as it was placed on board. This same merchandise was soon after removed from the boat, repacked and reinsured, and this was done several times, until insurance to the amount of $200,000 had been effected in ten or twelve different offices. The boat was then insured for its full value, and with a small amount of merchandise on board departed on her trip. By a preconcerted arrangement, when she arrived in the State of Arkansas, she was set on fire and burned to the water's edge, all of her passengers, thirteen in number, perishing in the flames, but the captain of the boat, who was one of the conspirators, together with those of the others who were on board, having previously made the necessary arrangements, effected their escape to the shore. The head man in the whole of this nefarious transaction is said to be J. G. Nicholson, who, upon learning that one of the confederates had confessed, immediately left the West and started for this city, where he has been for some time past. Mr. Joseph Bruep, one of the Deputy U. S. Marshals of Cincinnati, armed with a warrant for his arrest, recently arrived in this city, and after much search, and once, being foiled, succeeded in arresting Nicholson.

AFFRAY AT UTICA.—The Utica (N. Y.) Herald of Feb. 2 says:—The most heart-rending catastrophe ever witnessed in Utica, occurred in the upper part of the city about 10½ o'clock Monday evening, between a party of watchmen and people residing in Eaton, Madison County. Bernard McManus, a young man about 21 years of age, residing at Log City, Madison County, and an Irishman by birth, was shot through the heart, and died almost instantly. James Rooney, of Eaton, was also shot in the thigh, and is considered in a precarious condition. Mr. Arthur Plant, a watchman, was also dreadfully beaten, and his recovery is considered doubtful. It appears that a party consisting of the brothers Rooney, their sister, another woman, and the brothers McMannus, all of Madison County, had come to the city to attend the wedding of Bernard McMannus, the deceased, and were having a jollification at the house of a Mr. John Dolan, on Elm-st. Late in the evening, watchmen Simmons and Plant, having an appointment in the vicinity, came up to the house, and watched the proceedings within. Some of those within coming out, an affray commenced, which resulted as we have seen.

SUMMARY.

A letter from Keweenaw Point, Lake Superior, mentions the death of Wm. Schlatter, whose name is attached to so many of the maps, plans and sketches of that mining region. He had started from the northern extremity of the point to walk through the forest to the Quincy Mine, on Portage Lake, and evidently had lost his way. After wandering for a time he became overpowered with the cold, and at length laid himself down beneath a tree, stretched out his legs, folded his arms across his breast, and fell asleep, and in this endless sleep he was found by a passing traveler.

We are glad to learn that in deference to public sentiment, which has recently taken strong ground in the West against the circulation of individual notes as currency, Messrs. E. W. Clark & Brothers of St. Louis, intend to withdraw all their notes, and submit them to the ordeal of fire. Thousands of dollars have already passed through this process. Messrs. Page and Bacon, it is hoped, will adopt the same judicious course; but at the latest dates from St. Louis they had not decided to do so.

Thompson's Reporter states that arrangements have been made to place the Merchants' and Mechanics' Bank of Oswego on a solid footing, by placing more securities in the Bank Department, and that it quotes the notes at 1 per cent. discount, expecting in a few days to quote them at the same rate as other State money. It also states the probability that the Farmers' Bank of Onondaga will follow suit.

Thompson's Reporter says that Land Warrants have risen so rapidly and have now reached so high a price that we hardly think there is much probability of a further advance. There is besides a possibility that Congress may yet do something with the public Lands that will affect the price of Land Warrants.

Mr. Corwin's Report shows that on the first of July last there was in the United States Treasury an unappropriated surplus of eight millions and a half, and estimates that on the first of next July the surplus will exceed five millions, after paying off above seven millions of the public debt. The revenue for the year ending July 1, 1854, is estimated at $51,200,000, forty-nine millions of which is anticipated from customs, while the expenditures of that year will also be five millions less than that sum.

The Boston Courier states that, just before Mr. Webster's death he called his son Fletcher to his bedside, and said: "My dear son, I wish you to procure a handsome and substantial piece of silver plate, and present it to my valued friend, Peter Harvey, with a suitable inscription, as a testimonial of my dying love for him." This piece of plate has been manufactured by Jones, Ball & Co., of Boston. The inscription is a verbatim transcript of the dying words in which the great statesman made the request.

The heirs of the late Stephen Girard are making an effort to obtain possession of the entire estate now in the possession of the city of Philadelphia, including the College buildings and grounds. The heirs have filed a bill in equity in the Circuit Court, and have commenced an action of ejectment in that Court, of Nisi Prius. This is not the first attempt made by the heirs to obtain this immense estate.

Newton Peters, of Missouri, recently made a handsome speculation by driving sheep overland to California. He started with 2,508 sheep, and at Salt Lake he sheared them, and sold the wool for $2,500. On reaching California with 2,000 of them, in good condition, he was offered $10 a head for the lot, which he refused, being sure of a higher price.

The California block of marble, destined for the Washington Monument, was destroyed just after it had been completed, in the Sacramento fire. We learn from the California papers that a new block, four feet long by two deep, has been prepared, at a cost of $5,000, and will be forwarded immediately to Washington.

In Washington, last week, a Mr. Fuller, of the pension office, posted a Mr. Schaumberg, formerly of the U. S. Dragoons, as a liar, a coward, and a swindler. The next day they met on the steps of the National Hotel, when Schaumberg shot Fuller, wounding him dangerously. He is in prison.

Mr. David Van Pelt, an aged resident of Middletown Point, was killed while walking on the track near Hightstown, by a train coming behind him, on Saturday, January 29. He was seen by the engineer two miles off, and the whistle was blown, but, being entirely deaf, the warning was unheeded.

Boston papers state that Mrs. H. B. Stowe received, some days since, from her publishers, Messrs. Jewett & Co., of that city, the sum of $10,000, this being her second payment as copywright on Uncle Tom's Cabin, making upward of $20,000 received by her in nine months.

It is reported in Buffalo that a company of twenty men have purchased the exclusive right to use the caloric engine on the lakes, and have made the preliminary arrangements for the construction of a number of heaters and propellors.

The proprietors of the People's Line of North River steamers, are building for the coming season two magnificent boats, 300 by 42 feet, and of much lighter draft than any of the large boats heretofore in use. These new boats will be arranged mainly for freight, but they will also be elegantly fitted up for passengers.

The annual meeting of the National Agricultural Society was held at Washington on Thursday last. The principal practical aim of their deliberations seemed to be the establishment of another Department of the Government, to be entitled the Agricultural Department. This was advocated by Mr. Calvert, of Maryland, and by Prof. Mapes.

The President Elect has written a letter to Mayor Seaver, of Boston, declining, in consequence of his recent and bereavement, a public reception on his way to Washington. He says it is gratifying that Boston extended the invitation to him as representing the principle of the Union of the United States.

The rise in rents on Broadway and other great thoroughfares, New York, to take place on the first of May, is perfectly frightful. We hear of one store heretofore rented for $1,000 per annum, which is now refused for less than $3,000.

A rumor was in circulation in New York on Saturday, that a British steamer had blown up near Jamaica, and that 400 lives were lost. The report came by way of Havana, but needs confirmation.

Wellington died possessed of an estate and funds not far short of ten millions of dollars! He was considered miserly and mean, and as closely calculated the value of one pound as any London shopman.

On the Utica and Schenectady Railroad, last week, an engine, with five cars attached, ran a distance of seventy-eight miles in an hour and twenty minutes, or nearly sixty miles an hour.

Advices from Port-du-Prince to Dec. 26, state that the fever was still prevailing there to a great extent, and has proved very fatal among the shipping, most of the vessels having lost more or less of their crews.

The Corporation of Harvard College has formally announced its election of Prof. James Walker to the office of President of that institution. His confirmation by the Board of Overseers may be considered a matter of course.

Petitions are pouring into the Michigan Legislature for the passage of a "Maine Law," and the probability is that one, though less stringent than that of Maine, will pass.

Three steamers with passengers for California, sailed from New York last Sunday, having been detained one day by the fog. They carried about 2,000 adventurers.

In Hornellsville, N. Y., by Eld. S. Pattengille, September 10th, 1852, Mr. STILLMAN M. BURDICK, of Hornellsville, to Miss FANNY O'CONNER, of Hartsville.

DIED,

In Hounsfield, N. Y., January 4th, 1853, JOHN WITTER, son of Enos and Roena Lewis, aged 21 years, 1 month, and 10 days, while on a visit to the house of his grandfather, John Witter, of Jefferson County. His disease was inflammation of the lungs, and he lived only six days after he was taken ill. He had previously obtained a hope of his acceptance with God, and he died calm, without a struggle, with a serene hope of eternal life, lamented by an affectionate family, a large circle of relatives, and all acquaintances.

In DeRuyter, N. Y. Jan. 25th, ABBEY COON, widow of Luke Coon, and sister of Eld. John Green, in the 70th year of her age.

In DeRuyter, Jan. 28th, after a short and distressing illness, (stricture of the bowels,) CHARLES B. LANGWORTHY, aged 30 years. The law of good will was so exemplified in his daily walk, that none could doubt his fellowship with Christ. In his death he leaves a widow and two little sons truly bereaved. He was a valuable member of the church in DeRuyter.

In Westerly, R. I., on Thursday, Jan. 27, Miss NANCY TAYLOR, aged 60 years.

December 29, 1852, ELIZABETH A. ROGERS, the only daughter of Jonathan K. and Elizabeth Rogers, aged two years, nine months, and twenty-five days.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses; Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

American Baptist Register.

THIS Volume, now issued, contains 496 pages; or, reckoning the 26 engravings as two pages each, 548 pages. It is printed on beautiful paper, and embraces (including the ornamental stamp on the cover) engravings of 27 church and college edifices. The sketches of State Conventions, Associations alphabetically arranged, names of churches, dates of constitution, counties in which located, pastors, the baptized in 1851, number of communicants, with the names and post-offices of ordained and licensed ministers, fill 373 pages. These are followed by the American Indian churches, also the Welsh and German churches. Summary tables of the Associations in each State, (the most complete we have ever seen,) fill 26 pages. These are followed by valuable tables, embracing a comparative summary, colored members, Sabbath schools, ratio of churches, ministers and members to the whole population, Baptist periodicals, ordinations, churches constituted, new church buildings dedicated, and obituary notices. Then follows the educational department, embracing theological seminaries, colleges, academies, high schools, &c. Also an account of our Benevolent Societies. Next we find tables of the Baptist churches in other countries, British Provinces, Europe, Asia, and Africa. The concluding pages contain an account of the Anti-Mission, Free-Will, Six-Principle, Seventh-day Baptists, &c., with a grand summary of baptized Christians and religious denominations.

No description of the volume will do it justice. It must be seen to form a correct idea of the expense and labor bestowed upon it. In view of the expensiveness of so many statistical pages, its engravings, &c., it is one of the cheapest volumes ever issued. It contains 200 pages more than was anticipated when the price was announced.

Price, bound in cloth or sheep, $1 50; five copies, $6. It will be sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, for $2.

Published by the American Baptist Publication Society. Orders for the Register should be directed to Rev. B. R. Loxley, 118 Arch-street, Philadelphia.

THE DEMOCRACY OF CHRISTIANITY, or an Analysis of the Bible and its Doctrines, in their relation to the principle of democracy. By WM. GOODELL, Cady and Burgess, New York. Sold also by William Harned, 48 Beekman-street, New York. The first volume is occupied with an examination of the Old Testament; the second volume carries the investigation into the New, shows the bearing of the leading doctrines of the Gospel upon the principle of democracy, examines the institutions of the New Testament, traces the progress and the influence of Christianity in promoting human liberty, to the present time, and, in the light of Scripture prophecy, as illustrated by the signs of the times, unfolds the future prospects of humanity. The work is designed to promote liberty, both in the Church and the State, and to show that the cause of human freedom is identified with the Christian religion.

Price $1 50 at retail, $12 per dozen, or $90 per hundred.

SLAVERY AND ANTI-SLAVERY: A History of the Great Struggle in Both Hemispheres; with a View of the Slavery Question in the United States. By WILLIAM GOODELL, author of "The Democracy of Christianity."

This work is designed to embody a great amount of historical information in a single volume, conveniently arranged for reference. It contains fifty chapters on as many distinct topics, embracing the most important facts in the political and ecclesiastical history of the contest, together with an account of the Anti-Slavery agitation in England and the United States up to the present time; the divisions among American Abolitionists, and the various measures advocated among them; and closing with a brief discussion of the question, "What ought to be done?" The book is an abstract of several volumes, besides the Anti-Slavery history of the last twenty years, a great part of which has never before been collected into any volume, but lies scattered in the newspapers of that period. The Table of Contents and a copious Alphabetical Index will facilitate a reference to particular facts, and to dates when desirable.

It is a large royal 12mo. volume, of about six hundred pages, well printed, on handsome paper, neatly bound in cloth, and lettered. Price one dollar per copy, at retail; $9 per dozen, or $65 per hundred, to booksellers and book pedlars, for cash.

The postage on a single copy will be 30 cents to any part of the United States, and must be prepaid.

For sale by the publisher, WILLIAM HARNED, 48 Beekman-street, New York.

The Lemmon Slaves—A Family Sketch.

From the N. Y. Tribune.

The Lemmon Slaves, or rather Freemen, are now safe in Canada. We say safe, whatever decision the Supreme Court may arrive at upon the appeal from the judgment delivered by Judge Paine, in their case; and though, in the event of its being adverse to their freedom, Lemmon and his wife should refuse to carry into effect their promise to manumit them. Some interesting facts in regard to this family, and illustrative of the "peculiar institutions of the South," have come to our knowledge, which we now propose briefly to narrate.

About 14 years ago there lived in Bath County, Va., a planter who was commonly called "Billy Douglass." He had six children, to each of whom he gave a slave about their own age when they were quite young. These slaves grew up with his children, and became in due time their attendants. When Douglass died he possessed about 40 slaves, which were divided among his family, and by that means became separated from each other, the Douglass family then residing in different parts of Virginia. Among the slaves given away was a boy named Levi; he fell to the lot of Mary Douglass, by whom, until her marriage, he was well treated. When he was about 19 years of age, his mistress married a man of no very reputable character, of the name of Simmons. As soon as he became master of the slaves of his wife, their situation was materially changed for the worse. Levi, and another slave of the names of James Wright, had ventured to ask their mistress not to marry this Simmons, for they feared his cruel treatment. This fact came to his knowledge, and to punish their audacity he determined to sell them to the far South. Having learned that a negro trader, of the name of Witheroe, was at a town twelve miles off, on his way to Alabama, with a coffle of 39 slaves, he brought him to his house, where he saw Levi and Wright, and privately struck a bargain for them.

The manner in which they were inspected by Witheroe, though intended to disarm suspicion, nevertheless aroused it, and became the subject of serious consideration between Levi and Wright. They felt persuaded that they had been sold by their master for the southern market, but they resolved that they would not go thither, and made their arrangements accordingly.

The morning after their sale had been effected, Witheroe made his appearance, accompanied by several men, and announced to Levi and Wright the fact that they were his slaves, and must proceed immediately to join the coffle, then waiting for them at the neighboring town. Handcuffs were produced, and were about being placed on their wrists, when they stated that it was unnecessary that they should be so fastened, as they were quite willing and ready to go with him anywhere, for they were tired of living with Simmons. Witheroe thereupon consented to let them go with him unfettered. Knowing the country well, Levi and Wright planned their escape so as most effectually to baffle the pursuit of Witheroe and his party. Having taken a hasty leave of such fellow slaves as were near, they set out, with apparent cheerfulness, with the negro trader, but they had not been more than half an hour on the road, when, as they had preconcerted, they suddenly leaped over a fence, and being active young men, were soon buried in the depths of the adjacent wood, whither their pursuers in vain strove to follow them. They felt the importance of hastening their steps, and traveled as fast as they were able, a distance of sixty miles. At the end of their journey they obtained shelter and refreshment among some slaves whom they had formerly known in their own neighborhood. As soon as they had sufficiently rested, they started for Ohio, but, by some mishap, were seen and pursued by a party of twenty-five men.

They exerted themselves to the utmost to escape, but Wright only was able to effect it. Levi was taken and put in jail, where he was duly advertised as a runaway. There he was confined five weeks, waiting the arrival of his owner. In the meantime, being an excellent dancer, he managed to get into the good graces of his jailor, who invited white people to come and see his feats. They often gave him pieces of money, and finding that his keeper was fond of whisky, he liberally supplied him with it out of the proceeds. Having made arrangements for his escape from this prison-house, he seized his opportunity, when his keeper was in a state of complete intoxication—and he had no one to oppose his progress but the keeper's wife. Having easily overcome her resistance, he fled a second time for Ohio, where, after incredible fatigue, and almost famished for want of food, he safely arrived. There he fell in with the managers of the "Underground Railroad," and was soon placed by them in a position of of comparative safety. After laboring some time in the country, he removed to Cleveland, and there he became a waiter in one of the hotels, where for a while we must leave him and return to his fellow fugitive, James Wright. He succeeded, after great exertion, in reaching Ohio, and by the aid cheerfully rendered by the friends of the flying slave, was safely forwarded to Canada, where he now follows the occupation of a farmer, and can sit under the shelter of his own roof, "none daring to make him afraid."

Levi having engaged with Wright, that in case they should be separated in their flight, and afterwards be fortunate enough to reach Canada, they would meet at Malden—he, in August last year, went thither to make inquiries. At that time he knew not whether Wright was dead or alive, a freeman or a slave, and scarcely ventured to hope that he should meet him again. However, on his arrival at Malden, he found that Wright was cultivating a small farm on shares, a few miles off, and was doing well. He soon had the satisfaction of meeting him, and their joy was unbounded, when they grasped each other's hands in a land of freedom. Levi had the additional gratification of meeting two of his cousins in Malden, who had previously escaped from "the house of bondage." Finding some of his relations and friends in this town and neighborhood, and not judging himself quite secure from the operation of the "Fugitive Slave Law" in Cleveland, he purchased, out of his earnings, a small lot of land, determining to settle in Malden as soon as he conveniently could. With this prospect in view, he returned to Cleveland, and there resumed his occupation as a waiter.

One morning, while the case of the Lemmon slaves was under adjudication at New York, he heard read the particulars, and at once discovered in them near and dear relations. He immediately put himself in communication with a friend in Cleveland who telegraphed the fact to one of the Committee in New York, when, after due caution, it was determined that he should proceed thither, without delay; this he did, and we had the satisfaction of knowing that in Nancy he found a sister, in Emeline an aunt, in their children nephews and cousins, and in the two youths who were with them, brothers. But this was not all; he announced James Wright to be the husband of Nancy and the father of her children. Thus, by a wonderful interposition of Providence, have these poor people been brought together again under happy circumstances, instead of having to wear out a miserable existence on the slave plantations of Alabama and Texas.

The case of Emeline is distinguished from that of Nancy, in one or two particulars. Her first husband, Tom Reynolds, was sold by his master, a man of the name of Wood, to a planter of the name of Cobb Reynolds, residing somewhere on James' River. He was thus separated from his wife and children, and they from him. Finding it was not probable that he would ever see his wife again, or be able to do anything for her, he sent her word to that effect, and released her from her obligations to him. She subsequently formed a new connection with another slave, the father of one or two of her younger children, from whom she is now separated. Whether her first husband is still alive, or where her second husband now is, Levi, from whose lips we received the foregoing particulars, could not say, and Emeline having left New York, could not be consulted.

The mother of Levi is still in slavery, with eight of her children, and these are in the hands of four different slaveholders. The eldest of her children in slavery is 25 years old, the youngest an infant, born since Levi's escape.

Daniel Webster.

"The American Journal of the Medical Sciences," for January, 1853, has a very full medical description of the last illness of Daniel Webster, by his attending physician, Dr. Jeffries, from which the following particulars are copied.

MR. WEBSTER'S GENERAL HEALTH.

Mr. Webster was of a sanguineo-billious temperament, of a swarthy complexion, with straight black hair, with a large, athletic, and well-proportioned frame. He was five feet ten inches in hight, and when in health weighed one hundred and ninety pounds. His appearance was peculiarly imposing, and the expression of his features, more particularly of his eye, was, perhaps, more powerful than that of any other man. He was nearly seventy-one years of age at the time of his death.

Mr. Webster, although endowed with an iron constitution, had been subject for the past eighteen or twenty years to an habitual diarrhea, which, commencing as an occasional looseness, had gradually increased upon him, until, for the last three years, it was persistent; for this, he was accustomed, latterly, to use opiates, generally in the form of a "cholera medicine," which appeared to be composed of sulphate of morphia and the compound spirits of sulphuric ether.

For about the same number of years he had been annually subject to a somewhat severe form of catarrh, commencing from the 6th to the 16 of August, and continuing until about the 1st of October. The only exception to the occurrence of this was in 1839, when he was in Europe. He was sometimes confined by this for a short period, but usually continued his exercise and duties abroad. In the early years of this complaint, he did but little for it; but, latterly, he had adopted energetic treatment under medical advice, in the hope of preventing the annual visitation.

HIS PHYSICAL DECLINE.

In August, 1851, while in Franklin, N. H., whither he had gone for retirement, hoping, by a change of climate, to escape his annual catarrh, he was attacked, after exposure to the damp ground, with gout in his feet, mostly in the great toes; he was so far relieved of this, however, as to take a journey to the White Mountains; but, on his return to Franklin, the gout returned in a more severe and general form.

On the 9th of September he came to Boston and placed himself under the writer's care. At this time his complexion was sallow, and he had lost considerable flesh; his eyes were red, and his countenance indicative of great uneasiness; his pulse was full, quick and firm; his nights were distressing and restless; there was constant thirst; the bowels were irritable, and, although without appetite, he was taking food without restraint, and, by advice, using stimulating drinks freely. He was also taking iodine of iron with hydriodate of potass, and minute doses of oxide of arsenic as a preventive of the catarrh. He had also used some remedies for the gout, and frequently resorted to opiates for his diarrhea. With some difficulty he was induced to relinquish all these medicines, to restrict himself to the simplest food, and to retire to Marshfield for recreation and exercise. In September he returned to Washington, expressing himself as being "perfectly well," having implicitly followed the directions given. During the winter of 1851 and 1852 he transacted a vast amount of business at the seat of Government, being, however, frequently under medical treatment for his diarrhea. He failed in flesh and strength toward the spring, and, in the latter part of April, went to Marshfield in hopes of recruiting.

EFFECT OF HIS ACCIDENT.

On the 6th of May, 1852, he was thrown from his wagon, falling forward upon his hands, and striking his head with much force upon the ground. He was for some time insensible, but soon recovered perfect consciousness. On the 20th he came to Boston, and was visited by Dr. J. Mason Warren in consultation. He was found to have injured the joints of both wrists, the left more severely, without any apparent displacement or fracture; there was considerable swelling and great ecchymosis of the whole forearm, with frequent severe paroxysms of pain through the joint; there was also a slight flesh wound near the temple. He made no complaint of uneasiness in the head. On the 24th May he addressed his fellow-citizens in Faneuil Hall, being then suffering under great general debility. In July, at the time of his public reception in Boston, he was suffering more than usual from his diarrhea, and was under medical treatment to enable him to go through the fatigues of that occasion.

On his return from Washington to Marshfield, in September, he took cold in Baltimore, and first complained of the symptoms connected with his final illness. On the 20th of September he drove from Marshfield to Boston, a distance of thirty miles, for medical advice.

It was then observed that he had lost much flesh, which gave to his large eye a somewhat unnatural prominence. His face was pale with a peculiar sallowness; but there was no jaundice at this or any other time. He rose from the recumbent posture slowly and with some apparent difficulty, and he had the aspect of a very sick man. He stated that he had been more than usually unwell for a week or more; he complained of uneasiness on the left side of the abdomen, with consequent difficulty of lying on that side; there was also sometimes a sense of tightness across the lower part of the abdomen. The bowels were still loose, but not quite so irritable; the appetite was wholly gone; the skin was commonly very dry, and there was a constant dryness of the tongue and fauces, with much thirst. The tongue was covered with a light brown coat; the pulse was 106, quite full, but easily compressed, somewhat jerking, with four intermissions in a minute.

He returned to Marshfield the next day, the 21st, with the following directions: To abstain from all mental labor, and to avoid fatigue in bodily exercise. The diet to be tea, with bread and butter, morning and evening, and a little animal food at dinner, with one vegetable.

THE CLOSE.

On the 6th of October he was visited in consultation with Dr. James Jackson, of Boston. The symptoms continued much the same. Mr. Webster was about the house, though he had not been out. The opinion was expressed, and concurred in, that there was ascites, dependent upon grave disease of some abdominal organ, which would ultimately prove fatal; although some relief might be obtained.

It was decided to substitute a mild tonic for the cardiac mixture; to give one grain of squills night and morning, to be increased if the stomach could bear it; to continue the morphia, and to double the amount of brandy; encouraging him also to take a little animal food.

The symptoms continued much the same until the morning of the 11th, when, on coming down stairs for a drive, he became faint, with nausea and retching, vomiting a little mucus. Visited at 7 P. M.; he complained of extreme distress at the præcordia, for which he was urgent to have relief; the nausea had had subsided. A tea-spoonful of castor-oil, with one-sixteenth of a grain of morphia, was directed, by which the pain was relieved, and an evacuation obtained about 2 A. M., consisting of much fecal matter, with very dark bile and gelatinous mucus. All medicines but morphia were omitted; castor-oil being directed to be used if the præcordial distress should return. An annoying symptom, consisting of pains about the feet, of which he had previously complained, was noticed to increase in severity from this time. He continued tolerably comfortable, and able to come down stairs every day; and sometimes to transact considerable business. He was feeble and emaciated, but his spirits were buoyant. Throughout his sickness it was noticed that he did not bend his body forward in rising, but was raised with the body erect; and more than once, upon being assisted to walk, he had said that he felt as if he should fall forwards.

On the 19th, there was a manifest falling off; he had several copious dejections, which were thought to contain some blood, and he had also two turns of retching; by these he was much enfeebled.

On the 21st, at 5 A. M., the dejection consisted of a large quantity of fecal matter, with much bilious and bloody fluid. At 7 A. M. he had another similar dejection, with bilious vomiting. Nausea and retching now became prominent symptoms, and he became more and more feeble, until at 5 P. M., on the 22d, he vomited about a pint of fluid blood with some coagula. During the night the vomiting became more urgent, always with blood; and at 2½ A. M. he had a copious ejection of fluid blood. By all this he was much exhausted. The vomiting of blood continued very profusely; and whenever he attempted to speak he was interrupted by hiccough or retching.

On the morning of the 23d he announced himself conscious of his situation, and said, "I shall die to-night." From 9 until 1½ P. M., he remained free from vomiting. He was at this time visited by Dr. James Jackson, who had frequently been consulted during the progress of the disease. The vomiting of blood recurred during the afternoon. Dr. J. Mason Warren arrived toward night, and remained until the patient's death. Mr. Webster continued thus gradually sinking from the loss of blood by vomiting, retaining the power of utterance until midnight, and some evidence of consciousness until 1 A. M., and sinking gradually, without convulsion, cold sweat, or haze of the eye, expired at thirty-five minutes past 2 on the morning of Sunday, October 24.

Hollow Bricks.

In his report to the Governor of what he saw at the World's Fair in London, B. P. Johnson gives the following account of hollow bricks:—

"There were several models for making houses fireproof, but the most important improvement in this respect was the plan of building with Hollow Bricks. There were exhibitions of these bricks in both the English and French Departments. Opposite the Crystal Palace a block of model houses was erected by Prince Albert, a contribution to the Exhibition. The peculiarities of the building, which was designed for four families, were the exclusive use of hollow bricks for the walls and partitions and the entire absence of timber in the floors and roof, which were formed with flat arches of hollow brick-work, which was secured by wrought iron rods connected with cast iron springers resting on the external walls and binding the whole structure together. The building is thus rendered fireproof, and much more durable than if built in the ordinary manner.

"The most important advantages derived from the use of hollow bricks are dryness and warmth, as well as economy of construction. The evils resulting from the absorption of moisture by common bricks and other porous materials are obviated, and the battening of the walls is unnecessary. Hollow brick may be made with any good tile machine, in the same manner as ordinary draining pipes, and at about the same cost in proportion to the clay used. They are more compressed, require less drying, and with much less fuel are better burned than ordinary bricks, even when waste heat, or that in the upper part of the kiln only, is used.

"The saving in brick-work effected by the use of the patent bricks, when made at a fair price, will be from twenty-five to thirty per cent. on their cost, with a reduction of twenty-five per cent. on the quantity of mortar, and a similar saving on the labor, when done by accustomed workmen. The process of drying is much more rapid than in common brick-work, and the smoothness of the internal surface of walls built with the patent bonded brick renders plastering, in many instances, quite unnecessary, whereby a further saving is effected, not only in the first cost, but also in the subsequent maintenance. If glazed on the outer face, as may be done with many clays, a superior finished surface is obtainable without plaster."

The Japan Expedition.

From the Paris Journal des Debats.

Now that the American Expedition sent against Japan is making its way across the Atlantic in this direction, let us cast a rapid glance at the singular and difficult relations which the Japanese hold with the commerce of Europe, or rather with that of Holland, for no other power than this last has been permitted by the Government of Jeddo to trade with Japan. As early as 1837 the United States of America sent an Embassy to Japan to negotiate for the opening of relations with American commerce, but the movement completely failed. Ten years later, a second mission, with the same object, had the same result. The Dutch, on their part, in 1844, likewise sought to obtain a modification of those restrictions which, even to them, were hedged in with difficulties, burdened with intolerable and vexatious conditions, and offered in return comparatively few advantages. William, King of Holland, on that occasion wrote to the Japanese Emperor that national reciprocity was rapidly extending, and that it appeared to him Japanese commerce could not long remain uninfluenced by the movement. The Emperor, in thanking the King of the Low Countries for his advice, assured him that the laws of the Empire of Japan, being immutable, nothing could or would be changed from the order of things that had prevailed from all time past.

At length the astounding discoveries of treasure stirred up the Western World, and began to reäct energetically on the destiny of the countries laved by the China Seas. The commercial activity which, since the discovery of the gold of California, had sprung up in America had much increased the number of vessels trading in the Pacific, and passing near the shores of Japan. These circumstances determined the American Government to renew to these semi-barbarians the proposals they had made fifteen and ten years previously. So, in April, 1851, embracing the opportunity of sending home some shipwrecked sailors, they sent to Japan a small expedition, charged to press for the conclusion of a treaty which should permit American ships to establish depots for coal and refitting yards at various stations within the Japanese territory. The reply of the Emperor is still waited for, and the Government of the United States, to hasten the issue of the affair, has sent Commodore Perry to Japan with a squadron, which shall be able to demand the concessions formerly besought—concessions which, in the opinion of the Government of the American Union, should be made common to the trade of the world.

From the Annales du Commerce Exterieur we take the following, respecting the Dutch trade with Japan:

"The commerce that Holland has with Japan is not now what it was at the beginning of the XVIIth century during the high and palmy days of the Dutch East India Company. Since then it has much decreased in value, and at present scarcely exceeds annually the worth of three millions of francs. Two ships dispatched every year from Batavia to the little Island of Decima, lying off the entrance to the port of Nangasaki, suffice to transact the business of the company, which purchases the monopoly of the trade for the sum of 60,000 francs per annum.

"The Government trade, as well as that of private parties, is very complicated at the Dutch factory at Decima; however, this last is under less restraint than the former, although it is subject to a tax of 35 per cent., from which Government speculations are exempt. This difference arises from the nature of the articles imported. While the Government sends to Decima only its colonial products, and those of English and Indian manufacture, private merchants deal in articles of luxury of which the sale offers much larger profits. The principal articles of importation are: 1st, Of Raw Materials, Provisions and Natural Products—benzoin, Prussian blue, amber, cajeput oil, red coral, quinine, chocolate, palm oil, salts, galls, liqueurs, almonds, olive oil, opium, saffron, Venice turpentine, edible bird's nests. 2d, In Manufactures—Morocco and Persian leathers, laces, paper hangings, engravings and lithographs, tiles, false jewelry, hollow ware and tin ware, fire-arms, cutlery, glass ware, surgical and optical instruments, &c. The articles of export on Government account consist almost exclusively of refined copper (10,000 to 12,000 piculs of 125 lbs. each) and of camphor.

"The private trade exports are chiefly silk stuffs, lacquered furniture, porcelain, parasols, and other objects that fetch a high price in Europe."

Martha's Vineyard.

The vineyard was probably so named from the abundance of wild grapes growing on it. Whence it receives the prefix of Martha's, we cannot tell. It received the name of Duke's County, when Charles the Second granted it to his brother James, the Duke of York. The Island is 19 miles long, and at the eastern end is about ten miles broad, while at the western end it is only two miles broad. The surface of the Island is flat in the South, and high along the north shore. The soil of the Island is in the eastern part rather light and sandy, but in the western is more favorable for agriculture. A large part of the Island is still in the state of nature, and covered with various kinds of oak trees and some pines. The bulk of the population is gathered together in the villages, which are built at the different harbors and coves along the shore. Probably not more than one-fifth of the men belonging to the Island are engaged in agriculture, though, if the land were properly laid out into farms, it would furnish employment for all of them. The men are mostly employed in seafaring pursuits. Some fourteen whalers sail from this Island, and besides large numbers of the officers and men that sail from New Bedford, belong on this Island.

A Patriot's Death.

The records of ancient Greece and Rome do not exhibit a nobler instance of patriotism than is contained in the following inscription, found upon a grave-stone, in New London, Conn. No wonder our revolutionary fathers were invincible, while they were actuated by such motives as are here recorded:—

"On the 30th of October, 1782, 4,000 English fell upon the town by fire and sword; 700 Americans defended the fort for a whole day, but in the evening about four o'clock the commander of the besieged delivered up his sword to an Englishman, who immediately stabbed him. All his comrades were put to the sword. A line of powder was then laid from the magazine to the sea, there to be lighted, and blow the fortress into the air. William Hotman, who lay not far distant, with three strokes of the bayonet in his body, said to his wounded friends who were still alive, 'We will endeavor to crawl to this line, and thus we will completely wet the powder with blood, and with the life that still remains in us, save the fort and magazine, and perhaps a few of our comrades who are only wounded!' He alone had strength enough to accomplish this noble design. In his 30th year he died on the powder which he overflowed with his own blood. His friend and seven of his wounded companions by that means had their lives preserved."

After this narrative are the following words in large capitals:—

"Here rests William Hotman."

Siberian Cold.

A traveler in Siberia, during the winter, is so enveloped in furs, that he can scarcely move; and, under the thick fur hood, which is fastened to the bearskin collar, and covers his whole face, one can only draw in, as it were, by stealth, a little of the external air, which is so keen that it causes a very peculiar and painful feeling in the throat and lungs. The distance from one halting place to another takes about ten hours, during which time the traveler must always continue on horseback, as the cumberous dress makes it insupportable to wade through the snow. The poor horses suffer at least as much as their riders, for, besides the general effect of the cold, they are tormented by ice forming in their nostrils, and stopping their breathing. When they intimate this, by a distressed snort and a convulsive shaking of the head, the drivers relieve them by taking out the piece of ice, to save them from being suffocated. When the icy ground is not covered by snow their hoofs often burst from the effects of the cold. The caravan is always surrounded by a thick cloud of vapor; it is not only living bodies which produce this effect, but even the snow smokes. These evaporations are instantly changed into millions of needles of ice, which fill the air, and cause a constant slight noise, resembling the sound of torn satin or thick silk. Even the reindeer seeks the forest to protect himself from the intensity of the cold. In the Tundras, where there is no shelter to be found, the whole herd crowd together as close as possible to gain a little warmth from each other, and may be seen standing in this way quite motionless. Only the dark bird of winter, the raven, still cleaves the icy air with slow and heavy wing, leaving behind him a long line of thin vapor, marking the track of his solitary flight.

REVOLUTIONARY DOCUMENTS.—A recent examination of the papers of General Knox, left at his old mansion-house at Thomaston, Me., has brought to light a mass of interesting and valuable revolutionary documents which have never been made public. General Knox, as it is well known, was honored with the especial friendship and confidence of Washington, who kept up with him a frequent and familiar correspondence for many years. Of the fruits of the correspondence more than fifty of Washington's letters have now, for the first time, been discovered, in which the various little details of his private life, as well as the great affairs of the nation, are freely noticed. Besides these, there are a proportionate number of letters from Lafayette, Baron Steuben, Lord Stirling, Generals Lincoln, Greene, Wayne, Heath, and Major Shaw, and other distinguished revolutionary heroes. These letters, though they have lain among the rubbish of the attic in the old family mansion-house for half a century, are generally in a very good state of preservation, and perfectly legible; and may yet prove of essential value to the biographer and historian.

"Snails," says one of the French journals, "were highly esteemed by the Romans, our masters in gastronomy, and are now raised in many of the departments with success. In the 16th century, the Capuchians of Fribourg recovered the art of breeding and fattening snails, an art which is not lost in our day, for in French, Come, Lorraine and Burgundy, they raise excellent snails, which find a sure demand in the Paris market. There are now fifty restaurants, and more than twelve hundred private tables, in Paris, where snails are accepted as a delicacy by from eight to ten thousand consumers. The price is about fifty cents per hundred."

At the burning of the Louisville Hotel, the coolest incident took place during the hight of the fire, and when all thought the entire building would be laid in ashes. It occurred between Mr. Moore, clerk at the hotel, and one of the boarders. The latter, carpet-bag in hand, descended from the third story, which was all in flames, and marching up to the clerk at the office, around whom the hot cinders were dropping, told him that he believed he would move his quarters, and wanted to know how much his bill was? Moore turned to the ledger, counted it up, made out the bill, took the money, and politely bowed him out, at the same time expressing his regret at his sudden departure.

The editor of the Salem Observer gives a cure for the Erysipelas, from which he has been a great sufferer. He says "a simple poultice of cranberries pounded fine, and applied in a raw state, has proved in my case, and a number also in this vicinity, a certain remedy." In this case the poultice was applied on going to bed, and the next morning, to his surprise, he found the inflammation nearly gone; and in two days he was as well as ever.

A modern philosopher, taking the motion of the earth on its axis at seventeen miles in a second, says that if you take off your hat in the street to bow to your friend, you go seventeen miles bare-headed, without taking cold!

HUMAN LIFE SHORTENED.

Substance of a Discourse pronounced at the Funeral of Elder James H. Cochran, Plainfield, N. J., by Thomas B. Brown.

PSALM 102: 23, 24—"He weakened my strength in the way; he shortened my days. I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days: thy years are throughout all generations."

The Psalm is entitled, "A Prayer of the afflicted, when he is overwhelmed, and poureth out his complaint before the Lord." It seems to have been composed in the time of the Babylonish Captivity; probably, near the close of that period when God's people so often hanged their harps upon the willows, and wept. For the writer appears to regard the time of rebuilding Zion as near at hand. "The set time to favor her is come." Verse 13. He felt, too, that that time of the restoration was to be a great day for God's people: for, "when the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory."

Yet, he feared that he himself would not live to see that day of glory. Affliction was upon him; his heart was smitten, and withered like grass; his bones cleaved to his skin; he had eaten ashes like bread, and mingled his drink with weeping; his enemies were leagued against him; and the result of it all was, that his strength was weakened in the way, accompanied with the probability that his days would be shortened.

But, O how he longs to see that day of glory! Must he die, and not see Zion restored? Can Jerusalem cease to be the object of his regard? "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of her mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy." Ps. 137: 5, 6. O, there is nothing in which God's chosen delight so much, as in Zion's welfare; and nothing they more earnestly desire to behold. He prays, therefore, and says, "O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days;" and sustains his weakness by the unchangeableness of Him "whose years are throughout all generations."

I look upon the text as a motto suitable to the occasion which has called us together: it will direct our meditations upon the brevity of life, as shown in the case of our deceased brother. For he loved Zion; his heart was upon her welfare. He loved the Church Universal; deplored her divisions, and longed for the time when, these divisions being healed, she could move through the earth like an army with banners, terrible to the enemies of God. He loved that branch of the Church for whose welfare he had so many years labored. How he prayed for its enlargement! how he toiled! how he wept! How he longed for the accomplishment of the promise made to such as count the Sabbath a delight, that they should "ride upon the high places of the earth." Isa. 58: 14. How he mourned, how the tears flowed, when he talked of that disobedient, Sabbath-breaking spirit among us, which puts the mercies of God aside, and the fulfillment of his promise far off! I can testify of him, that he knew how to sigh and to cry for the corruptions that were in our midst. But it needs not my testimony; you yourselves have witnessed it. Yet he labored and hoped on, believing that God would appear in his glory to build up Zion, though he himself should not live to see it.

And when God came to cut short his days, and weakened his strength in the way, I have been told that he felt, at first, as if his work were hardly done yet. He would be glad to do a little more for his Master, and felt as if he might consistently pray, "O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days!" Yet God has taken him, having use for him elsewhere. And he who was accustomed to bow to the will of God while he lived, did not rebel, when he found that the Master had actually come, and was calling for him.

I. God has seen fit to shorten the days of our brother. Not that he died sooner than God first intended; for there is "an appointed time to man upon earth." "His days are determined; the number of his months are with thee; thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass." Job 14: 5, and 7: 1. Man enters upon life as a soldier upon the warfare; as a hired soldier, he accomplishes his day—the period for which he was enlisted, and at the appointed time, death comes to give him his discharge. A divine decree determines it all; for He who sees the end from the beginning, has before him a plan by which the affairs of this world are ordered, as well as the part that every one is to perform. According to this plan, man steps out upon the stage at birth, plays his part, and then retires. Other characters are introduced: the great drama goes on, the scenes shift, successive acts are performed. The last scene comes; the curtain drops, as the clock of time peals its last note, and the performance is ended. We then see the surpassing wisdom of the plot, by which each man lived just so long, and performed just such a part, as contributed to make the whole redound to the glory of God, "who made all things for himself."

But whatever God's purposes are with regard to the duration of human life, it is nothing uncommon for man himself to calculate upon living a little longer. God may have appointed that a man shall die at the age of thirty; but the man himself has calculated upon living to fifty, to sixty, or even to three score and ten; and he has planned all his business with reference to continuing here a good while. Nay, his friends have calculated as much. He seems to them to have as much vigor of constitution as those who do attain old age, and he takes the usual care to preserve it. But suddenly, contrary to his own expectations, and contrary to the expectation of his friends, his strength is weakened in the way; the days which he had calculated upon are shortened. In the prime of life, in the midst of his days, in the midst of his business, in the midst of all his usefulness, he is cut off.

I know not that our departed brother calculated upon long life; my impression is, that he did not. In all his intercourse with me, he seemed to feel that eternity, and the giving up of his account, were near. But, though I think that he did not calculate upon old age, I think it not an unreasonable supposition that he may have calculated upon living somewhat longer than he did. When, only nine months ago, he took the pastoral oversight of this church, I presume he did not think that his stewardship would end quite so soon. You, the members of the church, did not think so, at any rate. Indeed, none of us looked for it.

And, as far as we were capable of forming an opinion, we thought it very desirable that he should live. He was a man of God—a useful man—a man whose preaching edified the saints; bore searchingly upon the consciences of sinners. He was one who "reproved, rebuked, exhorted, with all long-suffering and doctrine." He was honest—outspoken in his opinions, but always spoke in love. Such a man, we thought it desirable, should live long upon the earth. Under the guidance of such a man, we expected community to become better, and Christians to grow larger. (Eph. 4: 13, 14.) But, while we were looking for such results, and calculating how much might be accomplished by years of his labor, lo! God weakens his strength in the way, and shortens his days.

But, if our brother did not calculate upon length of days, is it too much to say, that he calculated upon doing more work in the Lord's vineyard? His life was not an aimless one; he had an important aim in living. No man can be a Christian without having an aim in view, and that aim the glory of his Lord.

Now, an aim always supposes something in the future—something not yet reached, but which one is striving to reach. Of course, it supposes the allowance of time, more or less, to reach it.

The aim of our departed brother was to serve the Lord, Christ. Hence, when he had done one work, he was always thinking what he should do next; some plan for future operation was always before him. And when he was struck down with his last sickness, he undoubtedly had something in view, which he meant to accomplish for his master. What it was in particular, I know not; but knowing that he was a man of God, I am sure there was something before him upon which his heart was set. But the days which he had marked out for the performance of it were shortened; the strength which he had determined to expend upon it was weakened in the way.

There is, before every person, some favorite object which he wishes to accomplish. Even the worldly man has his darling object in view. It rouses all his powers to activity, warms his imagination, incites him to daily toil, and he feels that his purpose must be accomplished, if possible, before he dies. The rainbow of hope spans his path, and he presses towards the mark.

The Christian's favorite object of pursuit is doing good, or (in Scripture phrase) glorifying God. He knows that for this purpose he was created; he knows that for this he was redeemed by the blood of Christ. As he grows in grace, the more completely does this desire fill his heart. He draws near the end of his race—neither himself, nor others, are aware of it, however—and the great progress he has made in the divine life, constituting what we sometimes call a "ripeness for heaven," makes him yet more anxious to glorify God. Accordingly, at the very moment when his strength is suddenly weakened in the way, his heart is more full of plans and purposes having reference to this object, than at any former period. As these plans contemplate time for the accomplishment of them, are not his days shortened—the days which he had marked out for the performance of the work?

We may with the greater propriety say this, when the subject of death was one whose mental powers were unimpaired. Such was the case with our departed brother. In all the vigor of his manly intellect, when he seemed best fitted for carrying into execution those schemes which his sanctified heart had conceived, he is laid prostrate. He sees not the good which his heart had hoped for. He had hoped to see a better state of things in the church—in the denomination—in the Zion of God at large. To this end his labors were directed; to this his prayers were given. But, like Moses, he goes up into the mount to see it from a distance; then dies, though the eye of his mind was not dim, nor the natural force of his understanding abated.

It was a long life that the antediluvian lived; nearly a thousand years, in some cases. The days of our years are three-score years and ten. But that man lives long, who lives to good purpose while he does live. In this sense, our brother's days were not shortened. There was a time, it is true, in the early part of his existence, when, as I have been told, he seemed not likely to fulfill the end of his being. He was dead while he lived, and seemed to be classed with that order of men, concerning whom it is said, "They shall not live out half their days." Ps. 55: 23. Prov. 10: 27. But the grace of God translated him from the congregation of the dead, having written his name in the Book of Life. From that time, he lived; and, as I have good reason to think, made every year of his existence tell in something accomplished for the glory of God. And, though now cut off in the prime of life, he has lived longer, so far as the purpose of his being was concerned, than the sinner of a hundred years, whose hoary head goes down to the grave with a curse upon it.

The dutiful child, who honored his father and mother, was promised long life as his reward. Exod. 20: 12. And seeing the use which the Apostle makes of that promise, (Eph. 6: 1—3,) I cannot but regard it as having the sanction of the New Covenant as well as of the Old. Yet, the dutiful child often dies young. Nevertheless, I do believe that, so far as the great and nobler purposes of life are concerned, the dutiful child is a long liver; he better answers the end of his creation in a few short years, than the one who grows old in disobedience. So is it with every one who lives for God.

Jesus Christ lived but a few years on the earth; yet, while he lived, it was all life. His words were not the words of death, they were the words of eternal life; his works were not the works of death, they were works of mercy and love. He went about doing good. One grand motive absorbed his heart—the glory of his Father who sent him. One grand object he had in view—the redemption of his people; and, for the joy of bringing that about, he endured the cross, despising the shame. But, considering all that was accomplished by his life—considering the fruits and results of it, both in time and eternity, what a mighty extension of life it was! He had not half filled the age of three-score and ten, yet when his hour had come, he had finished his work. And though it was the murderer's violence that cut him off, there was no necessity that he should live any longer. He had lived well, and therefore he had lived long.

But, in the more common and popular sense of the expression, a good man's days may be, and often are, shortened. We see this exemplified continually; and how solemnly we are reminded of it by the occurrence which has called us together to-day!

II. What, then, is the practical use of this doctrine? What is the influence which it should have upon us who live?

1. It should teach us to live earnestly, while we do live. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest." Eccles. 9: 10. This life, be it longer or shorter, is the time of our probation; and, that we may have a fair chance to answer the end of it, it is not necessary that we should count the days of the years of our pilgrimage in large numbers. But it is highly necessary, that what time we do live shall evince our determination to live for God. A short period may answer the purpose of our probation, as well as a long one. A short period may suffice to prove the incorrigible perverseness of our hearts. A single act may show our deep-rooted enmity against God. It might only increase our guilt, if our probation were long protracted. Indeed, the history of mankind shows that a long probation contributes nothing to their benefit. Methuselah lived nearly a thousand years; but his son Enoch was a far better man, though he lived only about one-third of that time. The antediluvians, generally, were a corrupt people, notwithstanding the long-suffering with which God endured them. All the probation we need is time enough to find out that we are depraved, helpless, hell-deserving creatures, and time enough, after that discovery, to get to Christ for safety. Then, while we live, let us live trusting in Christ; and, as grace abounds in our salvation, let us show that it causes us to abound in the work of the Lord. 1 Cor. 15: 58, 10.

2. It should teach us, that we may be disappointed in our hopes. He that wrote the words of the text, felt that he was likely to fail of witnessing what his heart desired. He wanted to see Zion built up, and to behold the glory of the Lord. So, we may desire to witness the great things which God has promised to his Church. We may desire to witness them, before we die; and if we could witness them, we might then, like good old Simeon, be willing to depart. But God's ways are not our ways. He will use us to promote his cause, but he is not obliged to finish his plan by our instrumentality. He used Moses to promote the planting of his people in Canaan, but he did not permit Moses to lead them into the land. And we may no more participate, during our natural lives, in the glory promised the Church, than Moses did in the corn and the milk, the grapes and the honey, of the land of Canaan.

But shall we, therefore, relax our diligence? God forbid. For though we see not the accomplishment of our desires, yet, if we faint not, we shall reap in due season. There never was a mourning bearer of precious seed yet, who did not return with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him. Ps. 126: 6. What we see not now, we shall see hereafter. What we see not with our natural eyes, we shall see with the eyes of our spiritual body. For God's people shall stand in their lot, at the end of the days, and shall see and rejoice in all the glory promised to the Church, as well as in the restoration of his ancient people. For all shall most surely be accomplished by such agencies as he may choose to employ. One soweth, and another reapeth; Paul plants, and Apollos waters; but not one good thing which the Lord hath spoken concerning Zion shall fail.

3. The subject affords an instructive lesson to us who bear the office of the gospel ministry. We talk of life, and its duties; of death, and its solemnities. While we live, a great work devolves upon us; but like our associate, whom we are about committing to the dust, we may be suddenly arrested in the way. God only knows how near some of us may be to the end of our stewardship. And what a solemn thing it is for those who watch for souls to give up their account! It is solemn, awfully solemn, for any one to come before God, and render his account for deeds done in the body. But to him whose business it is to "save both himself and them that hear him," how terrible the issue, if he has to look back upon the grace of God abused, and his talents laid up in a napkin! While we live, therefore, let us strive to be like that great model of a Christian minister, to whom to live was Christ. Phil. 1: 21. Then, to die will be gain. Then, our salvation will be, not "so as by fire," but such as is promised to them that turn many to righteousness. Dan. 12: 3.

4. But what a lesson is given to the church, and to all those here who have been accustomed to wait on the ministry of the departed! Because he is gone, sorrow hath filled your hearts. It is the first time you have been called to bury a pastor. But pastors are men; of course, it is appointed to them once to die. Only nine short months have passed, since he came to stand over you in the Lord, and now he is cold in death. Presently, you will bury him. But his prayers in your behalf, his counsels, his admonitions and reproofs, his pious example, his character as a minister—can you bury these? Do they not still live? Do they not stand before you an imperishable monument, testifying that a prophet has been among you? You may not look upon his like again for a long time, for godly men are scarce in the earth. But let not that be lost upon you, which God has done through his instrumentality. Let your departed pastor's counsels be obeyed, his reproofs laid to heart, his prayers remembered, and his shining example cherished with grateful recollection. If you profit by what you have already enjoyed, and practically acknowledge God's right to deal with you is seems good to Him, he will furnish you again. For He that ascended up on high, and received gifts for men, will not let his Church want that which is necessary to her edification. Your soul desired the first ripe fruit; but now, because the good man is perished out of the earth, you are almost ready to say, "there is no cluster to eat." Mic. 7: 1, 2. But be not despondent. The stars which Jesus holds in his right hand, have no power to shine, except as thy reflect his glory; and if one of them is withdrawn from the firmament, the effulgence of the Great Sun himself is not thereby darkened. He still shines, and sheds his glory upon all companies of believers gathered together in his name. Then trust Him, and fear not.

"He feels at his heart all thy sighs and thy groans,
For thou art most near him, his flesh, and his bones;
In all thy distresses, thy Head feels the pain,
Yet all are most needful—not one is in vain."

You mourn. But, when you have buried the dead, remember that one remains among you, in whom the fountains of sorrow have been stirred to their lowest depths; one feels that this is the dark of her pilgrimage, and is ready to say, "Call me Mara, for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me." Ruth 1: 20. She will have a claim upon your sympathies and prayers. You may say to her, that God has pronounced a blessing upon them who patiently endure affliction. That she knows already. With such promises, it is well to comfort her: but at this time, when sorrow is blowing upon her like a tempest, what she needs is, not that which convinces the understanding, but that internal power which will enable her to take hold of the divine promises, and appropriate to herself the comfort of them. Your prayers, therefore, your earnest, fervent prayers, are called for by this providence, that she may not fail to receive strong consolation. Here is opportunity for you to show how you can weep with those who weep. She is as one from whom the staff has been taken, and her step falters. For years, she has had one to lean upon, and the sorrows of life rested lightly upon her; but now she walks alone, and her heart within her is desolate. Still, the promises of God to the widow and the fatherless are for her and her children, and your prayers, accompanied with acts of Christian kindness, may be the means of laying them as a healing unction upon her soul.

And now, in Him whose years are throughout all generations, who of old laid the earth's foundation, and wrought the heavens with his hands, let us put our firm trust. For what though our strength be weakened in the way, and our days be shortened, and what though the earth itself grow old, and the heavens fade with age, does not God himself still live? and shall not his Church be made glad by the River that springs from his throne? Yes, verily, and He shall be our Refuge and strength, a very present Help in trouble.

THE USEFUL AND THE BEAUTIFUL.

The tomb of Moses is unknown; but the traveler slakes his thirst at the well of Jacob. The gorgeous palace of the wisest and wealthiest of monarchs, with the cedar, and the gold, and ivory, and even the great Temple of Jerusalem, hallowed by the visible glory of the Deity himself, are gone; but Solomon's reservoirs are as perfect as ever. Of the ancient architecture of the holy city not one stone is left upon another; but the pool of Bethesda commands the pilgrim's reverence at the present day. The columns of Persepolis are mouldering into dust; but its cistern and aqueducts remain to challenge our admiration. The golden house of Nero is a mass of ruins; but the Aqua Claudia still pours into Rome its limpid stream. The Temple of the Sun, at Tadmore, in the wilderness, has fallen, but its fountain sparkles in its rays, as when thousands of worshipers thronged its lofty colonnades. It may be that London will share the fate of Babylon, and nothing be left to mark it save mounds of crumbling brick-work. The Thames will continue to flow as it does now. And if any work of art should rise over the deep ocean, time, we may well believe that it will be neither a palace nor a temple, but some vast aqueduct or reservoir; and if any name should flash through the midst of antiquity, it will probably be that of the man who, in his day, sought the happiness of his fellow men rather than glory, and linked his memory to this great work of national utility or benevolence. This is the true glory, which outlives all others, and shines with undying lustre from generation to generation, imparting to works some of its own immortality, and in some degree rescuing them from the ruin which overtakes the ordinary monument of historical tradition or mere magnificence.

THE MOTHER'S PRAYER.

The beautiful lines below, entitled the "Mother's Prayer." were written in March, 1852, by one whose spirit has since taken its flight. She possessed a rare poetical talent, and gave promise of becoming an authoress of note; but hers was a frail spirit, and ere eighteen summers had passed over her head she was called to her reward. She has left a large number of beautiful poems, written in her leisure moments, and we have been kindly favored with the following:—

The Mother lay on her dying bed,
And beside her stood her son;
With one hand placed on his youthful head,
She prayed to the Holy One.

Her cheek was pale and her eye grew dim,
And faintly she drew her breath;
But she had labored through life for him,
And she strove for him in death.

"I come, I come from the scene of care
To the world where all is love;
Oh! would that I in my arms could bear
My child to the realms above!

"I've prayed with the early dawn of light,
That he might be safely kept;
And oft I've knelt by his side at night,
For him while he sweetly slept.

"I've sown good seed in his tender heart,
I've taught him from sin to flee;
But, ah! the summons has come to part,
And I leave him now to Thee.

"A Mother's care he may know no more,
But Thou canst her place supply;
Oh! keep him safe, and when life is o'er,
May she meet her boy on high."

Her spirit flew to a better home,
And a wail rose o'er the dead;
The daisy springs on her lowly tomb,
And the grass waves o'er her head.

The wintry blasts and the storms of years
Have swept round that mossy stone;
Her childhood's friends have long pressed their biers,
And her name is scarcely known.

Think ye no marks of her life remain,
Because she hath passed away;
Or that her labors were all in vain,
And lost like the ocean spray?

Nobly her mission was finished here,
And well hath she won her rest;
But do no fruits of her toil appear?
Were none by her efforts blessed?

Go mark that man who is bowed with age.
Whose brow bears the wreath of frost;
Long hath he walked o'er the world's broad stage—
Ask him if her life was lost.

For he, though changed, is the self-same child
That stood by her dying bed,
And sobbed aloud in his sorrow wild,
When he found his Mother dead.

Mark his reply: "I have wandered far,
I have swerved from duty's track;
But she hath served as a guiding star,
And her prayers have led me back.

"Oft when I've been in the festal hall,
Or stood where the wicked scoff,
Would thoughts of her on my spirit fall;
And I could not shake them off.

"And often, too, in the solemn night,
While all who were round me slept,
In dream once more she has blessed my sight,
And I awoke and wept."

A high reward have her efforts won,
And soon 'twill be hers to meet,
Where all is light, with the darling son,
She led to the mercy seat.

MINISTERS FOR REVIVALS.

Churches must select devout and efficient pastors, if they would see the work of God revived among them. Deep and ardent piety is the first qualification necessary in a pastor to promote a healthy state of religion in the church. In selecting a pastor, therefore, every other qualification should be held as subordinate to this. A pastor without this quality will be likely to prove worse than none, as he will lead the church backward instead of forward—he will prove a blind guide, that will lead the blind into the ditch. Piety in a pastor should be of no ordinary kind, it must be deep and thorough, influencing the whole man, his thoughts, his words, his actions. It must be an increasing piety; a light that shines brighter and brighter day by day.

It must be a steady piety, a flame that burns on with a steady progress, not flashing up with great brilliancy to-day, and dying away again to-morrow. Who can tell how extensive and lasting the influence of such a man will be!

Piety is not the only quality necessary for a pastor. He must have knowledge—knowledge of theology, knowledge of the sciences to a certain extent. How can a man without knowledge teach others? This may be a novel idea to some, yet I think it a true one. What, says some one, has it come to pass that an illiterate pastor can't get up a revival? No, nothing of the kind has come to pass. It is an opinion of long standing, and still in vogue, that an ignorant man, if he possesses some degree of piety, with a sprinkling of the "heavenly tone," can get up an excitement which will astonish the community, and it has often happened that a man of no piety has performed the same wonderful work.

Such revivals are often like the morning cloud and early dew; the converts don't stay converted. Visit the place which has enjoyed such a revival, and the labors of such a pastor, one year hence, and where will you find a majority of the converts? In Babylon? Far beyond Babylon, as much friends of the world as before their professed conversion. Are these the revivals to be advocated and promoted? If so, then I have nothing more to say. We need no more such revivals; we have had enough of them. We need revivals that move onward with a steady march, widening and deepening as they go, till the world shall be converted; and the men to promote them are those who have deep piety and extensive knowledge in the truth of God, as exhibited in his word and in his works. Paul tells us who they are: "Men who study to show themselves approved unto God, workmen that need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." It is not necessary that they should go through a course of study in college, or anywhere else, to be such men. They may get knowledge in the chimney corner or in the fields, if they wish to improve their minds, and if they don't they had better avoid the pastor's office. Men who are too lazy to study and think, are not fit to preach. Let the church look out for a man who will visit, if they wish to see vital religion flourish among them—a man that can visit at any time in the year or anywhere, that can open a door with a leather string, as well as one with a brass knocker. A man that only goes from his study to his pulpit, and from his pulpit to his study, or who only makes an occasional call, and then talks about every thing else but the subject of religion, is not fit to be a pastor. He will not be likely to enjoy much spiritual religion, nor have a very spiritual church.

"LET YOUR LIGHT SO SHINE."

A single illustration, happily introduced into a sermon, will sometimes fasten itself on the mind of a person, never to be forgotten. We remember a case in point. The substance of the sermon in which it was introduced is forgotten; but the point to which we refer is permanent. We have thought of it a hundred times, in connection with religious consistency.

The preacher referred to a light-house near New York, for illustration. The light, which is a revolving one, had ceased to move by reason of some derangement in the machinery. As soon as the keeper discovered it, he ran to the proper position, and by manual labor kept steadily revolving the light, until weariness compelled him to call another to his assistance; then another took his turn—and so during the live-long night, and the light kept its uniform revolution. A stranger, astonished at the solicitude of the keeper, inquired the cause. "Why," said he, "there may be a hundred seamen looking out from the darkness and storm below, to catch a glance at this light. If it move not, it will be mistaken for another, and, in their uncertainty and danger, they may lose the channel and be shipwrecked."

How many happy hearts passed over Broadway the next day, all unconscious of the danger to which they had been exposed, but for the faithfulness and consideration of that keeper of the light-house!

Christian, the world is looking on you. You may not know who are below in the darkness and storm of life's troubled sea—but you know the sea is stormy, and there are dangerous shoals to be avoided. Let your light give no uncertain gleaming on the gloom. Keep its motion uniform and continued! And when the day of eternity shall dawn, thousands may tread the streets of the New Jerusalem—who, but for the brightness and regularity of your light, might have made shipwreck of faith, and never moored in the harbor of eternal safety. THE RELIGION FOR A DYING HOUR.

That is the best religion which serves us best in the hour of death. How strikingly is this shown in the following contrast given by Mrs. H. C. Knight, which is the conclusion of a short biographical notice of Mrs. Barbauld, the authoress:—

Mrs. Barbauld was a dissenter, not only from the Establishment, but from the faith taught both in the Church and Assembly's Catechism. "The God of the Assembly's Catechism," she says, "is not the same God with the Deity of Thompson's Seasons, or Hutcheson's Ethics—unity of character in what we admire, is much more essential than unity of person."

"No one," she again says, "who embraces the common ideas of future punishment, the doctrine of election, insufficiency of virtue to escape the wrath of God, and the strange absurdity that sins committed against an infinite Being do, therefore, deserve an infinite punishment—no one, I venture to assert, can believe these tenets and be cheerful." And yet whose utterances are more dreary and mournful than hers, among her surveys of life gone and life to come? "What does life offer past eighty?" writes she. "For my own part, I only find that many things I knew, I have forgotten; many things I thought I knew, I find I know nothing about; some things I know, I have found not worth knowing; and some things I would give—O, what would not one give to know?—are beyond the reach of human ken. The powers of man strive—how vainly!—to penetrate the veil, to pierce the thick darkness which covers the future. Life seems of no value, but for what lies beyond; and yet our views of the future are perhaps cheerful or gloomy, according to the weather or our nerves."

How refreshing to turn and listen to the language of a more scriptural faith. "When and whither belong to Him who governs both worlds," spake Hannah More, at eighty. "I have nothing to do but to trust. I bless God I enjoy great tranquility of mind, and am willing to depart and be with Christ when it is his will; but I leave it in his hands, who does all things well."

"Jesus is all in all," exclaimed this aged believer at a later day, as with the eye of faith she penetrated the thick darkness which covers the future. "God of life and light! whom have I in heaven but thee?" Happy, happy are those, who are expecting to meet in a better world. The thought of that world lifts the mind above itself. O, glorious grace! It is a glorious thing to die.

WHAT IS LIFE?

The following beautiful description in answer to this question, is from Rev. Mr. Mountford's "Euthanasy:"—

"The present life is sleeping and waking; it is 'good-night' on going to bed, and 'good-morning' on getting up; it is to wonder what the day will bring; it is sunshine and gloominess; it is rain on the window, as one sits by the fire; it is to walk in the garden, and see the flowers open, and hear the birds sing; it is to have the postman bring letters; it is to have news from east, west, north, and south; it is to read old books and new books; it is to see pictures and hear music; it is to pray with a family, morning and evening; it is to sit in the twilight and meditate; it is to be well, and sometimes to be ill; it is to have business to do, and to do it; it is to have breakfast and dinner and tea; it is to belong to a town, and to have neighbors, and to be one in a circle of acquaintances; it is to have friends to love one; it is to have sight of dear old faces; and with some men, to be kissed daily by the same loving lips for fifty years; and it is to know themselves thought of many times a day, in many places, by children and grandchildren, and many friends."

MISSIONS AMONG CATHOLICS.

In view of the mission which our Board has resolved to undertake in Canada, we would call attention to the encouraging tokens which have attended the efforts of Protestants among Roman Catholics, the few years past.

At a meeting held in London, some two months ago, in aid of the Society for Irish Missions to Roman Catholics, it was stated, that between thirty and forty thousand people had within these four years abandoned the idolatry of Romanism, and made open profession of conversion to the truth as it is in Jesus. In one district, in the west of Ireland, where, between four and five years ago, there were not more than five or six hundred converts, there are now between five and six thousand. Between five and six thousand children are regularly attending the Society's schools, and receiving instruction in Protestant truth. In the western part of Galway, the Bishop has confirmed nearly two thousand converts from Romanism. In the same district where, at the commencement of the movement, there were only two Protestant clergymen, there are eighteen. Several new churches had been erected, where crowded congregations assembled every week to hear the gospel; and many additional schools had been built, in which thousands of children of Roman Catholic parents are regularly taught the Word of God.

The Rev. Mr. Bickersteth, who communicated these facts to the meeting, said he spoke not from hearsay or report; he had had the privilege of witnessing the operations of the mission himself, and of seeing with his own eyes the reality of the work.

Let these facts be taken in connection with the numerous secessions from Romanism that have taken place in Italy, in Germany, in Canada, and in the United States, and they will furnish one of the strongest inducements that can be laid before our denomination, to enter into and labor in a field hitherto deemed so unpromising. For what, except our own unbelief, is to hinder us from being as successful, in proportion to our numbers, as other Protestant denominations?

According to the sure word of prophecy, Papal Rome is that "daughter of Babylon who is to be destroyed." "Her plagues shall come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine; and she shall be utterly burned with fire; for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her." Rev. 18:8. We have strong reasons for thinking that this day of destruction is rapidly approaching—that it is nigh, even at the door. But before it can come, God's people must be set free from her superstitions. "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues."

Now, it appers to us, that the remarkable movements in Ireland, and other places, are but the beginning of a work, that must be accomplished before God can execute his wrath against great Babylon. The "remnant according to the election of grace" must be brought out of her, chastened and taught out of the Divine Law, and made secure in their hiding place, till the indignation be overpast. Could God destroy Sodom, till he "delivered just Lot?" Could he take vengeance on Pharaoh, till he had set the Israelites at liberty? Could he smite Babylon of old, till he had provided for the safety of his people?

We cannot resist the conviction, that there are great numbers within the pale of the Church of Rome, whose names are written in the Book of Life. God has not appointed them to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ. But faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God; and if we will not go and tell them words whereby they may be saved, God will send by other hands. Say, brethren, shall we bear a part in this work, or not?

Perhaps some have been accustomed to regard the wo denounced against Babylon as embracing, not only its hierarchy and leading characters, but all, or nearly all, of its subjects, from the highest to the lowest. If such is the view, it is not wonderful that it should be regarded as the most unpromising and hopeless of all missionary fields. But we see no necessity for this opinion. God's wrath will be sufficiently vindicated, if Babylon's existence, as a distinct spiritual power, "corrupting the earth with her fornication," shall be annihilated. But, in order to this, it does not appear necessary that the thousands of ignorant creatures, who have enjoyed no opportunity to hear and know the gospel, and whose sins are not so much their own fault as that of their spiritual confessors, should all be overwhelmed in the ruin. We doubt not, that for many of these poor creatures, there is mercy in store; and we think that this is emphatically the day when an effort should be made for their salvation. Let us see what we can do. "Who knows whether we are come to the kingdom for such a time as this?"

T. B. B.

New England Baptist Convention.—A Committee appointed for the purpose, of which Baron Stow is Chairman, has issued a call for a Convention of Baptists of New England, to meet on Tuesday, the 8th day of March, in the city of Boston. The following subjects for consideration are named in the Call:—

1. The condition and capabilities of our denominational institutions of learning in New England, including Theological Seminaries, Colleges and Academies, with reference to the necessities of the denomination, and generally of society at the present time.

2. The Convention is expected to consider the methods by which our institutions may be better adapted to the necessities above named, and by which, specially, their greatest usefulness to the cause of Christ may be secured.

3. The Convention is called to consider what can be done to give greater UNITY and EFFICIENCY to the operations of the Baptists of New England in the work of ministerial education.

4. In conformity with the wishes of many brethren, the attention of the Convention will be called to the question of gathering and perpetuating our denominational history, by the formation of a Historical Society.

The prominent objects embraced in the design of this Society are,

(1.) The printing of old books and manuscripts, with historical introductions and notes, with special reference to a complete history of the Baptists of New England.

(2.) The collection and safe preservation of books, pamphlets, newspapers, manuscripts, &c., necessary for illustrating the past and future history of the denomination.

(3.) The keeping alive a spirit of historical inquiry by annual historical addresses, with occasional publications of transactions.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Universal Testimony for Sunday—The Crystal Palace—Popery on the Continent.

GLASGOW, January 28th, 1853.

One of the curates of Bethnal Green, London, declares that "there is more trading transacted in Bethnal Green on Sunday than on any other day of the week." "One half (the shop-keeping class) of our population can never get out to church, and of the remaining half, a large proportion are induced to spend their hard-earned week's wages in the public houses and gin palaces which stand invitingly open to receive them." What should our Sunday-observing friends regard as the proportion or value to the universal testimony in favor of the first day of the week by the practice of such a community? But the details of a case at the Marylebone Police Office furnish us with another quota of that universal Sunday testimony which our metropolis affords. It appears that in London there is a peculiar representation given in the houses of some licensed victuelers, under the title of Judge and Jury Sunday Clubs. In the case referred to, 200 persons, men, women, and children, paying twopence each for the entertainment, were present while a mock trial was going on. On the ground that such exhibitions were calculated to bring the administration into contempt, the landlord of the house was fined forty shillings and costs. In such circumstances, it is perhaps little to be wondered at, that there are many, having no true appreciation of the end or origin of God's own Sabbath, who think that a weekly holiday might be better spent amid the displays of science and art in such a fitting situation as that of the Crystal Palace now preparing. The efforts of this class are being vigorously prosecuted. The Record and Christian Times, papers both watchful and apprehensive of the success of these efforts, give a copy of what appears to be a proof of an unissued placard by Mr. Mayhew, intended to call a delegate meeting in London, representing 100,000 working men, by whom it is designed that there should be an organized demonstration in favor of the opening of the Crystal Palace, Museums, Picture Galleries, &c., on Sundays. The Parliamentary "standing orders" have just been declared to have been complied with in the case of the Palace Co.'s Bill. It appears that £440,000 have been subscribed for the purchase of the grounds, (350 acres) at Sydenham, fitting up and furnishing the Museums, &c. The grounds are being rapidly prepared, roads being altered and enlarged, and several acres of the roof are covered in with glass. Columns are rising up like a plantation of young fir trees—from 1200 to 1400 men being at work—and although considerable injury was occasioned by storms, it is expected to be finished at the stipulated time.

But if the effort for the Sunday opening of the Palace be great, as in all probability it will, no less determined will be the measures of those who feel how much their traditionary holiday would thereby be affected. A meeting of the clergy of London was recently held, for the purpose of taking steps to oppose the opening. What conclusions were arrived at, has not transpired—no reporters having been allowed to remain, they having been told that the meeting was strictly private. Throughout the country, however, meetings have been held, and petitions to Parliament have been ordered, and the whole church forces got ready to pour in opposition to Parliament, in the shape of Petitions, Memorials, and votes of Members coerced to their terms. There is reason to fear that the same parties would display less zeal for the protection of God's own Sabbath, even if they fully knew it, than they are displaying for the day which men have sinfully substituted.

Yet we are occasionally surprised by singular and unexpected exceptions—or perhaps the true explanation is by being brought into contact with a different class of puplic functionaries. Thus the Leith Police Board, after careful consideration, have decided that for the sanatory advantages to the town, it is necessary that the streets should continue to be swept on Sunday mornings. On the other hand, however, in the neighboring city of Edinburgh, there is a Cabmen's Sunday Observance Society, who have addressed a Memorial to the inhabitants, praying them to discontinue the use of cabs on Sunday, unless in cases where, "on most careful and unbiased consideration," they have satisfied themselves that the Scriptures will bear them out. The being unable to attend church without the use of a cab, the Society does not consider to be such a case. But it is remarkable how little men thus talking of the Scriptures seem to know of the fact that the Scriptures say nothing of Sunday observance, either as to using or abstaining from the use of cabs on that day.

The progress of Popery on the Continent of Europe, and the fate of the Madiai, continue to excite the fears of Protestants. A meeting was held at Exeter Hall, London, in the beginning of the week, respecting the persecutions in Tuscany, and the aspects of Popery in this country—the Lord Mayor in the chair. The Rev. Dr. Steane stated to the assembly, that again application in behalf of the Madiai had been refused by the Grand Duke of Tuscany, although coming from a far more influential quarter than the recent deputation of European Protestants, or the personal request of the King of Prussia. Two newly-published letters of the prisoners, of date November 4th, 1852, show them to be in a true Christian frame of mind, and their persecutors as afraid even of their answers to the questions directly put to them on their trial. The Florence correspondent of the London Times, two days ago, says that Francisco is impressed with the conviction, even amounting to a mono-mania, that he is being systematically poisoned through all the food he receives. We marvel what any sane man would say under such conviction—if he may not repeat it as often as he has opportunity.

J. A. BEGG.

DENOMINATIONAL LITERATURE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Allow me, if you please, to make a few suggestions on the theme contained in the heading of this article. I readily confess, that I made, and I think understandingly, the remark that "we have no denominational literature." And after all that has been presented by Dr. Fahnestock and "W. B. G.," I feel more inclined to demonstrate the truthfulness of the assertion, than to recall it. After feeling, as I have, with the deepest intensity, the lack of a denominational literature, I cannot easily be brought to feel that that lack is merely imaginary. With me it is a settled fact, that admits of no question. Had it been otherwise, the denomination would have stood differently among the different sects in Christendom. But to this day it is shriveled and stinted in its body and members; circumscribed and embarrassed in its operations; secluded, and almost concealed from observation; feeble, faint, comparatively inefficient; hardly having made a mark upon the public mind, because it has not opened to the gaze of the church and the world "a denominational literature" that could command respect and obtain a hearing. And even those who may question the propriety of the remark made in that speech before the Publishing Society, could not conceal their mortification, if a respectable theologian of another denomination should ask the privilege of consulting our authors, with a view of learning the sentiments and character of the denomination. We could not present what a man of learning, or a man of ignorance even, would need to inform him on this subject. Beyond the single question of the Sabbath we could not go. And when the inquirer shall say, "Brother, loan me, if you please, your denominational 'Body of Divinity,' your works on the 'Atonement,' 'Justification,' 'the Will,' 'Baptism,' or your books on practical religion, or let me see your denominational hymns," and who is there of us that would not drop the head, to conceal our mortification as we answered, "Haven't got any." "What? have you no 'denominational literature'—no books—no authors? What does the denomination believe?" "Why, we believe that the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God, that all men to the end of time are bound to keep it holy unto God; and as for the rest of what we believe, it is like the Sunday Baptists in part, and part like the Methodists, and some like the Presbyterians. We believe in 'Barnes' Notes,' 'Clarke's Commentary,' 'Nelson's Cause and Cure of Infidelity,' 'Wayland's Moral Science,' 'Sunny-Side,' &c., &c." And what else could we say? By the time that we were well questioned on this subject by an honost inquirer, we should be forced to confess, that we have no "denominational literature" that we can offer as an exponent of our views.

I rejoice that in the matter of a Periodical Literature, we can offer our 'Recorder,' 'Visitor,' and 'Memorial,' with satisfaction. But we have no Theological Review, as a great exponent and advocate of our denominational sentiments. A weekly paper is but a poor medium for theological dissertations, biblical exegesis and interpretation, or elaborate doctrinal discussions. The history of the past has demonstrated this. If a doctrinal discussion has at any time assumed a critical or erudite character, it has of necessity been notified "to quit," as being too lengthy, or too recondite, or uninteresting to the mass of readers. Thus a doctrine half discussed, a truth half developed, the two sides of a controversy half drawn out, is all that the inquirer into a "denominational literature" has for his information. In the line of newspaper articles, "made to order," we are not vastly deficient. My knowledge of newspaper literature in former years, of almost all denominations, has taught me the pleasant truth, that we have no cause to blush before public criticism. Peace to the ashes of our former papers. Praise to the intelligent faces of our living ones. We love to look upon them. They are orthodox in sentiment, chaste in style, heavenly in spirit, with a vein of piety in a frame-work of truth; fearless, unbribed, and unbought; logical in argument, high-toned in reforms, answering well their purpose.

Beyond our Periodical Literature, we can advance but little. We have several unanswered and unanswerable works on the Sabbath, and a few other denominational works of merit. But our Psalmody is mostly borrowed from other denominations. The fire of sacred poesy has not burst out in our denomination, thrilling the hearts of its members, and raising them in devotional strains. We join with others in sacred songs, and sing their melody. Our Sabbath-School Books are all borrowed. Not one of them bears the imprint of our denominational press; so our children are trained in the literature of other denominations. No denominational pen, dipped in intelligent, instructive thought, has ever written a volume for a Sabbath-School Library. We have had one or two Question Books, but the progression of the times has laid them aside. There is a spirit in our schools that calls for newer, richer food, and seeks its supplies elsewhere, because we have no literature from which they can draw them. Every Sabbath-School in all the churches is saying, Give us a series of denominational books suited to our wants. And as oft as the demand is made, it is denied. And no one comes with the welcome messengers dropping from his fingers, to meet this lack. Hearts are groaning over the fact, and praying that some sanctified intellect may yet give us a series of Sabbath-School books that we can safely put into the hands of the children, and feel that through them the seeds are being sown that shall raise a more intelligent army of Sabbath-keepers, to reform the church, and bless the world. Who will furnish them? Echo answers, Who? The call is made oft, and yet it is made in vain.

We have a few miscellanies—a single tract on Baptism, one on Communion, and perhaps a few sermons. But aside from our Sabbath literature, we have no exegetical works, no books of sermons, no manual of doctrine. We have no American authors that claim that they have even stepped over the threshold of theological science, and entered the vestibule of religious literature. There are those who have looked in, and longed to enter—whose souls have beat high with the inspiration for sacred learning; but the inspiration has only caused the heart to beat the death dirge of its aspirations. We love whatever denominational bantling may have an existence; and each author among us cherishes his own brain-child with more affection than he bestows on adopted ones; and thus, as a people, we love our own literature, as far as we have any; and sometimes weep, like Rachel, because it is not, or not what it should be.

Our Literary Institutions are of a high grade. They have done much to lift the veil of darkness from our vision, and have given us much of the life that now inspires us, and points to a brighter future. From them we are looking for men—men of mind, of laborious critical thought, who shall hereafter give us a literature equal to the literature of other denominations. We have men of learning. We have men of intellectual vigor, graduates of colleges and theological schools, and some graduates from the "college of Providence," who can talk with educated men of another name. I speak not disparagingly of them. Among them there may be those who deeply sympathize with the uncleft skull of Jupiter, as his brain-child Minerva struggled for deliverance, impatient of the delay of the carpenter's axe to open to her the light of day. But we need, we must have more. To command the influence in the world that we are bound to command, we must have more and better educated men, who can give us a chaste, a learned, a sanctified literature, around which we all can cluster, and with which we can meet the learned world, and by which we will overthrow the dogmas and sophism of a corrupted theology. We may not boast of a denominational literature, till by it more than a synopsis of our faith can be gleaned. But we are yet to have one that shall make its mark upon the learned and the unlearned world. Toward this we are progressing with becoming zeal. More anon.

AGRICULTURAL LECTURES—NO. 2.

BY PROF. GURDON EVANS.

Spring Husbandry.

It is presumed that during the Winter, the season of respit from labor, every farmer has planned the general operations of husbandry for the coming year. The skillful General, in his campaign or attack upon the enemy's forces, always arranges his movements, stations his men, and provides for every emergency, so as to accomplish the most complete victory. A judicious system should govern all the labors of the tiller of the ground. By it he will be prepared to take every advantage of the condition of his fields and of the market, and make the most of his toil and expenses. Appropriate each field to a particular purpose; and select your seed before an exorbitant price is demanded for it, and before the market is drained of the best quality. See that your teams are provided for, and their amount of labor estimated for the year, so that they may not be overtaxed, or wanting at any time in good grain or fodder; your help engaged before the demand becomes great, and wages consequently higher; you will secure help enough, so that all your capital may be employed, and so farm your land that every acre may bring an income. No one is ever successful in hap-hazard farming. Usually, 60 acres should employ all the time of two hands and a good team. To make every acre produce the greatest amount, deep ploughing, thorough manuring, and the draining of all unnecessary moisture, are among the first prerequisites.

It is necessary for the agriculturist to keep all his farm accounts. He will thus be enabled to compare the expenses and income of his farm one year with another. He can better graduate all his outlays by his capital and the probable income of his harvest. We would laugh at the merchant or mechanic, who expected to succeed in his business, without keeping the strictest account of his proceedings. Yet why is it more necessary for them than for the farmer? The farmer should be provided with two books—a Journal of Entry, and a Ledger. In the former he should enter all his outgoes and incomes, as directed in works on book-keeping, reserving a space at the right hand for remarks upon the state of the weather, time of planting, sowing, hoeing, harvesting, &c. In the Ledger should be posted under one head all that belongs to each individual account, as help, team, each field, merchant, mechanic, blacksmith, &c. He thus will find it profitable and pleasant in determining which team is the most useful, ox, horse, or mule; which crop brings the best income. Other advantages accrue to the farmer, in the instruction of his boys in the methods of keeping accounts of business transactions, and in strengthening their judgments by enabling them to make just comparisons in the different ways of farming for different crops, and rendering them clear-sighted in planning their future operations.

As soon as the frost is out of the ground, the fences should be fixed, so as to confine your cattle in your barn-yards. They should not be allowed to wander at large; for in Spring the soft ground is easily poached by their feet, and the grain or grass consequently destroyed where their tracks are made. A hint might be given in the method of staking worm-fences. The method of cross-staking is greatly wanting in economy. Place your stakes upright in the acute angles, resting upon stones or blocks of wood, and bound together at the bottom and top by wire, number 8 or 9. All pressure, either by the wind or unruly cattle, has a tendency to tighten and make stronger the joints of the fence.

In this climate, the month of March embraces the labors of Spring ploughing. The objects of ploughing are too well known to be explained in full. The principal ones include the mellowing of the compact soil, and the destruction of noxious weeds. Yet why not harrow, instead of ploughing the ground? If stirring the top is all that is required, harrowing would answer. But the ground needs pulverizing to a considerable depth, to allow the plant, where it stands, to receive in a dissolved state its liquid aliment. The plant drinks, does not swallow its victuals in a solid state. Its roots should penetrate deep into the soil, so that it may extract the moisture. When the soil is finely pulverized, water from a great depth is brought up to the surface by capillary attraction, and this in a dry season is indispensable. Usually, in shallow ploughing, a stratum of earth, hardened by the tramping of your teams, and cemented by the iron worn from your ploughs year after, is formed where the bottom of the plough runs. This prevents the roots of the plant from penetrating deep into the soil, and the water from passing up to nourish the plant. The advantage of a sufficient supply of water, may be seen when we consider that many of the plants, as the grasses, are composed chiefly of it. The condition of agriculture will be preëminently ameliorated, when there shall prevail a mania to increase the depth of our acres, instead of their breadth. Then, the farmer will not be necessitated to plough as much, nor pay as great taxes, nor fence as many acres, nor employ so much labor. In Spring, I would never increase the depth of ploughing; for the reason, that some insects deposit their eggs below where the plough usually runs, and if brought up to the surface they will be hatched early in the season by the sun, and will destroy the young plant. If they are ploughed up in the Fall, they will be nearly if not entirely exterminated by the frost.

It is not yet determined, whether greensward had better be ploughed shallow or deep. When the vegetable mould is buried too deep, it will sour and prove injurious to the plant; and if it does not, the roots of the plant cannot readily nor freely extract its fertilizing properties; but it should be buried deep enough to be kept constantly exposed to moisture, else it will not be decomposed, and thus supply the plant with nourishment. In ploughing stiff clayey land, the furrows generally ought to lap a little, so that the soil may lie more loosely; but in sandy soil, the reverse should take place. Never plough while the ground is wet, for it is rendered hard, hence unproductive. In Scotland and England, farmers are encouraged to plough well, by the hope of thus becoming able to be successful competitors in their ploughing matches. The soil for any season, wet or dry, should be very finely pulverized, to enable the seed to be closely enveloped by the small particles of earth.

Other duties, at this season, devolve upon the farmer. The cattle will be kept inclosed, to hinder them from eating the dry stubble or contracting colds. The choicest fodder will be reserved until Spring for them and your teams. The same observations will apply to the sheep, hogs, &c. All the tools and other farming implements will be furnished and prepared for the coming season.

SHILOH, N. J., Jan. 25, 1853.

"DUNNING FOR SMALL DEBTS."

Under this head a late number of the Massachusetts Ploughman has the following:—

"We find it difficult to procure good agents to collect small debts—and we find it quite expensive to send for a two dollar charge. We have now a few on our lists who owe for two years' subscription. To such we have a special request to make—that they will pay us here, or send in by the postmaster, and save us the cost of sending an agent to dun for a small debt. Nobody likes to be dunned—and we dread dunning as much as any set of men—but we must engage in this disagreeable business from pure necessity. Will all of our friends who owe us for two years accept of the above as a kind and gentle hint of the importance of punctuality? Publishers of papers cannot afford to send agents to collect such small sums—yet without them we cannot pay our paper-maker and printer."

The difficulty of which the Ploughman complains, (says the Christian Watchman and Reflector,) is far more serious with papers which, unlike it, have a large circulation out of the State in which they are published. These "small debts," so easily overlooked, are the bane of publishers. Could they succeed in getting promptly paid their honest dues, what a saving would there be of commissions, traveling, and hard toil. These last it is, with actual losses in the neglect to pay at all, that cut down the income of publishers, and take from it its profits. We hope all in arrears for the Watchman and Reflector far and near, will at once save us the necessity of "dunning for small debts." Like our contemporary, we dislike the business, and engage in it only from "pure necessity."

Women's Temperance [illegible]eting.—A Women's Temperance Meeting was held at Metropolitan Hall, N. Y., on the evening of the 7th inst., at which speeches were made by "Mrs. L. N. Fowler, Mrs. Amelia Bloomer, Rev. Mrs. Antoinette L. Brown, Miss Susan B. Anthony, &c. &c." The Hall was well filled, and the speeches were received with considerable applause. The ladies were representatives of the "Women's New York State Temperance Society"—a Society formed at Rochester in April last—and one prominent aim of their addresses was to induce others to join them or organize similiar Societies. The costume of two of the speakers is thus described in one of the daily papers:—

"Mrs. Bloomer was attired in a dark brown changeable tunic or kilt, descending just below the knee, the skirt of which was trimmed with rows of black velvet. The pantaloons were of the same texture, and trimmed in the same style. She wore gaiters. Her head-dress was cherry and black. Her dress had an open corsage, with bands of velvet over the white chemisette, in which was a diamond stud and pins. She wore flowing sleeves, tight under-sleeves, and black lace mitts. Her whole attire was rich, but plain in appearance.

"Miss Anthony was dressed in the same costume, but plainer. Her dress was of longer skirt than that of Mrs. Bloomer. It was of black brocade silk, with pants of the same. The trimming was a simple white collar and cuffs, and a gold chain. Her hair was cut short in the neck and curled in front."

Convention of Colored Citizens.—The Colored Citizens of Ohio held a State Convention at Columbus, January 19th and 20th. About 200 were in attendance. Mr. Gordon, of Cleveland, presided. Among other important matters considered, was the formation of a State Society for the purposes of general improvement; the establishment of a weekly paper under the editorial care of Wm. H. Day; a resolution urging the colored people to become farmers and mechanics, to prepare themselves to enter the professions, to foster education, and to befriend and maintain unblemished morals. Another resolution advocated the Maine Law and its practice. Many of the speeches in the Convention were able, and the Editor of The Evangelist, who was present, says:—

"The impression of the meeting as a whole made us more hopeful as to the speedy elevation of our colored brethren than ever before. If those who composed this Convention are a sample of even the better part of this class of our population, Ohio need not be ashamed of her people of color. She has some people of paler faces who relatively have nothing to boast of on the score of sound sense, eloquence, temperance, or morals."

Fugitive Slave Missionary.—The Kingston (Jamaica) Dispatch reports the arrival in that Island of the Rev. H. H. Garnet, a well-known colored clergymen, formerly of the United States, as a Missionary from the United Presbyterian Church of Great Britain. Mr. Garnet lectured on the Fugitive Slave Law, in Kingston, on the 17th ult., to a large audience, who were highly delighted, says the Dispatch, "with the eloquence, clearness of delivery, and vividness of description, of the reverend gentleman." In its notice of the meeting, the same paper adds, that "Mr. Garnet is the first negro missionary sent out and employed by the United Presbyterian church as an ordained minister of the gospel. He was born a slave in Maryland, United States; escaped from bondage, along with his parents, when about nine years of age; obtained, by his own diligence and zeal, a literary and theological education, and was licensed and ordained by the Presbyterian church in America, as a minister in the State of New York. When the Fugitive Slave Law came into force in the States, he fled to England, offered his services to the Mission Board of the United Presbyterian church, and was unanimously accepted. He was at Kingston on his way to Westmoreland, where he is to be located."

Rev. Albert Barnes.—A clerical gentleman communicates to the Genesee Evangelist an extract of a letter from Albert Barnes, written in reply to friendly inquiries as to the effects of his late voyage on his health, and the prospects of its re-establishment. The friend had alluded to the prevalent reports that he must at least cease from ministerial labors for a time. The answer of Mr. Barnes is dated on the 13th ult., and contains the following: "It is even so; I am sentenced to absolute rest for two years. I send in my resignation of my pastoral charge to-day. What our people will do, I have no means of determining. I shall probably go into the country and raise potatoes. This is a great trial, and especially at my time of life, when I have so little time, at any rate, to labor in doing good. But I desire not to murmur and complain, for there is a Hand above that directs all my affairs—and all affairs."

Large Contributions.—The contributions to benevolent objects from the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, in the last six years, outside entirely of its own current expenses, have been over $48,000, or an average of $8,000 a year. In addition to this, the members of the congregation have paid a debt upon their own church property of $19,000, and have added to it a bell, costing more than another thousand. In the course of the same time 324 members have been added to the church, 73 have been dismissed from it, and 21 have died in it. So says the Independent.

Theological Seminaries.—The whole number of theological seminaries in the United States is 44. Number of Professors, 125. Whole number of students 1341. Number of volumes in different libraries, about 200,000, of which Andover has 21,000; Union Seminary, N. Y., 18,000; Princeton Seminary, 11,000; Lane Seminary, 10,000; and the Episcopal Seminary, New York, 10,000. Five of the Seminaries are Congregational, 11 Baptist, 9 Presbyterian, 3 Episcopal, 2 Unitarian, and 1 Methodist.

"The Greeks at the Door."—The Louisania Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church has several missions among the colored people in that State. A report on the subject, recently presented, has the following sensible suggestions in relation to the negro mission field in Louisania:—

"What say you, brethren, are not 'the Greeks at the door'? Here are an immense number of slaves without the Gospel, upon plantations from which they do not stir from one year's end to another, or during their lives. They are usually in large bodies; a single plantation can furnish a congregation sufficient to inflame the zeal of the preacher. The Missionary Society might employ three times the present number of missionaries in this field, and then there would not be ever one plantation supplied out of every ten.

"Few American planters are willing to shoulder the responsibility of denying the Gospel to one human being, much less to one hundred. It is a stupendous oversight and blunder of Christian zeal to raise funds to support missionaries at the rising or the setting sun, and at the same time neglect these fields of ignorance and destitution, simply because they are in our latitude and longitude. We do not place slave missions against foreign missions; let no one, on the other hand, put forth the foreign to the exclusion of the slave."

More Religious Persecution.—Letters from Genoa state that a trial had taken place in that city similar to that of the Madiai in Tuscany. The name of the accused is Daniel Mazzinghi, 25 years of age, a surgeon by profession. The trial took place with closed doors, but it is said that he was charged with having, in company with Capt. Packenham of the British Navy, preached against the religion of the State, and in praise of Protestantism. He was sentenced to imprisonment for three years, by virtue of the penal code.

The Hudson River Railroad is now the great thoroughfare between New York and Albany, running four trains a-day. Several important changes have recently been made in its management; among which we notice that Nelson J. Beach, Esq., formerly New York State Canal Commissioner, has been chosen Vice-President of the Company, and is charged with the active duties of President—the nominal President being unable to give his time to those duties. Under the new arragement, the affairs of the road are said to be conducted with unsurpassed energy and exactness.

☞ Elder W. B. Gillett having accepted a call to become the pastor of the Church at Shiloh, N. J., has presented his resignation to the Church at New Market, where he has been thirteen years, and it has been accepted by the Church, to take effect the first week in April, when he expects to move with his family to the former place.

New Market, N. J., February 6, 1853.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

The Montreal True Witness (Catholic) in a selected article on the threatened invasion of Great Britain by Louis Napoleon, makes use of the following loyal language: "Great Britain is the main stay of the enemies of God and Christ; she is drunk with the blood of martyrs; and in the approaching contest, the prayers of two hundred millions of Catholics throughout the world will daily and hourly ascend for her defeat."

It is said that the congregation of the Second-av. Baptist Church, New York, have granted to their pastor, Rev. Edward Lathrop, leave of absence for six months, in order to enable him to travel in Europe for the benefit of his health. They are also said to have determined not only to continue his salary of $2,500 per annum, but also to present him with a purse of $2,000 to defray the expenses of his proposed tour.

The London Morning Chronicle, of the 3d of January, announces, on the authority of the Leeds Intelligencer, that Honorable Miss Stapleton, daughter of Lord Beaumont, has embraced the Protestant religion. She received the sacrament in Carleton Church on Christmas Day.

There are at the present time more than two hundred licentiates of the Free Church, Scotland, whom the church fails regularly to employ, and many of whom have to carry on, in consequence, a dire struggle "in providing," to borrow a phrase from Johnson, "for the day that is passing over them." This is the only church not connected with the state which has a surplus of candidates, whether in Great Britain or America.

A member of Dr. Spring's church in this city has given $5000 to the O. S. Board of Education for establishing and sustaining parochial schools during the year 1853. The Board have accordingly given notice that they will appropriate $100 for the year to any school that may be established according to the plan of the General Assembly, and that may need assistance.

The Trustees of Dr. Adams' Church have abandoned their intention of building on the north side of Madison-square, New York, and have purchased six lots on the east side—three on Madison-av., and three on the south side of Twenty-fourth-st., in the rear of the avenue lots, on which they intend to put up a fine church edifice. The price paid for the six lots was $48,000.

Dr. Dwight, of Portland, Maine, in a recent sermon on Congregationalism, stated that there are 2500 churches in the British empire and provinces, of this order; and also, that the Foreign Missionary Society in their connection annually raises $400,000.

Isaac Darst, Esq., an Elder in the Presbyterian Church in St. Charles County, Mo., died on the first of December last. In his will he bequeathed his property, amounting to about $5,750, to the New Albany (Ind.) Theological Seminary.

The American Reform Tract and Book Society, at Cincinnati, offers $30 premium for the best Anti-Slavery Tract. Manuscripts should be directed to Rev. O. Bownton, Cincinnati, before the 1st of March next.

There is a movement on foot to endow the Union Theological Seminary, of this city, with $150,000, of which sum $90,000 has already been raised.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, FEB. 7.

In the Senate, a large number of petitions, resolutions, &c., were presented. The bill extending preemption rights to settlers on lands not surveyed, in certain cases, was passed. Mr. Cass' resolutions on the Monroe doctrine were then discussed in a long speech by Mr. Clemens. An unsuccessful attempt was made to get up the bill granting public lands for insane asylums.

In the House, Mr. Toombs asked leave (which was not granted) to offer a resolution looking to the opening of our entire coasting trade and all our rivers to the free competition of all nations. Evening sessions, to hear reports from Committees, were agreed to. Several private bills were passed, under a suspension of the rules, and the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, FEB. 8.

In the Senate, the bill granting further remedies to patentees, was passed. Mr. Weller, from the Committee on Territories, made a favorable report on the memorial of Messrs. Alden & Eddy for right of way, &c., for a line of underground Telegraph from the Mississippi to the Pacific, accompanied by a bill. The remainder of the day was occupied with a speech by Mr. Seward concerning the rights of American citizens as assignees of the grant of Garay of a right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec.

The House received a message from the President relative to negotiations with Great Britain, in which the opinion is expressed, relative to the fishing difficulties, that if Congress should pass an act admitting Provincial fish free of duty into the United States, on condition that the fishermen of the United States are admitted to a full participation in the Provincial fisheries, the Government of Great Britain would give effect to the measure by the requisite legislation on her part, in the expectation, on both sides, that the question of reciprocity, and of the use of the St. Lawrence and the Canals connected with it, will be taken up hereafter, with a favorable disposition to come to a mutually advantageous agreement on that part of the subject also. But the main business of the day was the consideration of two bills for organizing new Territories, upon neither of which was action taken. One is to establish the territorial government of Washington—to be composed of all that portion of Oregon lying south of the 49th degree of north latitude, and north of Columbia river, from its mouth to where the 46th degree of north latitude crosses the said river, near Fort Walla Walla—thence with the 46th degree of latitude to the summit of the Rocky Mountains. The other is to establish the territorial government of Nebraska, which, like the preceding, makes provisions similar to those which pertain to the other territorial governments. The boundaries are included between the summit of the Rocky Mountains on the West, Missouri and Iowa on the East, the 43d degree of north latitude on the North, and the territory of New Mexico and the parallel of 36° 30′ north latitude on the South.

FOURTH-DAY, FEB. 9.

The two Houses met in Convention, and the certificates of the Electoral votes of the several States were opened and their contends declared. The result was the announcement by the President of the Senate of the election of Pierce and King to the Presidency and Vice-Presidency.

FIFTH-DAY, FEB. 10.

The Senate was occupied mostly with petitions, memorials, private bills, &c., until near the close of the sitting, when Mr. Cass said something in relation to his Monroe Doctrine resolution coming up Monday, and took occasion to attempt a hit at Mr. Hale. That gentleman, as usual, turned the laugh on the Member from Michigan. Mr. Cass rejoined; after which came a speech or two on paying the debts of Texas.

In the House, the bills organizing the Territories of Washington and Nebraska were passed.

SIXTH-DAY, FEB. 11.

In the Senate another set of petitions urging the postponment of the steamboat law were presented. Mr. Mason, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a resolution in relation to the explanation of Messrs. Clayton and Bulwer, which accompanied the treaty made by them, closing thus: "In the opinion of the Committee, no measures on the part of the Senate are necessary to be taken in reference to such declaration and reply." Mr. Fish introduced an important bill for the better regulation and management of seamen on board merchant vessels. Some private bills were disposed of, and the Texas Debt bill was talked upon.

In the House, Mr. Seymour introduced a bill to establish reciprocal trade with the British Provinces. The Army bill was farther discussed and passed.

SABBATH-DAY, FEB. 12.

In the Senate, Mr. Hale presented a petition from Portage County, Ohio, praying that steps be taken to induce foreign governments to extend civil and religious liberty to their people. He said that, accompanying the petition, he had received a private letter, in which it was urged that this Government would effect that object, and that when those governments had done this act of justice, they would immediately appeal to this Government to extend civil and religious liberty to the millions of slaves in this country. The Senate passed the bill regulating the fees of the officers attached to the United States Courts.

The House passed the bill appropriating $19,500 for the relief of Col. Fremont, and then adjourned.

A Family Feud.—The Columbia (Mo.) Statesman says that the trial of the parties surviving the last fray between the Hills and Evanses, at a tobacco barn, in which some half dozen on each side were engaged, and several killed and others wounded, has resulted in their acquittal. The accouut further sates that the clans respectively have signed a formal treaty of peace, obliging themselves to refrain from further hostilities, except the Millschys and Mays, who still refuse to treat. It is also said, that by the various battles, assassinations, sieges, &c., among them, eight men and boys have been killed, several crippled and maimed for life, and forty-eight children left fatherless. The quarrel commenced about the year 1822. Strange as all this may appear, it has occurred in a country which we know to be celebrated for the intelligence and general moral worth of its inhabitants—the native home of personages no less distinguished in Kentucky than McKee, Robertson, Owsley, and Letcher.

California News.

A fortnight later news from California has been received since our last, of which we give the substance. The dates are to Jan. 15.

The Golden Gate arrived at Panama on the 28th ultimo, with $1,700,000 on freight, and 600 passengers.

The ship Aberdeen, Knapp, from New York August 10, was run into near San Francisco by a French ship. She bliged and sunk. Her cargo was totally lost.

The steamers J. Bragdon and Camanche came in collision on the 5th January, near Benicia, when the latter sunk in 15 feet of water, and three lives were lost.

An earthquake has been experienced at Los Angelos, but no serious damage was done.

The small-pox was raging fatally in Calavaros County.

Sacramento and San Juan Valleys were still flooded, and there was much distress among the miners. The roads, in many places, were impassable, and Flour was reported as selling at $1 per pound.

In the San Francisco market, Flour had declined. American was quoted at $34, and $36 75. Mess Pork, $35; Mess Beef, $25; Hams, 20c. Butter had advanced to 43c.

During the high water, five men were drowned in an attempt to cross the Yuba at Bridgeport.

Two white men and five Chinamen, in attempting to cross the South Fork of the American river near Mormon Island, in a small boat, were upset, and one white man and four of the Chinamen drowned. The current of the river was rapid, owing to its swollen condition, and swept their bodies immediately under.

The Union contains an account of the suffering and destitution at Downieville, from which we make the following extract: On Tuesday a party of eighteen men arrived at Nevada from Downieville in a most deplorable condition, half-starved and severely frost-bitten. They are a portion of the able-bodied citizens of that place, some seventy of whom have already left in consequence of the extreme scarcity of provisions. They report that the greatest destitution prevails in that place. The season is terribly inclement—inhabitants buried in snow, and scarcely any provisions in the market. There are but 150 pounds of flour in the place, and of pork, beans and meal, absolutely none.

The arrival of 2,500 sheep from New Mexico, is noticed in the Star. They are owned by a party of French, and will be driven towards San Francisco. Thirty-three hundred sheep, sold by order of the Administrator of Damas Lopez, brought an average of $6 25 a head.

About fifty Mormon Missionaries had embarked at San Pedro for San Francisco. They will take their departure hence, some for the Sandwich Islands, and others for the East Indios and Australia.

The dates from Oregon are to Jan. 7. The weather experienced in Oregon during the last two weeks in December was the coldest ever before known in the country. Snow had fallen at Portland to the depth of one foot, and the mercury for six days stood below freezing point. This unusually cold weather, together with the large quantity of snow fallen, cannot fail to destroy a large proportion of the stock throughout the country; particularly among the immigrant cattle. But few of the farmers have had the precaution to provide fodder for their stock during the winter, as it has seldom been found necessary; and it is impossible to conjecture with any degree of certainty now much loss will be sustained at different points, among the large herds of cattle; but it must be very great.

The people of Oregon were suffering severely from the scarcity and high prices of all kinds of provisions. Flour is selling at $18 and $20 per 100 lbs. The millers are paying $6 and $7 per bushel for wheat, and there is very litite to be obtained at that price. Potatoes command $2 50 per bush.; beef and pork is worth 18 and 25 cents per lb.; butter, $1 per lb.; eggs, $1 to $1 50 per dozen, and nearly everything else in the muck-a-muck line is in proportion.

SUMMARY.

A Convention of Delegates from the Banks in New England was recently held at Boston, to organize a Bankers' Association for the suppression of counterfeiting. An Association was organized by the choice of fifteen managers, whose duty it is to direct all the affairs and to devise and carry out plans for securing the desired ends of the Society. Any Bank in Massachusetts may become a participant in the Association by paying an assessment of five dollars for every hundred thousand dollars capital.

Bills are before Congress to establish two more Territories within our expanded area. One is the Territory of Nebraska, to embrace all the territory lying west of the States of Iowa and Missouri to the Rocky Mountains, running south to Utah and north to latitude 43° N. The other is the Territory of Washington, which is to embrace all of Oregon lying north of the Columbia River eastward to the Rocky Mountains on the line of 46° N., from the point where the river touches that parallel of latitude.

The New York Yacht Club have offered a prize of the value of five hundred dollars, to be sailed for on the 13th of October next, 1853, open to the yachts of all nations, provided one foreign yacht be entered for the race. The course to be from Robbin's Reef Light in the harbor of New York, around a vessel to be anchored twelve miles from the Beacon on Sandy Hook. The entries to close on the 22d of September.

The Rhode Island Free Soil Convention for the nomination of State Officers took place at Providence, Feb. 10. Edward Harris, of Northumberland, was nominated for Governor; Stephen Wilcox, of Westerly, for Lieut. Governor; Stephen K. Rathbone, for Secretary of State; B. E. Borden for Attorney-General; Henry Coddington for Treasurer; John H. Willard for Congress from the Eastern District.

A slip from Norfolk gives the particulars of the awful mortality on board the ship Antarctic. Small pox, ship fever, measles and dysentery, were prevailing among the passengers, numbering 500 to 600. The captain and first mate had both been sick, and the second mate died. No deaths had occurred after the ship anchored in Hampton Roads.

While a Court was being held on Monday, Feb. 7, at Glencove, L. I., in the store formerly occupied by Wm. Harrald, Jr., the floor gave way, falling 19 feet, whereby eleven persons had their legs or arms broken, and all were more or less injured by bruises. One man died in an hour and a half afterward. John Williams is supposed to be mortally wounded. George W. Merritt came out apparently unhurt, but as soon as he came into the air became deranged. The persons injured are among the first men in town.

The Potato Rot, Western journals assure us, is about to be abolished. A citizen of Michigan has discovered its cause and the means of preventing or curing it. The secret is not out, however, but the Chicago Times says: "Arrangements are being made to bring this discovery before the people in such a manner as will best subserve the interest of the public, and at the same time amply reward the discoverer."

In December last, a large quantity of Irish butter was received at this port from Ireland. This butter was put up at auction, and a small lot sold, the remainder being withdrawn. The remainder of the lot, 44,000 pounds, was reshipped for Liverpool by the Europa, the owners being unable to find a market for it without sustaining a loss.

Rev. Dr. Murray, alias Kirwan, describes Achilli is a short man, firmly built, with jet black hair, and a black and restless eye. His age may be an advance on forty years; his manners are pleasant; and in "conversation he is free, decidedly talkative."

The ship Ticonderoga, Capt. Boyle, arrived at Melbourne, Australia, on the 3d November, with a large number of passengers from Liverpool, two hundred of whom, it is said, were then sick on board. They had previously buried one hundred and twenty at sea.

The articles to be sent from Newfoundland to the approaching Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations, at New York, will consist of the staple productions of fish and oil, ornithological and mineralogical specimens of rare beauty and value, and a very curious model of the seal fishery, besides Esquimaux curiosities, and a family of the natives of that country.

The Palmer (Mass.) Journal says: "About two weeks since a carpet-bag, containing $48,000 in cash, certificates of stock, &c., was stolen from the baggage-room of the Norwich and Worcester Railway. A few days since, Patrick Barnes was arrested on suspicion of committing the offense, and the property was found in his possession."

From Mexico we learn that the new President Cevalos, recently dispersed his refractory Congress at the point of the bayonet, after which he issued a decree to call a Convention to meet in June to reform the Constitution, &c. The City of Mexico has at length also declared for the revolution.

Master Tappan, one of the first of Daniel Webster's schoolmasters, is dead. He had a fall recently on the ice, which was the proximate cause of the illness that has terminated thus fatally. Master Tappen was upward of eighty years of age. He leaves a wife and several children.

The ship Three Bells, of Glasgow, from Port Philip, Australia, bound to London, was spoken on the 24th December, having on board one hundred thousand ounces of gold dust on freight, and 20,000 ounces in the hands of pasengers—a total of $2,200,000.

Milton, Rock Co., Wisconsin, has now a Railroad Depot and a Telegraph Office. If we mistake not, this opens communication by steam, if not by telegraph, between Milton and—every part of the world. What a change since Joseph Goodrich settled there a few years ago.

A letter from Tunis, dated Jan. 3, says: "The Bey of Tunis is dangerously ill. The country is in a distressed condition. A famine is threatened, and the currency is so depreciated by Government, that it is not worth 40 cents on the dollar, and foreign merchants refuse to receive it in payment of debts."

The steamer Atlantic arrived at New York from Liverpool, Feb. 7, in just one month from the day she sailed for that port. To cross the ocean twice in thirty days, unloading one cargo and loading another, is no trifling feat for the dead of winter.

Returns from the election in Vermont show an overwhelming majority in favor of the stringently Prohibitory Liquor Law enacted by the last Legislature. This law is very far beyond the Maine Law in its severity, and will almost insure the destruction of the Liquor Traffic in Vermont.

The Parkersburgh (Va.) News says: J. H. Palmer alias Wheeler has been arrested there on a requisition from the Governor of New York, charged with forgery to the extent of $12,000 to $14,000 on parties in Genesee County.

The Camden (S. C.) Journal is informed that at a sale of that portion of the estate of the late John S. Cunningham, lying in Pickens County, Ala., negro women brought from $1,000 to $1,100, and fellows from $1,100 to $1,256, while families sold at corresponding rates.

The steamship, Atlantic which arrived at New York last week, had on board the largest cargo ever brought to the United States by a single steamer from Liverpool; it was valued at $1,500,000.

A Drogheda paper says that the labor of removing so ponderous a column as Cleopatra's Needle to Old England, will be the most costly needlework ever heard of.

James Hunnewell, Esq., of Charlestown, Mass., has tendered to that city fifteen hundred dollars toward the establishment of an Athenæum or City Library.

The Chicago and Rock Island Road, from Chicago to Lasalle, at the head of navigation on the Illinois River, 100 miles from Chicago, will be opened in March ensuing.

At the Convent of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd at St. Louis, on the 25th ult., two young ladies were received as novices, and a third took the final vow of the order.

The late freshet on the Susquehanna River has done considerable damage. Several bridges on the Elmira and Williamsport Railroad were carried away.

The Cunard steamer Niagara, with three days later advices from Europe, arrived at New York Sunday evening, Feb. 13. The news is unimportant.

The next Fair of the New York State Agricultural Society is to take place at Saratoga Springs.

Thomas Casey, who is in jail on a charge of murdering Ouvra Taylor and his wife at Natick, in September last, has made a full confession of his guilt. He says he quarreled with Taylor about a half dollar, and killed him, and that Mrs. Taylor being awakened by the struggle, came to the door, when he also killed her with an axe. Casey is 20 years of age.

Mr. Doty, of Wisconsin, is about to introduce into the House of Representatives, under the rule, a petition accompanied by a bill appropriating $500,000 for the immediate construction, under the direction of the Postmaster General and Topographical Engineers, an Air-line Post-route Railroad from Washington viâ Baltimore and Philadelphia to New York.

A strike for higher wages among the laborers in all the various departments connected with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, took place in Baltimore the other day. Some 2,500 to 3,000 persons were engaged in it.

The project of a railroad from New York to Albany, on the west bank of the Hudson, continues to be agitated on the line of the proposed road.

It is believed that the Illinois Legislature will repeal the Free Banking Law. A bill for its repeal has gone to a third reading in the Senate.

MARRIED,

In Hopkinton, R. I., Jan. 30, by Eld. D. Coon, Mr. Nathan M. Crandall and Miss Allura J. Willcox, all of Hopkinton.

In Scott, on the 30th of Dec., 1852, by Rev. J. S. Lord, Mr. Henry Barber 2d and Miss Irena West, both of Scott.

DIED,

In Adams, Jefferson Co., N. Y., Jan. 16th, 1853, at the house of Mr. Joseph Hull, Sylvester Hull, aged 13 years and 24 days. Sylvester was early left an orphan, and adopted into the family of Mr. Hull, to whom, by his kind disposition, faithfulness and activity, he so endeared himself as to be regarded by them as a son and a brother. On the 3d of January he went to the barn for the purpose of watering a colt, and stopped in the yard a few minutes to exercise the animal in play. When next seen, he was leaning against the fence, his face covered with blood. Upon taking him into the house and examining the wound, it was found that his forehead was badly fractured by a kick from the colt, and pieces of the bone were forced in upon the brain. The operation of dressing the wound and extracting the pieces of bone from the injured brain, was endured by him with a heroism and fortitude peculiar to himself. Though the operation was so extremely painful that some of the attendants were obliged to retire from the scene, he uncomplainingly yielded himself to the surgeon's knife and saw. He lingered until the 16th, when his sufferings were terminated by death. Sylvester was one of the most active among our Sabbath-School scholars, and by the School his loss is deeply and solemnly felt. His funeral was attended by a congregation of sympathizing friends, on the 17th. What makes the case more singular is the circumstance that about three years since he received a similar injury in his forehead, about equal in extent to the last and fatal one, and from the same cause—the kick of a colt—from which he recovered. Truly, "All flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass." J. S.

In Oswego, N. Y., Jan. 18, after an illness of two days, Thomas L. Green, son of Winter and Lucretia Green, of Berlin, in the 37th year of his age. His remains were taken to Berlin by his father, and interred in the family burying ground.

Near Vancouver, O. T., Dec. 17, of inflammation of the lungs, Mary Eliza, wife of Silas D. Maxson, aged 30 years.

In Scott, N. Y., on the 21st of Nov., 1852, of dropsy, Pollina, wife of John Barber, in the sixty-second year of her age. She was a worthy member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Scott, and was among the first that joined the Church after it was organized, in 1820.

In Scott, on the 7th of January, 1853, of typhus fever, Jane, daughter of George and Mary Frink, aged nine years.

In Scott, on the morning of Feb. 2d, 1853, of typhus fever, Henry Barber, aged 37 years. Also, in the same place, on the morning of the 3d, of the same disease, John Barber, Jr., aged 29 years. They were brothers, living in the same house, and in company in their work. They were both members of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Scott.

In Newstead, N. Y., Jan. 24th, of hemorrhage of the stomach, Ira Hunt, eldest son of Samuel Hunt, aged 23 years. When about fifteen years of age he made a public profession of religion, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Clarence, of which he remained a worthy member until death.

In Hopkinton, R. I., on the 2d inst., Mr. Nathan Edwards, aged 72 years.

Light.

THE subscribers invite the attention of all persons who desire a cheap, brilliant, and safe light, to their Safety Phosgene Lamps and materials for burning.

They are also manufacturers of Burning Fluid and Camphene, together with the various kinds of Lamps, all of which they offer, wholesale and retail, on the best terms.

Call and see, at 117 Fulton-street.

Sept. 16—6m. CHAS. STARR, Jr., & Co.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses; Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

American Baptist Register.

THIS Volume, now issued, contains 496 pages; or, reckoning the 26 engravings as two pages each, 548 pages. It is printed on beautiful paper, and embraces (including the ornamental stamp on the cover) engravings of 27 church and college edifices. The sketches of State Conventions, Associations alphabetically arranged, names of churches, dates of constitution, counties in which located, pastors, the baptized in 1851, number of communicants, with the names and post-offices of ordained and licensed ministers, fill 373 pages. These are followed by the American Indian churches, also the Welsh and German churches. Summary tables of the Associations in each State, (the most complete we have ever seen,) fill 26 pages. These are followed by valuable tables, embracing a comparative summary, colored members, Sabbath schools, ratio of churches, ministers and members to the whole population, Baptist periodicals, ordinations, churches constituted, new church buildings dedicated, and obituary notices. Then follows the educational department, embracing theological seminaries, colleges, academies, high schools, &c. Also an account of our Benevolent Societies. Next we find tables of the Baptist churches in other countries, British Provinces, Europe, Asia, and Africa. The concluding pages contain an account of the Anti-Mission, Free-Will, Six-Principle, Seventh-day Baptists, &c., with a grand summary of baptized Christians and religious denominations.

No description of the volume will do it justice. It must be seen to form a correct idea of the expense and labor bestowed upon it. In view of the expensiveness of so many statistical pages, its engravings, &c., it is one of the cheapest volumes ever issued. It contains 200 pages more than was anticipated when the price was announced.

Price, bound in cloth or sheep, $1 50; five copies, $6. It will be sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, for $2.

Published by the American Baptist Publication Society. Orders for the Register should be directed to Rev. B. R. Loxley, 118 Arch-street, Philadelphia.

Just Published.

THE DEMOCRACY OF CHRISTIANITY, or an Analysis of the Bible and its Doctrines, in their relation to the principle of democracy. By Wm. Goodell. Cady and Burgess, New York. Sold also by William Harned, 48 Beekman-street, New York. The first volume is occupied with an examination of the Old Testament; the second volume carries the investigation into the New, shows the bearing of the leading doctrines of the Gospel upon the principle of democracy, examines the institutions of the New Testament, traces the progress and the influence of Christianity in promoting human liberty, to the present time, and, in the light of Scripture prophecy, as illustrated by the signs of the times, unfolds the future prospects of humanity. The work is designed to promote liberty, both in the Church and the State, and to show that the cause of human freedom is identified with the Christian religion.

Price $1 50 at retail, $12 per dozen, or $90 per hundred.

SLAVERY AND ANTI-SLAVERY: A History of the Great Struggle in Both Hemispheres; with a View of the Slavery Question in the United States. By William Goodell, author of "The Democracy of Christianity."

This work is designed to embody a great amount of historical information in a single volume, conveniently arranged for reference. It contains fifty chapters on as many distinct topics, embracing the most important facts in the political and ecclesiastical history of the contest, together with an account of the Anti-Slavery agitation in England and the United States up to the present time; the divisions among American Abolitionists, and the various measures advocated among them; and closing with a brief discussion of the question, "What ought to be done?" The book is an abstract of several volumes, besides the Anti-Slavery history of the last twenty years, a great part of which has never before been collected into any volume, but lies scattered in the newspapers of that period. The Table of Contents and a copious Alphabetical Index will facilitate a reference to particular facts, and to dates when desirable.

It is a large royal 12mo. volume, of about six hundred pages, well printed, on handsome paper, neatly bound in cloth, and lettered. Price one dollar per copy, at retail; $9 per dozen, or $65 per hundred, to booksellers and book-pedlars, for cash.

The postage on a single copy will be 30 cents to any part of the United States, and must be prepaid.

For sale by the publisher, William Harned, 48 Beekman-street, New York.

Miscellaneous.

Poverty in New York.

A writer in The Courier and Enquirer, who has recently devoted considerable time to explorations of the abodes of Vice and Misery in this City, thus indicates some of his discoveries:—

"We could tell of one room, twelve feet by twelve, in which were five resident families, comprising twenty persons of both sexes and all ages, with only two beds, without partition or screen or chair or table, and all dependent for their miserable support upon the sale of chips, gleaned from the streets, at four cents a basket—of another, still smaller and still more destitute, inhabited by a man, a woman, two little girls and a boy, who were supported by permitting the room to be used as a rendezvous by the abandoned women of the street—of another, an attic room seven feet by five, containing scarcely an article of furniture but a bed, on which lay a fine looking man in a raging fever, without medicine or drink or suitable food, his toil-worn wife engaged in cleaning dirt from the floor, and his little child asleep on a bundle of rags in the corner—of another of the same dimensions, in which we found, seated on low boxes around a candle placed on a keg, a woman and her oldest daughter, (the latter a girl of fifteen, and, as we were told, a prostitute,) sewing on shirts, for the making of which they were paid four cents apiece, an even at that price, out of which they had to support two small children, they could not get a supply of work—of another of about the same size occupied by a street rag-picker and his family, the income of whose industry was eight dollars a month—of another, scarcely larger, into which we were drawn by the terrific screams of a drunken man beating his wife, containing no article of furniture whatever—another warmed only by a tin pail of lighted charcoal placed in the center of the room, over which bent a blind man endeavoring to warm himself; around him three or four men and women swearing and quarreling; in one corner on the floor a woman, who had died the day previous of disease, and in another two or three children sleeping on a pile of rags; (in regard to this room we may say that its occupants were colored people, and from them but a few days previous had been taken and adopted by one of our benevolent citizens a beautiful little white girl four or five years of age, whose father was dead and whose mother was at Blackwell's Island,) another from which not long since twenty persons sick with fever were taken to the Hospital and every individual of them died. But why, extend the catalogue? Or why attempt to convey to the imagination by words the hideous squalor and the deadly effluvia, the dim undrained courts oozing with pollution, the dark narrow stairways decayed with age, reeking with filth and overrun with vermin, the rotted floors, ceilings begrimed, crumbling, oft-times too low to permit you to stand upright, and windows stuffed with rags; or, why try to portray the gaunt, shivering forms and wild, ghastly faces in these black and beetling abodes wherein from cellar to garret

"Have we a Bourbon among us?"

Putnam's Monthly has an article entitled, "Have we a Bourbon among us?" which gives a detailed statement of the evidence which goes to show that the Indian Missionary, Rev. Eleazar Williams, is no other than Louis XVII. of France, the Dauphin of revolutionary history, son of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette. The principal points in this curious bit of romance are as follows: The Dauphin was born March 25, 1785. After the death of his mother in 1793, he was put under the care of Simon, the brutal cobbler, by whom he was treated with the most barbarous cruelty. In Dec., 1794, the Convention passed a decree to send him out of the Republic. On the 9th of June, 1795, his death was announced to the Convention, three surgeons testifying that he died of scrofula. To come now to the history of Rev. Mr. Williams. Prior to the age of thirteen or fourteen, every thing is blotted out of his memory. Until that time his mind is a blank. Bathing at Lake George, with a group of Indian boys, he plunged head foremost from a high rock into the water. He was taken up insensible, laid in an Indian hut, and restored to life. This is the first remembrance of which he is conscious. He was the reputed son of Thomas Williams, a half-breed Indian, descended on the mother's side from Rev. John Williams of Deerfield, Mass., who, with his family, was carried captive to Canada in 1704 by the Indians and French. He was sent to school at Longmeadow, Mass., and put under the care of Mr. Ely. Subsequently he was under the tuition of Rev. Mr. Hale of Westhampton. On the breaking out of the war of 1812, being then 27 years of age, he took up arms as an Indian chief on the American side, and was wounded at the battle of Plattsburgh. During the war, he became acquainted at Albany with Lieut. Gov. Taylor, who introduced him to his rector, Rev. Dr. Clowes and Rev. Dr. Butler. His attention was thus drawn to the Episcopal Church. At the close of the war, he was introduced to Bishop Hobart, and soon after, under his sanction, became a missionary among the Oneidas. On the removal of the Oneidas to Green Bay, he accompanied them to that place, where he has remained until within a recent period. He is now an Indian Missionary at St. Regis and Hogansburg, on the St. Lawrence, in this State. His reputed mother lives with him at a very advanced age. We now take another step in this strange history.

On the arrival of the Prince de Joinville in New York in 1841, one of his first inquiries was whether there was such a person known as Eleazer Williams among the Indians in the northern part of the State. Learning his location at Green Bay, the Prince proceeded thither. Williams happened to be at Mackinac, when the steamer in which Joinville had taken passage, touched at that port, and joined the company for Green Bay. Soon after leaving Mackinac, the Prince was introduced to Williams by the Captain of the steamer. At the first sight of Williams, he became greatly agitated, he turned pale, his lips quivered, but soon recovering himself, he engaged him in conversation. This continued most of the time until their arrival at Green Bay the next day. The Prince then told Williams that he had some matters of great importance to speak about, and after gradually preparing the way, informed him that he was born in Europe, and was the son of Louis XVI. He then wished him to sign a document, which he presented, abdicating all claim to the crown of France in favor of Louis Philippe, on condition that he should receive a princely establishment either in this country or France, with the restoration of the private property belonging to him which had been confiscated in France during the Revolution. After reflection, Williams declined the proposal, and the Prince went about his business without further palaver. Such is a bare outline of the story, which our readers will find well and fully told in the Magazine.

We will add only one or two of the collateral points. A gentleman, on returning from Europe, in an interview with Mr. Williams, threw several engravings on the table, at the sight of one of which, and without seeing the name, Williams was greatly excited, and cried out, "Great God! I know that face. It has haunted me through life." It proved to be the portrait of Simon, the jailor of the Dauphin. The names of all the other children of his reputed mother are inscribed in the Catholic baptismal register at Canghnawaga, following so closely, at intervals of two years between each, that Williams, whose name does not occur, could scarcely have been her son. In 1848, Mr. Belanger, a French gentleman, who died at New Orleans, confessed on his death-bed that he was the person who brought the Dauphin to this country, and placed him among the Indians, in the northern part of the State of New York. A French gentleman, hearing the story, read a printed account of the Dauphin to Williams, in which it was stated that the jailor one day, being angry with the child, snatched a towel that was hanging on a nail, and, drawing out the nail with it, inflicted two wounds upon his face, one over the left eye and the other on the right side of the nose. On examining Williams' face, the scars were found on the spots indicated in the memoir. It is stated that the Dauphin died of scrofula, and that the disease was on his knees. The marks of scrofula are plainly visible on the knees of Mr. Williams. The French Ambassador Genet acknowledged in 1817, before Dr. Francis and others, that the Dauphin was alive in this country. Boxes of clothing and medals of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette were left with the child, one of which is still in Mr. Williams' possession. Such are the prominent facts in this singular history, which, to say the least, is equal in interest to the mystery of the Man in the Iron Mask, or Caspar Hauser. [N. Y. Tribune.

A Bit of Romance.

About six years ago, a Dr. H——, having become involved in debt, left his home and wife in another State for Texas, for the purpose of improving his fortunes in a place where he would be free from the demands of clamorous creditors. In the course of time he went with the army to Mexico, and finally wended his way to California. After residing there some time, he met a young man from the place of his former residence, who, however, he did not know, and inquired of him if he knew his wife, whom he described, without, however, telling him the relation he bore to her. The young man replied that Mrs. H—— was his sister, and the last he heard of her she was in St. Louis. After accumulating a competence, Dr. H—— left for St. Louis, for the purpose of seeking his wife, who had long since given him up as dead. In St. Louis he learned that she had left that place some time previously, and was believed to be in New Albany. He came hither, and upon inquiry learned that she was earning a livelihood by sewing. He learned that she also believed her brother to be dead, not having heard from him for many years. Dr. H—— went to the house where he understood his wife was living, but found she had left there a few days before. He inquired about her general conduct and demeanor, and found that it had always been unexceptionable. She spoke but little of her husband, but told every one that she considered him dead. The lady of whom Dr. H—— was making inquiries discovered that he was the long lost husband, and offered to accompany him to the house where his wife was sewing. Upon arriving there she said to her, "Mrs. H——, here is a gentleman who saw your brother in California." She appeared astonished, looked at the visitor, but apparently did not recognize him. He brushed back his hair, and said quickly, "Eliza, don't you know me?" Mrs. H—— immediately swooned away, and fell on the floor. In the same moment a husband and brother, both supposed to be dead, were restored to her. Dr. H——, as we have said, has returned with a competence, and the supposed widow, it is presumed, will no longer sew for a livelihood.

The above statement, we are assured, is strictly correct. Here is a scene in real life equal in strangeness to any to which romance ever gave birth. [New Albany (Ind.) Ledger.

Draining Plow.

B. P. Johnson was the agent of New York State in attendance upon the World's Fair in London. In his report to the Governor, he gives the following account of one of the implements exhibited:—

"Fowler's Improved Draining Plow was shown, and one was also exhibited in operation a few miles from the Exhibition. It is stated to execute any drainage above four feet deep at less than half the cost of the present system, and without disturbing the surface soil. In commencing the work, the plow is taken to one end of the field, and to the other the capstan, off the drum of which is run a wire rope attached to the plow. The plug and coulter are then dropped into a hole prepared for them, and the drain pipes are threaded upon a rope attached to the back of the plug; when the horses attached to the levers of the capstan, by walking around, wind the wire rope on the drum and pull the pipe forward with the drain pipes, which are thus laid, when the soil is suitable, free from stone, more accurately than by hand. It has been in operation for a few years, and the improvements which have been made, as exhibited, in the one on trial, seemed to promise its practical adaptation for that country. It is thus referred to in the report in this class: "But for the American reapers, Mr. Fowler's draining plow would have formed the most remarkable feature in the Agricultural Department of the Exhibition. Wonderful as it is to see the standing wheat shorn levelly low by a pair of horses walking along its edge, it is hardly, if at all, less wonderful, nor did it excite less interest or surprise, among the crowd of spectators, when the trial was made at this place, to see two horses at work by the side of a field, on a capstan, which, by an invisible wire rope, draws toward itself a low frame-work, leaving but the trace of a narrow slit on the surface. If you pass, however, to the other side of the field, which the frame-work has quitted, you perceive that it has been dragging after it a string of pipes, which, still following the plow's snout, that burrows all the while four feet below ground, twists itself like a gigantic red worm into the earth, so that, in a few minutes, when the frame-work has reached the capstan, the string is withdrawn from the necklace, and you are assured that a drain has thus been invisibly formed under your feet." The Jury decided as follows:

"The implement went through the trial very well, laying in the tiles with great apparent ease, worked by two horses, with a capstan which was firmly and easily fixed into the ground, and afforded a firm traction to the plow by means of a wire rope and pulley." Progress has been made, since the implement was exhibited at Exeter, in rendering the level of the drains in a degree independent of the level of the surface, "but there is still room for further improvement in giving to the drain an uniform incline." The award, therefore, of the Jury, was Honorable Mention."

Arrow-Root, its Growth and Manufacture.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Evening Post, writing from Key West, thus speaks of this plant, a native of Florida:—

The everglades are separated from the sea by a strip of land varying from four to ten miles in breadth, and from two to three hundred miles in length, almost completely encircling it, and covered with a rich growth of pine. Scattered about at their feet is a modest little plant that the Indians call comptee, but more generally known as the arrow-root. The tops resemble the tansy of the north, but it is of the root I write. Covered by a thin soil, it is easily dug, and when removed, it presents an appearance similar to the sweet potato and the yam, but more irregular in shape and with a thicker, tougher covering. Carried by mules to the mill situated upon the edge of some one of the numerous streams running from the glades to the sea, they are thrown into a large cylinder, the circumference of which is formed by bars of wood and separated from each other a few inches. The cylinder revolves and a stream of water constantly flows upon the roots; they are thus thoroughly cleaned, and their surface coming in contact with the rough edge of the transverse bars, the roots are peeled and ready for the grinder. This machine reduces them to a pulp, which is passed through vats of fresh water, and thoroughly cleansed from all impurities. The mass is now of a milky white, resembling curd, and must be spread upon frames with cotton-duck bottoms, to the thickness of three inches, and exposed to the sun. This drying process is quite rapid in our hot climate, and is the last preparation (save raking the pulp and breaking the dried mass into small grains) in the manufacture. It is then boxed and ready for market. The whole process of digging, peeling, washing, grinding and drying, may be gone through with between sun and sun.

The simple manner of manufacturing arrow-root requires but a small outlay for machinery, and the mills now making the article are all small and the productions not extensive. It is only within a few months that this arrow-root has been experimented with by northern manufacturers as a substitute for potato starch and glue, and the result of all fair and impartial trials has eventuated in a decided preference for the arrow-root starch. The supply of roots is almost unlimited and the production can easily be increased, so that if the crop of potatoes fail, the pine woods of Florida will turn out a substitute that will eventually drive the potato from the market, and that esculent will be produced only for food. The present value of the starch made in the everglades is about $12,000 per annum, and it all finds its way to New York.

Cravats.

Professors Hamilton's remarks at the Buffalo Medical College on asphyxia, and particularly that form caused by wearing tight cravats, may be of interest to the general reader.

Cravats were first worn by the Croats in the sixteenth century, as a part of their military dress. Public Speakers, Members of Congress, and Clergymen, hang themselves by wearing cravats and stocks, high an tight, thereby impeding the return of blood from the head; this can be explained on physiological principles. The brain, in speaking, is excited to increased action, a larger quantity of blood is sent to the substance, and unless it can find a ready return, produces congestion and apoplexy. Students are not altogether free from the effects of ligation of the neck. It is surprising how little pressure is necessary to prevent the ready flow of blood from the head. Those who bend their heads forward as in writing or studying, are apt to feel a dizziness and heaviness in the head, which loosening their cravats or collars altogether relieve, and the mind returns to its original clearness. In clergymen who are particularly prone to bundle their necks with large cravats, bronchitis is induced, and the vocal chords become relaxed as the consequence. Men who speak longer and with greater ease than those who read, as their voice is not confined so much to one key, and can be modulated with greater freedom.

What is a Dollar?

In 1518, the Count of Schlick, at the Bohemian town of Joachims-Thal [Joachim's Dale] coined silver pieces of an ounce weight. Other princes had often coined ounce pieces of silver; but these, being coined in great number and being of good weight and purity, acquired a wide circulation, and became known by the name of Joachims-thaler (or Joachim's-Dale-piece,) a name which was afterwards abridged to Thaler (or Dale-piece) whence our English word DOLLAR. The German word, Thaler, is applied in Europe to various coins of various governments, differing in value according as different governments have diminished the weight, or debased the standard of what originally purported to be an ounce-piece of silver. In the English language, and particularly in this country before we had a silver coinage of our own, the word dollar, when used without explanation, was applied to a certain Spanish coin, the Spanish piastre. As the richest silver mines in the world were owned by Spain, the silver coin of that country became almost universally current; and the Spanish milled dollar, or "piece of eight," became, in the common use of words, the standard dollar. To Manage a Rearing Horse.

In the British Sportsman we find the following hint respecting the management of a rearing horse, which strikes us as being worthy, as it is easy, of a trial:—

"Whenever you perceive a horse's inclination to rear, separate your reins and prepare for him. The instant he is about to rise, slacken one hand, and bend or twist his head with the other, keeping your hands low. This bending compels him to move a hind leg and of necessity brings his fore feet down. Instantly twist him completely round two or three times, which will confuse him very much, and completely throw him off his guard. The moment you have finished twisting him around, place his head in the direction you wish to proceed, apply the spurs, and he will not fail to go forward. If the situation be convenient, press him into a gallop, and apply the spurs and whip two or three times severely. The horse will not, perhaps, be quite satisfied with the first defeat, but may feel disposed to try again for the mastery. Should this be the case you have only to twist him, &c., as before, and you will find that in the second struggle he will be much more easily subdued than on the former occasion; in fact you will see him quail under the operation. It rarely happens that a rearing horse, after having been treated in the way described, will resort to this trick a third time."

Magnetic Telegraph to the Pacific.

A proposition is before Congress to build a line of Magnetic Telegraph to California, and have it completed within eighteen months. It emanates from James Eddy, the manager and a considerable proprietor of the Maine Telegraph Co. His plan is novel, inasmuch as it proposes an underground line, encased in gutta percha, and this substance encased in a metal tube, for additional protection to the wires. The sinking of the line some three feet below the surface is considered the only feasible method of preserving constant and unbroken communication. The usual mode of construction by posts and wires would be a perpetual temptation to the savages of the vast plains it would traverse to make depredations, as well as to the exhausted emigrant seeking fuel for his pot. The exposure, too, of posts and wires to the storms of the mountain ranges the line must cross, far away from stations and settlements, would be such as to subject it to constant, and oftentimes long-continued interruptions. Mr. Eddy proposes to establish stations on the line at intervals of one hundred miles, with a well sheltered and provided force of five men at each, who, when not engaged on the line, will devote themselves to agricultural pursuits, and thus gradually gather supplies for the emigrant, and form a nucleus at the different points for trading and general supply stations. A SINGULAR FAMILY.—In a small village in the Bouches du Rhône, (France,) there is a family of three persons—husband, wife and daughter—who have made a solemn vow to preserve the most profound silence. A traveler who lately passed their dwelling finding it necessary to make some "inquiries" respecting his way, applied to these eccentric people. Not receiving any answer to his questions he repeated them, when, to his great astonishment, they, in a fit of exasperation, seized a cudgel, tongs and turn-spit and threatened him with summary castigation. This extraordinary conduct is explained by the fact that the parties had become the dupes of a clerical imposter, who had taken advantage of their credulity by holding out to them the acquisition of a great treasure on condition of their maintaining a strict silence. They have formed the resolution to keep such silence for the space of nine years, only one half of which term has yet expired. But as so complete an interdiction of the use of the tongue could not fail to become intolerable to the female portion of the family, the imposter granted them permission to indulge their natural propensity anywhere beyond the limits of their Commune. In order to avail themselves of this privilege the two women regularly repair every market day to the little town of Belfort, where they enjoy the conversation of their neighbors and mitigate to some degree the privation which they voluntarily edure.

DISEASES OF ANCIENT NATIONS.—Rev. Thomas Starr King, in his lecture on "Show and Substance," holds a post mortem examination over the remains of ancient nations, and finds they did not perish by the might of foreign conquerers, but by their own innate corruption. Such would be their verdict: "Babylon died of delirium tremens; Ninevah, apoplexy; Persia, weakness of the spine; Greece, quick consumption; Rome, paralysis." The present characteristics of nations were hit off happily thus: Ireland was hungry and dirty; France was troubled with neuralgia and St. Vitus' dance; Spain had the scurvy; Austria was bad off with colics and cramps that required the utmost nursing skill of the the Russian Czar; Germany was subject to the gout and headache; England had a plethora—while even in our youthful nation signs of a great black cancer might be seen on our lower limbs." [Auburn Advertiser.

COOKED FOOD FOR COWS.—Mr. James S. Huber lately stated before the Philadelphia County Farmer's Club, that he had proved by actual experiment in feeding 12 cows 180 days upon cooked food, that he made a net gain of $32. In place of 20 lbs. of hay per day, formerly fed raw, he now feeds 12 lbs. cut and steamed. With this he mixes 4½ quarts of shipstuff, Indian corn meal, and oil cake meal, in about equal portions. This, with the hay, weighs about 46 lbs. when cooked, having gained 31 lbs. by that process. He says it is not only more economical, but more palatable to the cattle; they eat it without waste and keep in better condition. His steaming apparatus cost $25, which he more than saved in six months feeding. He considers, however, the greatest gain is in the health of the animals.

IRVING'S INTRODUCTION TO WASHINGTON.—Washington Irving, while at Mount Vernon the other day, remarked that he remembered seeing Gen. Washington in New York, when he was a child five years of age. While the General was passing through the street, accompanied by a crowd, young Irving was attended by his nurse, an honest Scotch woman. The woman forced her way up to the General, leading her child by the hand, and approaching, addressed him: "Yare honor, here is a bairn that is called after you." The General paused, and placing his hand upon the boy's head, gave him his blessing. Mr. Irving states that he has a distinct recollection of the whole scene, which occurred in the year 1787.

VARIETY.

Mr. Simonson has on the stocks, at his yard, foot of Eighteenth-st., New York, a steamship, nearly completed, named the Morning Star. She is 270 feet length of deck; 38 feet breadth of beam; 22 feet deep, and 2,400 tuns measurement. She is to have two powerful engines, and two masts. This vessel is being built for a gentleman of fortune of this City, and is to be finished off in the most magnificent style, without regard to expense, as a steamer yacht, and he intends taking his family and a few invited guests and sail the first of June next to Europe, remaining there about five months, during which time they will visit London, Copenhagen, Stockholm, St. Petersburg, Havre, Bordeaux, Lisbon, Gibraltar, Marseilles, Naples, Malta, and other ports, remaining at each port for a short time, giving fêtes, &c. The whole expense, which is to be borne by the projector, it is estimated will be nearly $300,000.

A dispatch dated Chicago, Monday, Jan. 31, 1853, says: On Saturday evening, the steam boiler of the stationary engine at the Junction Railroad exploded, and three men, named Cornelius Reichter, James Gallagher, and James Bergen, were instantly killed. B. S. Curtiss, the foreman, and J. McCord, engineer, were badly wounded, the latter probably fatally. The boiler was thrown a distance of 26 rods. The cause of the explosion was the neglect to supply water.

The editor of the N. Y. Tribune says: A jaunt to Chicago has just given us the opportunity of seeing the country along the line of the Erie Railroad, with Northern Ohio and Indiana, Southern Michigan, and a small portion of Illinois. Everywhere the winter has so far been a very open one. At Chicago there is no snow at all, and has been none. In Indiana, Ohio, Michigan and this State, the ground is just covered, but we have not seen five miles of continuous good sleighing in the whole distance.

Dr. Schofield, in a letter to the 'Daily Times,' asserts that 500 lbs. of opium are sold by retail, weekly, in New York. This amounts to 25,000 lbs. per annum, and does not embrace the quantities that may be purchased at wholesale by some of those who daily use it. He states that 'its use is fearfully on the increase in this city, and it is constantly receiving recruits from the alcoholic ranks as a cheap means of producing intoxication.'

A failure took place recently in New York, being that of a person in the dry goods jobbing trade, whose capital had been, a year since, $12,000, and whose liabilities are 8390,000. The personal expenses of the two members of the firm are given at $37,000 each for eleven months, or three times the whole capital in the business.

The reclaimed lands in Arkansas, from leveeing the Mississippi, are enough for a small state or principality. The Sabbath Recorder,

Published Weekly.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in Advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

DEDICATION OF CHILDREN.

BY WILLIAM M. FAHNESTOCK, M. D.

Preliminary Remarks.

I embrace the earliest moment of limited leisure from anxious responsibilities and distracting cares, to redeem my pledge to elaborate the few hints on the Dedication of Children, incidentally introduced into my article on Motherheart, feeling that procrastination is, truly, the thief of time, and realizing, daily, that whatsoever I find to do, I must do quickly; therefore, at the risk of not doing my subject full justice, I sit down to write some further exposition of that endearing rite, in such snatches of time as I may be able to command for that purpose.

Most of the difficulties in the discussion of a theological, as well as of a metaphysical subject, arise from the fog in which the partizans become enveloped, at the very onset of their tilt; and this, mostly, for want of a proper understanding of terms vaguely employed, or, rather, from the misunderstanding of ideas connected with those terms; and as I have no desire to bandy words, or afterward enter a rejoinder, that might become necessary from that cause; and having seen some of the difficulties of steamboat navigation, as well as of polemic disputation, from dense fog, I shall imitate the practice of my good friend, the Captain of the Steamer John Stevens, (appropriately dubbed the Commodore of the Delaware,) who never leaves his moorings in a thick fog, nor continues his trip, when out, unless he can distinctly see his bearings on the shore; and as I have been interrogated respecting the proof "that the Saviour did ordain, as a rite to be observed in his church, that little children should be brought, and that hands should be put upon them, and prayer offered for them," I shall have to premise my exposition of the Nature and Propriety of that rite by some explanations of the terms, ordinance, rite, example, privilege, dedication, consecration, and duty, in their religious sense, to a clear comprehension of my comments to follow; so as to escape becoming stranded in the fog of polemic theology, and thereby losing much time in waiting for the mist to blow off. And this becomes the more necessary, inasmuch as so little unanimity prevails among theologians in regard to the ordinances of the Christian Church, and the great confusion, made by almost every theological writer, in the ambiguous use of the terms, ordinance and rite. Unless we get a clear insight into this matter, on starting out, and a full knowledge of the perplexities we may have to encounter, we may, like sailing over shoals and reefs, become completely arrested, before we get much under way, for want of this precaution. As an anecdote sometimes saves a long discussion, to evoke a principle or fix a rule, so a pertinent one, here, may serve my purpose, to impress the propriety of this course. The late Stephen Girard once advertised for a Pilot. Next morning two seafaring men entered the Counting-House of the Mariner-Merchant together. The one in advance addressed Mr. Girard on the subject of the advertisement, and assured him that he had never been "grounded" in the Delaware, during many years service. Mr. Girard turned to the second person, and inquired his business with him. The man replied, that it was not worth while to tell him his errand, for the other person was in first, and he could not give half so good an account of himself as the former had, for he had been on every bar in the river. Mr. Girard, with the keen sagacity that always characterized his transactions, employed the latter at once. So in a disquisition, or a discussion, if we are advertised where the reefs and sand-bars lie, we may avoid much battology and unnecessary explanations.

While the Roman Catholic Church enumerates seven ordinaces, or "sacraments," on which there is not the slightest difference of opinion respecting their import or binding authority, yet, in the Protestant Church, where but two ordinances are generally recognized as attaching to the Gospel System, much diversity of opinion prevails amongst them, in regard to the nature and the character of the two—namely, Baptism and the Lord's Supper. Thus Brown, in his "Body of Divinity," for so it is labeled, although the title page reads, "A Compendious View of Natural and Revealed Religion," makes thirteen "Instituted Ordinances of the Covenant of Grace"—1. Reading the Scriptures; 2. Meditating on the Word of God; 3. Preaching of the Word of God; 4. Hearing God's Word read or preached; 5. Spiritual Conference; 6. Prayer; 7. Ministerial Blessing in the name of the Lord; 8. Singing Psalms; 9. Vowing; 10. Religious Fasting; 11. Solemn Thanksgiving; 12. Baptism; 13. The Lord's Supper[*]—while the learned Dr. John Gill denies that Baptism is an ordinance of the Church, although he concedes that it is an ordinance of God, and contends that its responsibility rests solely in the heart of the Administrator[†]; and the great Robert Hall, while he upholds the law and the obligation of Baptism, does not regard it as the necessary initiatory ordinance into the Christian Church, but repudiates it as essential to enjoy the privileges of the Lord's Supper.[‡] It may be well for us, in these circumstances, before we send out our bark to sea, to encounter the tempestuous billows of controversial disquisition, to get a good Chart of all the dangerous promontories and delusive inlets, where there may be a chance that we shall have to pass the Scylla and run the Charybdis; and I therefore proceed to affix some proper sense to terms, which are often confounded and used indiscriminately for each other.

1. Ordinance. Calmet, in his Dictionary of the Holy Bible,[§] defines ordinance, "An institution established by lawful authority;" and in elucidation says: "Religious ordinances must be instituted by the great Institutor of religion, or they are not binding; minor regulations are not properly ordinances. Ordinances once established are not to be varied by human caprice or mutability. The original ordinance seems to have been sacrifice, to which prayer and praise were naturally appended. Circumcision was an ordinance appointed to Abraham and his family; Baptism and the Eucharist are ordinances under the Gospel." Brown, in remarking on his thirteen ordinances, says, "In these divinely instituted ordinances, God does not only come near to us, as in his Word, but we draw near to him;" yet Dr. Dwight, very properly, regards the mass of them as "Means of Grace," instead of pure ordinances; but adds to the two cardinal ordinances a third, namely, Christian Discipline.[*] Noah Webster calls an ordinance a permanent rule of action; and Taylor, with much propriety, says, "Observance commanded." From these definitions and explanations, I would, in the absence of a full definition of religious ordinance, deduce and concentrate the following as the proper meaning: An institution established by the Law-Giver in Zion, of standing or fixed appointment, for the observance of his Church; which observance, being imperatively imposed, requires implicit obedience. And the first ordinance I would name as a standing institution of fixed appointment, is the Sabbath—the seventh-day Sabbath—"the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." The Sabbath is a distinct and explicit ordinance, established by positive, scriptural injunction, and is the only pure, general religious ordinance, obligatory on all persons. I cannot occupy space, in this place, to establish this position—a position which, I presume, all the readers of the Recorder will readily admit. Baptism is a contingent ordinance, and the Lord's Supper is more inferred than absolutely commanded; but more of this presently. Notwithstanding many persons are great sticklers for the observance of "the holy day," yet it is strange, passing strange, that they should disregard, so shamefully, the claims of the true Sabbath—the only Sabbath ordained of God—to leave his statutes and testimonies, and cleave to the beggarly elements of man's invention. The second ordinance that I would enumerate, is Baptism. Apostolic baptism I am perfectly willing to admit as a standing institution of fixed appointment—having its own peculiar laws and rites, for the implicit observance of every believer seeking entrance into the Gospel Church; but it certainly has its conditions and prerequisites attached to it, and may be an ordinance with Dr. Gill's phase of it; but I cannot see the force of its claims to an ordinance, in Robert Hall's view of it. Under the Old Dispensation, there were moveable feasts; so Hall's view of baptism would render it a moveable ordinance—a sliding scale almost equal to that of our Pedobaptist friends—not essential, whether immersion, pouring, washing, or sprinkling. And the last institution, partaking of the character of an ordinance, I would name, is the Lord's Supper. I cheerfully grant, that it partakes enough of the nature of a standing institution of fixed appointment, for occasional observance, to recognize it as a pure ordinance, but the indefinite and imperative phraseology of the precept, for its obligatory observance—"so often as ye do it, do it in rememberance of me"—militates very much against making it a standing institution of fixed appointment. It is deficient, as a positive ordinance, in an important element, absolute, unequivocal injunction for its recurrence—the law for its regular or periodical observance. It partakes as much of a privilege as of an absolute ordinance; yet so high and so holy a privilege, as not only to make me willing to regard it as a special ordinance, but to acknowledge the obligatory propriety of devoutly attending to it, on every suitable occasion, as the source of much comfort and blessing to humble, sincere disciples. More anon on this point. Still, while I believe that a peculiar blessing attends the baptism of a penitent Believer, and that a similar blessing accompanies the worthy reception of the symbolic elements of the body and the blood of the Crucified Redeemer, yet I cannot regard it, as some do, an ordinance for the remission of sins, but simply a means for growth in grace; unless indeed it attach, which I do not now assert, to a rite of the Lord's Supper, originally connected with it, yet entirely discarded in the present day by nearly all the churches of Christendom, namely, Feet-Washing—an essential matter, in my opinion, to the full administration of all the rites and ceremonies appertaining to the legitimate administration of the Supper. If these three, the Sabbath, Baptism, and the Lord's Supper, be full ordinances of the Gospel Church, they are all, and particularly the first, as it is the most perfect, entitled to our implicit and faithful observance.

2. Rite. The term rite, or religious rite, is constantly confounded with ordinance, by some of the very best writers on theology, to the great confusion of some minds, and sometimes to the most interminable perplexities in theological discussions; for many, nay, most persons treat them as synonymous terms, and cannot see the difference from the habit of regarding them of like import. It therefore becomes necessary to settle this difficulty, that on naming the dedication or blessing of children as a rite, I may the more easily remove the confusion from those minds accustomed to look upon it as employed as an ordinance. Rite is defined, in the "Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge," simply to mean, "A solemn act of religion—an external ceremony;" and Hammond represents it, truly, as "the manner of performing divine or solemn service, as established by law, precept, or custom." While an ordinance may be a rite, yet a rite—all rites—cannot properly be an ordinance. An ordinance may be observed, or administered, by a single rite, or an ordinance may, as it generally does, consist of several rites. Thus, in reference to the Passover, which was an ordinance under the ancient dispensation, the children of Israel were directed to observe it, "according to all the rites of it; and according to all the ceremonies thereof, shall ye keep it." Num. 9: 3. That, I believe, is the only place where the term is employed in the whole Scriptures. So far as my memory serves me, it is no where applied to another ordinance; and here it is employed in the plural; intimating that such rites and ceremonies are essential to the observance of the one ordinance. To a clear understanding of this matter, I transcribe the elucidation that Crabb gives, in his work on "English Synonymes"—(the most authoritative work extant)—of several terms, oft-times indiscriminately used and confounded, namely, form, ceremony, rite, and observance. "Administering an oath by a magistrate, is a necessary form in law; kissing the King's hand is a ceremony practiced at Court; baptism is one rite of initiation into the Christian Church, and confirmation another; prayer, reading the Scriptures, and preaching, are different religious observances. As far as ceremonies, rites, and observances, respect religion, the first may be said either of an individual or a community, the second only of a community, and the last, more properly, of an individual, either in public or private. The ceremony of kneeling during the time of prayer, is the most becoming posture for a suppliant, whether in public or private. The discipline of a Christian Church consists in its rites, to which every member, either a layman or a priest, is obliged to conform. Public worship is an observance, which no Christian thinks himself at liberty to neglect."

3. Example. In Buck's Theological Dictionary,[*] religious example is defined, "A copy or pattern in a moral sense, as either taken for a type, instance, or precedent, for our imitation. * * * Or example as taken for our imitation, or a model for us to copy after. * * * Examples (the same writer says,) have a peculiar power above naked precepts to dispose us to the practice of virtue and holiness, may appear by considering, 1. That they most clearly express to us the nature of our duties in their subjects and their sensible effects. General precepts form abstract ideas of virtue, but in example virtues are most visible in their circumstances. 2. Precepts instruct us as to what things are our duty, but example assures us that they are possible. 3. Examples, by secret and lively incentive, urge us to imitation." This is clear and satisfactory enough; but as Crabb makes delicate shades of distinction, I shall append his remarks on example, pattern, and ensample. "All these words, says he, are taken for what ought to be followed: but the example must be followed generally, the pattern must be followed particularly, not only as to what, but how a thing is to be done: the former serves as a guide to the judgment, the latter to guide our actions. The example comprehends what is either to be followed or avoided; the pattern only what is to be followed or copied: the ensample is a species of example, the word being employed only in the solemn style. The example may be presented either in the object itself or the description of it; the pattern displays itself most completely in the object itself; the ensample exists only in the discription. * * * Our Saviour left us an example of Christian perfection, which we ought to imitate, although we cannot copy it; the Scripture characters are drawn as ensamples for our learning."

Example has been the prominent, if not the uniform, mode of teaching the observance of ordinances and rites, from the beginning of God's economy among men. God rested on the Sabbath long before he announced his law in reference to it. He taught his people by the example of withholding the manna in the wilderness, on the seventh day, that it was his holy Sabbath, prior to his teaching them, by precept or edict, that it was his will that man, generally, should regard that ordinance. Christ submitted to the Baptism of John, and thus set the example for others, long before he announced his commission to his disciples, to go and "teach all nations, baptizing them," &c. So with the Lord's Supper—with all and every rite and ceremony connected with it—rising from the spread repast, washing the feet of the disciples, blessing the emblems of his broken body and shed blood—all exhibited before there was any explanation of their nature—any intimation given of their design or their significance—before the precept to observe was given. These things did the Master for our edification and growth in grace—for our example—for our imitation: and as he graciously extends his favor to our children, so should we witness, that he introduced the tender and affecting example of blessing little children—to bring them into consecrated association with ourselves and himself—by imitating the example he set before us for our imitation. All his ordinances and rites have been given to us as much as precious privileges as obligatory duties—as privileges not to be despised, but as absolute blessings to us and our offspring; the which can only be appreciated and enjoyed by yielding implicit obedience to the Master's holy example.

4. Privilege. Religious privilege may be defined—(for among all the lexicons and all the biblical cyclopædias, to which I have access I cannot discover any thing like a good definition or explanation of religious privilege, in brief, didactic language)—the distinguished favor of approaching unto the Lord, and the peculiar right of appropriating unto ourselves, all and every mode of his own appointing connected with his means of grace, adapted to our capacity and condition, "whereby God not only comes near to us, but we draw near to him." I have said the favor and the right: it is strictly a favor, for we cannot merit any thing more; but that favor becomes a right from the relation of the circumstances. Crabb says, pertinently, on this subject: "Privileges are rights granted to individuals, depending either on the will of the grantor, or the circumstances of the receiver, or both." This right we accord exclusively to the unmerited favor of the precious Redeemer, who gave it as a gracious offspring to meet the inherent wants of man's renewed nature.

While the observance of the Sabbath, and the institution of Baptism, are the only absolute ordinances, imposed by positive command, many of the religious observances, usually regarded as ordinances, are, in fact, nothing more than distinguished privileges. I can enumerate but two, Prayer and the Lord's Supper, with a few remarks, lest I overrun all bounds to my article.

Prayer is better comprehended by the renewed heart, than can be defined in any form of words. All the most distinguished writers and lexicographers, to whom we look for clear views of the meaning of words and terms, particularly when used in a special sense, give a very concise, as well as similar, definition of the term prayer. Thus, Shakspeare, Milton, Dryden, Sheridan, Hammond, Johnson, Richardson, Taylor, Stillingfleet, and Webster, render it by the same equivalents—"To make petition to Heaven—to entreat—to ask submissively—to supplicate—to implore." Bailey defines it, A request or desire to Almighty God. Prayer, according to the "Wetminster Catechism," is the "offering of our desires to God for things agreeable to his will, in the name of Christ, with confession of our sins, and a thankful acknowledgment of his mercies"—thus embracing petition and thanksgiving. Crabb distinguishes, nicely, between prayer and petition. "Our prayers to the Almighty, (says that discriminating writer,) respect all our circumstances as moral and responsible agents; our petitions respect the temporary nature of our present existence." And Calmet pertinently remarks, "Prayer directed to God is the ordinary conveyance of graces received from him. * * * The saints under both covenants prayed; Jesus Christ himself, our great example, taught us to pray, to show that thereby we honor God and draw on our souls his favors and graces. Paul, in most of his Epistles, entreats the flock to pray for him, or offers God his prayers for them."

Prayer, certainly, is the greatest favor or grace conferred on man. It is a high and holy privilege, far above any other favor, save the gift of the Only-Begotten, to die for our rebellious race, that has ever been bestowed upon the sons and daughters of earth. While the Sabbath, Baptism, and the Lord's Supper, are distinguished favors—exalted privileges—precious ordinances—to promote our growth in the divine life, neither of them, nor all of them together, are by any means so great a privilege as prayer—the favor of audience and personal importunity with the Almighty, in all our cares, in all our trials, and in all our tribulations, here below; for the man of prayer may be accepted of God without the Sabbath, without Baptism, and without the Lord's Supper, when denied the great privilege of enjoying them; but he cannot be saved, with the Sabbath, with Baptism, and with the Communion, without a spirit imbued, deeply imbued, with prayer. The oppressed heart would oftimes break, and we should perish by the way, had we to await the return of the Sabbath to pour out our distress of soul at the throne of Grace; Baptism can be enjoyed but once, and the Communion may not be relished for want of peace of soul—a distraction incident to earth—to earthly cares—which perturbation can only be soothed by access to the Mercy Seat, in devout, fervent, wrestling prayer: yet, with all its distinguished favors—distinguished above all other forms and modes of intercourse with God—by which "He not only comes near to us, but we draw near to him"—surpassing every other favor—yet it is only a privilege, and is not imposed upon us as a sacrifice; beautiful as the figure may be in asking the Lord to accept our morning or our evening sacrifice. Jahn defines sacrifice, "that which is offered directly to God, and is in some way destroyed or changed, which is done, as far as respects the flesh employed in the sacrifice, by burning it, and as far as concerns the libation, by pouring it out."[*] Notwithstanding David has declared, that "the sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise," I repeat, that prayer is not imposed as a sacrifice, although we have the terms "sacrifice of thanksgiving;" Psalms 116: 17, and Amos 4: 5; yet evidently used in both places in a figurative sense, precisely the same as in the passage, "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service." Rom. 12: 1. Prayer is constantly commended to us in the Scriptures, but no where absolutely commanded by positive injunction. It is one of those matters or duties which we infer more from the privilege than as demanded by requirement. Although in perfect consonance with the spirit and the whole tenor of the New Dispensation, yet there is no requirement to pray at any one time—the privilege creates the obligation. The commendation of the blessed Master is: "Men ought always to pray;" and Paul exhorts us to "pray without ceasing." What means, "Men ought always to pray," and "Pray without ceasing?" Are we to make long-continued prayers without interruption or any cessation? The Scriptures prohibit "vain repetitions," and we are instructed in the Inspired Word, that "we are not heard for our many words." What, then, do these passages mean? I conceive that they mean, to cherish, at all times, a prayerful disposition, and to manifest a prayerful demeanor toward God, in humble acknowledgment for every favor, and every benefit we derive from him, either through his kind providence, or his liberal grace; and likewise to exercise the same concern for others as we do for ourselves. Prayer, to be of any avail, must be a voluntary offering, not a constrained, reluctant service. In all the passages referred to by Brown, in his "Body of Divinity," to sustain prayer, as one of the "Instituted Ordinances of the Covenant of Grace"—Matt. 7: 7—14; Eph. 16: 18; Phil. 6: 6; Rom. 12: 12; Col. 6: 2; Matt. 26: 41; and James 5: 13—there is not any thing partaking of a legitimate command, requiring it as a sacrifice. Prayer is only commended—simply recommended—but commended to us under such circumstances as to render its neglect criminal, if delinquency, in the absence of law, can be regarded criminal.

Do not be startled, reader; I do not desire, and much less design, to depreciate prayer. I unhesitatingly affirm it to be the highest boon bestowed on man, by Infinite Wisdom; and while I regard it as a boon, a favor, a privilege, that no child of grace can dispense with and live the life of the righteous—while it is a privilege, the neglect of which, both in our families and in the public service, would inflict much damage to our own individual spirits, and to the cause of our great High Priest; yet it cannot be found commanded or required, as an ordinance, or an injunction. Dr. Dwight, after treating, in extenso, of the nature and the incentives to prayer, urges the obligation, as arising from the dictates of conscience and common sense, and more particularly from the example of the Redeemer. "Prayer," says that excellent writer, "is the only method which Nature points out of obtaining blessings from God. To Prayer, as this method, we are directed by our earliest circumstnnces in childhood. By asking, we originally expect to gain, and actually gain, all the blessings which are given to us by our Parents. What they grant to our petitions, common sense directs us to hope from God, in answer to similar petitions. From analogy, which is fairly presumed to be conclusive, we determine, that the mode of obtaining good, which his Providence has formed for our direction with respect to earthly parents and benefactors, is the mode which we ought to pursue, whenever we seek to obtain good immediately from our Heavenly Parent and Divine Benefactor. As this conduct is universal, it is justly concluded to be natural. For we have no higher proof that any thing is natural, than the fact that it exists in all men, of all ages and nations."[*]

Before I leave this point, I wish to be distinctly understood, that I do not desire to depreciate prayer—that a professor of the religion of Jesus Christ, who can depreciate prayer as part, as a prominent part, of a disciples, public and private worship, has yet to learn the first rudiments, the first lesson, of a follower of the Lamb; but we are not required to magnify any one duty, or thing, above the "Written Word." I regard prayer as all and every part of the worship of God, on this wise; a sermon is worse than useless when it does not make the hearer's heart pray; the praise of singing unto the Lord is vain as the empty wind, when it does not solemnize the mind, and make the heart pray; and all the ordinances and all the rites of the sanctuary, are useless forms when they fail to raise our prayerful desires, and the votive offerings of the heart, to Him who gave Himself for us. All I desire, is to place prayer in its true position, as the highest privilege bestowed upon the followers of the rejected, the despised Messiah; and enforce the obligation from the privilege and the example of the Master; as I design, before I have done, to show that another matter sustains a somewhat similar relation, in the Redeemer's economy of grace.

I have already intimated, that I regard the Lord's Supper more a privilege, a distinguished, a most exalted privilege, than an absolute injunction; for, although we have, "Do this in rememberance of me," there is no requirement to observe it at any special period, but it was left entirely to the sense of propriety of the disciples. I freely admit that there is sufficient force in the peculiar privilege to entitle it to the rank of an ordinance; yet it lacks precept to make it command anything like uniformity of observance. It is not distinctly positive—definitely positive—but derives most of its authority from mere inference—is maintained more from inference and example than from injunction. We have to resort to privilege and example, in this matter, for precedent. But does the Christian Church, generally, follow the example? The Apostles communed daily, and the early Christians weekly; but how is the example followed in the present day? At most, once a month, generally once in two or three months, and in some churches twice, and even not oftener than once, a year. As I regard the Lord's Supper as much a privilege as an ordinance, aud as partaking intimately of both, I think, like many of the early Christians, that if partaken worthily, under a deep sense of the necessity of living at the foot of the Cross, for daily supplies of grace, that it cannot be enjoyed too often, although, with "weak disciples," its "familiarity may breed contempt." The obligation of frequent communion, not drawn, however, so much from Scripture as from a sense of propriety, or, more particularly, from the sense of the Church, has been ably argued and enforced by Bishop Taylor, in his "Worthy Communicant," and by Dr. Waterland, Archdeacon of Middlesex, England; but this is not the place to consider that subject to any further extent. If the Lord's Supper be an ordinance of fixed appointment, its seasons of recurrence would be specifically defined and enforced. The Eunuch was baptized and went on his way rejoicing. We hear no more of him, whether he ever partook of the Lord's Supper or not. If he did, it doubtless was a happy, a blessed privilege to him; but if he did not, we have yet to learn, that it was any detriment to him, or that any denunciation was heaped upon him for the neglect of that duty. That it is one of God's means to sanctify the spirits of true believers, so far from questioning, I firmly believe; and I repeat, that the oftener a disciple partakes, worthily, the better he or she shows forth the death of the Redeemer, and the surer is their access to His presence vouchsafed to them. Happy are they who share the unspeakable privilege, of enjoying that distinguished favor, that blessed opportunity. He who denies himself this privilege on all suitable occasions, thereby denies his Master, and does despite to the appointed means of spiritual improvement, and brings leanness into his own soul.

5. Dedication. Noah Webster defines dedicate, to set apart and consecrate to a divine Being, or to a sacred purpose; and dedication, the act of consecrating to a divine Being. Calmet defines it, a religious ceremony by which any thing is declared to be consecrated to the worship or service of God; and Kitto adds to a similar definition, that it appears to have originated in the desire to commence with public solemnity the practical use and application of whatever has been set apart to the divine service.

As the words dedication and consecration are generally employed as convertible terms, it may be proper to consider them together.

Consecration, Calmet defines "the offering or devoting any thing to God's worship and service;" and Buck, likewise, defines it, "the devoting or setting apart any thing to the worship or service of God." Webster, with greater clearness, makes it "devoting or dedicating a person or thing to the service of God, by certain rites and solemnities." Consecration, he adds, does not make a person or thing really holy, but declares it to be sacred, that is, devoted to God. Crabb treats both terms in connection with devote and hallow; which I introduce to show the precise shades of meaning, as well as the relation in which they stand. There is, says that excellent discriminator of words, something more positive in the act of dedicating, than in that of devoting; but less so than in that of consecrating. Dedicate, he derives from de and dico, signifying to set apart by a promise; and, consecrate, from consecro, or con and sacro, signifying to make sacred by a special act. To consecrate is a species of formal dedication. To dedicate and devote may be employed in both temporal and spiritual matters; to consecrate and hallow only in the spiritual sense.

I shall only add to these definitions and elucidations, that the ancient people of God dedicated many places and things to the Lord, which in nowise conferred any holiness upon them, but only placed them in a special relation to holiness and holy offices. Thus, "Moses dedicated the tabernacle built in the wilderness, (Ex. 11; Num. 8,) and the vessels set apart for divine service." Solomon dedicated the temple which he erected, (1 Kings 8,) as did the Israelites, returned from captivity, their new temple, (Ezra 6: 16, 17.) The Maccabees, having cleansed the temple, which had been polluted by Antiochus Epiphanes, again dedicated the Altar. 1 Mac. 6: 52—59. This is believed to be the dedication which the Jews celebrated in winter, at which our Lord was present. John 10: 22. The temple rebuilt by Herod was dedicated with great solemnity.... But not only were sacred places thus dedicated; cities, walls and gates, and even the houses of private persons, were sometimes thus consecrated. Neh. 12; Psalm 30; Deut. 20."[*] In consecration there is a more intimate personal relation between the consecrated and the object of the service. "In the law, God ordained, that the first-born of man and beast should be consecrated; he consecrated, also, the race of Abraham, particularly the tribe of Levi, and more especially the family of Aaron. The whole Hebrew Commonwealth, however, was consecrated, on their arrival in the land of Canaan. Consecreations depended on the good will of men, who consecrated themselves or things, or persons depending on them, to the service of God, whether for the time only, or in perpetuity. Joshua devoted, or set apart, the Gibeonites to the service of the tabernacle. Joshua 9: 27. David and Solomon, the Nethinim, or remains of the ancient Canaanites; Hannah consecrated her son Samuel to the Lord, to serve all his life in the tabernacle. The angel who promised Zechariah a son, (Luke 1: 15,) commanded him to consecrate him to the Lord. * * In the New Testament, we also see consecrations. Believers are consecrated to the Lord, as a holy race, a chosen people. 1 Pet. 2: 9."[†] Christ himself introduced and instituted the tender, the touching privilege of consecrating our offspring to himself for his blessing, by the delicate rite of imposition of hands and prayer—thus showing the "better covenant" competent to all the wants of the regenerate heart—alike abounding in its gracious provisions, as well as superior in its observances.

6. Duty. Buck defines duty, "any action, or course of actions, which flow from the relations we stand in to God or man; that which a man is bound to perform by any natural or legal obligation." "All duty," says Crabb, "depends upon moral obligation, which subsists between man and man, a man and his Maker. * * We have duties to perform as parents and children, as husbands and wives, as rulers and subjects, as neighbors and citizens; the debtor is under an obligation to discharge a debt; and he who has promised is under obligation to fulfill his promise. The duty is not so peremptory as the obligation; the obligation is not so lasting as the duty; our affections impel us to the discharge of the duty; interest or necessity impels us to the discharge of the obligation." Webster correctly says, "The government and religious instruction of children are duties of parents, which they cannot neglect without guilt." Therefore, religious duty embraces every act in our power, consistent with the divine government, to bring ourselves and our offspring within consecrated association with our Divine Master. But more of this hereafter, when I shall come to define consecrated association, and apply some of the foregoing definitions and distinctions, in discussing the Nature and the Propriety of dedicating our children to the Lord; which I hope to be able to pen in time to follow immediately after this extended prolegomena. Long and tedious as it may appear, yet I trust that it will prove acceptable to many of my readers, who have no facilities to acquire the information it may communicate to them.

DESTITUTION OF OUR CHURCHES.

We wish to say a word or two respecting the scarcity of ministerial gifts in our denomination. The recent death of one of our best laborers brings up the subject anew, though we have occasionally touched upon it before. We want to say something, for our heart is oppressed; but what to say, and how to say it, we are at a loss. We write, under the painful consciousness that the apparent tendency of things is to "a famine of hearing the words of the Lord." We write, with a desire of saying something that shall stir up the churches to pray for an aversion of the threatened evil. We write, hoping to make our praying brethren feel that it is a subject worthy of a constant place in their prayers. We write, burdened with the conviction that, unless the Lord of the flock speedily send help, we shall "faint, and be scattered abroad, as sheep having no shepherd."

But in reference to this subject, we have insisted upon prayer heretofore. Whether any body considered what we wrote worthy of a second thought, we know not. Very likely it was read, and forgotten; a thing that we care very little about, so far as concerns ourselves. But when we remember that One infinitely greater has said, "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers into his harvest," we think the forgetfulness of our readers not much to their credit. They have not only forgotten what we said, but what the Lord himself said. We, therefore, just hint the subject a second time, hoping that some, to whom Zion's welfare is dear, will keep it in memory. We commend the following form of prayer to every church destitute of a pastor: "Let the Lord, the God of the spirits of all flesh, set a man over the congregation, who may go out before them, and who may go in before them, and who may lead them out, and who may bring them in; that the congregation of the Lord be not as sheep which have no shepherd."

But why are the dispensations of providence ordered in a manner apparently so unfavorable to our prosperity? Why are the watchmen taken from the walls, and their stations left vacant? Why does He who received gifts for men, leave our churches, for months and years, without spiritual guides? "Righteous art thou, O Lord, when we plead with thee; yet let us talk with thee of thy judgments." We may reverently inquire into these things, and it will be to our advantage to do so.

It is "ordained that they who preach the gospel shall live of the gospel." The covenant entered into by every church organized upon the Christian platform, is a contract with God—a solemn pledge given to Christ—that the ministers sent to them, and placed over them, shall "live of the gospel." God has ordained it, and the church agrees to comply, to the full extent of its ability. But our churches have broken this covenant. They have required ministers to labor for them at salaries altogether inadequate to their necessary wants. In too many cases, they have covered over the iniquity of this arrangement by pleading their own poverty, when they were actually living in plenty, and continually enlarging their business. Ministers have seen it, and become sick at heart. God has seen it; and is he not now visiting us for this thing? Let the guilty churches inquire.

God says, "Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves; for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account." When a church calls a man, requests him to go in and out before them, and take the pastoral oversight, it virtually pledges itself to honor his teachings. He may reasonably expect that the members will respect his admonitions, seek his counsel, wait diligently upon his public ministrations, and show that they have confidence in his ability to direct their spiritual affairs. But have not our churches broken this covenant? Have they not been shamefully negligent about coming together to hear the word of the Lord? Have they not neglected prayer and conference meetings, and left the minister to sustain them alone? Have they not neglected to seek his counsel? Have they not plunged into business unfavorable to their spiritual interests, without ever consulting him? Have they not disregarded his admonitions, and gone on breaking the Sabbath, neglecting family prayer, and otherwise behaving themselves inconsistently, till his heart has broken within him? And is not God now visiting us for these things?

But perhaps the ministry itself is not exempt from blame. Let those who bear the office begin to inquire. To every minister, Inspiration says, "Give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine. Give thyself wholly to them, that thy profiting may appear to all. Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine; continue in them; for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself, and them that hear thee." Do ministers keep this advice in mind? Is it always before them? If there were no cause of complaint in this respect, we think the good effects would soon be seen. Young men among us, seeing the ministry assume that dignity and purity, that Apostolic faithfulness and zeal, which renders the office an honor to him who bears it, would be stirred up to desire it. They would burn to be engaged in a work constantly exemplified before them as one which tends to the salvation of souls and the glory of God; nor could they rest till actually employed in a service so full of satisfaction to the heart of him who discharges it faithfully. But what is there to excite this feeling now? What do our young brethren see? What are they made to daily feel? Alas! Alas! In us who yet remain, bearing the sacred office, they see but too little to encourage them. Their desire to serve God is chilled by what they witness in us. Their high and holy aspirations become languid. They are brought to undervalue the ministry. They turn their attention to other callings, and are in a great measure lost to the cause of truth.

Indeed, when we consider all the discouragements thrown in the way, both by churches and the ministry, we do not wonder that so few are seeking the holy office. We are all guilty together, and though not all in the same degree, we presume there is not an individual among us, who may not, with propriety, enter into a solemn examination of himself, and inquire whether it is not on his account that all this evil is come upon us.

O Thou who hast ascended on high, and received gifts for men, furnish thy Church!

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Opening of the Crystal Palace on Sunday—Discussions thereupon.

Glasgow, February 4th, 1853.

The London Society for promoting the Observance of Sunday rather than the Sabbath, has made a public "Appeal for Funds," "in the expensive efforts they are now making," in "originating counter petitions from all parts of the country," against the Sunday opening of the Crystal Palace. They confess to "have supplied written forms of petition," and intimate that they have given away 140,000 of an address to the working classes. But their opponents have anticipated their efforts. The night before last, a "Great Representative Meeting of the United Working Classes of London" was held there. It was avowedly an organized demonstration of their desire that the Palace, &c., should be opened on Sundays. It was stated, that delegates have been elected from all branches of labor—representing the sentiments of 92,500 working men. Mr. Mayhew in the chair, who said that "it was one of the most righteous meetings ever held;" and in the argument he employed, we have the fulfillment of that which the friends of the true Sabbath have long warned the church would be the result of their adherence to a traditionary Sabbath instead of returning to the day which the Lord hath sanctified and blessed. The Chairman, at the very outset of his argument, took up the theological objection to the object the meeting had in view, as indeed the main objection to it. He maintained, that "they did not reject the authority of a divine command." That was not the Sabbath, he affirmed, which Christians observe. "Without quibbling, it was impossible to deny that the Old Testament Command referred to Saturday. What authority, then, was there for the present Sabbath law? It was admitted, that the Saviour enunciated no such law; the Sabbath of which He spake was the Jewish Sabbath of Saturday. Nor did the Apostles lay down any such injunction; and there was no evidence that they ever regarded any other than the Jewish Sabbath, the observance of which was believed to be obligatory on all, Jews and Christians, till the destruction of Jerusalem." Mr. Mayhew thus, as taught by the Church, regards the seventh day of the commandment (the only day having had divine authority) as now abrogated; and that, therefore, there is no Sabbath as such, but only a holiday "for the improvement of the body and mind of the laborer." "A Declaration," drawn up in conformity with these views, was agreed to, which affirms "that the present Sabbath is a social rather than a divine institution"—there having been only seven dissentients. In the speeches of some of the delegates, comments were made upon the views of the Bishop of London and the Rev. Dr. Cumming, and also upon the writings of Paley. After the Declaration had been agreed to, the Rev. J. T. Baylee, Secretary of the Sunday Observance Society, presented himself "as a working clergyman," desiring to be allowed to address the meeting. He was not, however, suffered to proceed, as the meeting was confined to real working men and their representatives. The chairman announced an adjournment till next week, when "the grounds for the social observance of the Sabbath" is to be his theme.

The alarm occasioned by this movement of the working classes has called forth articles in most of the religious magazines—all of them, however, carefully avoiding the consideration of what day God has commanded men to keep holy. Among other of these defenses of the traditionary Sabbath, is one in the North British Review, which consistently enough attaches a semi-sacredness to Good-Friday! This Review has been regarded with favor by the philosophical and literary members of the Scottish Church, and is in special favor with the Free Church—some of whose ministers and members have been contributors to its pages—but this article is giving great offense, as a departure from the Scriptural defense of Sunday; for, to judge by their mode of speaking, Christians really seem as if they believed that that day could be defended Scripturally. The ground for the observance of Friday, and especially for Good-Friday, is precisely of the same nature as that for Sunday—the one is believed by the church to be the day on which Christ died; the other, they believe to be that on which He arose from the dead. Tradition warrants the observance of both; and the Church of Rome has stamped her authority equally on both. The consistency of Protestants, in accepting the one and rejecting the other, would require to be better established than it has been. They can legitimately only fall or stand together; yet we confess it seems an indication of progress, if not towards the adoption of the true Sabbath, at least towards the assigning to the false one its true place, when thus a North British reviewer puts Friday and Sunday on the same ground for sanctification, although for different degrees of sanctity. We feel no surprise when this is done by Papal partizans, so that we had omitted even to direct attention to the fact, that in a discussion in the Senate of Sardinia, on the 15th December last, M. de San Martino, Minister of the Interior, remarked, that "some speakers have complained of the non-observance of the Sabbath and holidays." If tradition have authority, let it be consistently submitted to; if it have no authority, let it be rejected. "If the Lord be God, follow Him; but if Baal, then follow him," are words as appropriate as ever.

J. A. BEGG.

DENOMINATIONAL LITERATURE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In my former article, I reasserted the statement made in my speech before the Publishing Society, at its Anniversary in Plainfield, that "we never have had a denominational literature." That the object of that remark may be understood, I copy from the printed speech the paragraph with which it stands connected:—

"The Publishing Society is destined to harmonize and embody in a system of divinity the sentiments of the denomination. From Rhode Island on the east, to Virginia on the south, and California on the west, there is with us a uniform sentiment upon the Sabbath. The Sabbath has brought and bound us together. From the Baptists, Methodists, and others, have the original Sabbath-keepers received accessions. These have brought with them to some extent their denominational peculiarities. Thus, on many questions, we have no acknowledged views as a standard. The harmonizing power of the press, in the hands of the Publishing Society, is to take the heterogeneous mass of sentiment, and frame from it a pure system of divinity, around which we are all to cluster, rejoicing in our unity. While our weekly, monthly, and quarterly publications, are to teem with the shorter articles, the bound duodecimos and octavos are to embody complete, clear, and satisfactory arguments, that all shall receive. We are yet to have, perhaps, B. on the Moral Law, M. on the harmony of the Law and the Gospel, H.'s exegetical works, B. on Family Religion, and one and another, now nameless, on the several doctrines, theoretical and practical, of religion. Ranged side by side with these, on the shelves of each private library, bearing the imprint of this Society, may we yet see the poems of Mrs. C., the devotional works of Mary, the metaphysics of Miss Sarah, and in each church the series of Sabbath-School books by one and another. With all these as a guide, and the Bible as a standard, the Publishing Society is yet to harmonize the sentiments of the denomination, and throw in the pathway of the busy, bustling world, the pure, the sublime, the unadulterated Word of Life. All this, and more, shall it do, under the fostering care of those to whom it commends itself.

"It is thus that we are yet to have, and must have, what we never have had, a denominational literature; and until we have such, we shall not have in full, vigorous, active use, the medium which is second only to the Gospel for extending the truth. A few bound volumes of a denominational character are to be found in our libraries. These are cherished ones. But the progress of the age calls for more; the claims of truth, and inquirers for truth, demand more; and these must be supplied."

I now propose to offer other reasons, which will illustrate our need of a "denominational literature."

Books of a chaste, moral, or religious character, are among the best helps that the pastor has in his parochial labors. Pastoral visits and public preaching must be sustained by something else. In this connection I can hardly forbear copying, "in extenso," the speech of Eld. Babcock, made on the same occasion. It is a clear, comprehensive illustration of the need of a denominational literature. Read it, in the Recorder of Sept. 23d. If the feeling "of extreme reluctance to reading at all," prevails, there will accompany it extreme ignorance. To remove this, is the great desire of the faithful pastor. He can accomplish it in no way so easy as to present a denominational book. He could sell ten of such as often as one of another. Could he have a respectable variety of such to select from, his task would be a comparatively easy one. As it is, the "extreme reluctance to reading at all," must remain, with all its ignorance and imbecility. But "a clamorous appetite for the light and corrupting emanations of the secular press," prevails still more. As the minister of Jesus Christ stands in the desk, proclaiming from the promptings of an anxious heart the riches of the glorious gospel, some of his congregation are dreaming over, for the second time, the corrupting love legends of the last novel. How can the sublime doctrines of religion find ingress to the heart preoccupied by the bewitchings of romances. As he enters the family circle, to dispense the counsels of religion, and talk of the great family above, he often finds himself in an atmosphere so polluted, that he can leave no good impression. Minds bewitched and befooled by the current popular literature of the satanic press, are so much like the "Augean stable," that they call for the labor of a second Hercules to clean them. That which offers to his anxious mind the greatest hope of doing such souls any good, is to introduce books, "denominational books," that will dispel the delusion, and turn the thoughts to better things. I know several pastors, who are doing something in this way, who would feel that they had good hope of success, could they once in three months, with well-filled satchel in hand, go through the church, and offer the new book of "denominational literature."

There are many inquiring minds in our churches, that are not satisfied with what the pastor can furnish them. They want elaborate discussions on theological science. They want critical biblical interpretation. They want thorough exegetical works on disputed subjects, and are not satisfied to have ignorance, as the shadow of death, brood over their minds. Among the young are many minds prepared to receive the seeds of divine truth—ready to be occupied with sacred literature. These all call for divine aliment for the soul. Let the wants of such minds in the churches be met by a valuable "denominational literature," and they at once will take their places as "lights in the world," and "pillars in the church." Then will that light which sometimes seems as the last flickering of a dying taper, shine forth, clear and convincing; while a divine halo shall dance around it. But let such inquirers be compelled to resort to other sources for information, and they are at once exposed to the corruptions that lie concealed there. We have already lost enough of such from the embrace of our communion. Without the necessary sources of information furnished by ourselves, our youth will grow up pigmies in sacred literature, or be exposed to the contamination of the errors that are embodied in the creed of others. May a chaste, a full, a sanctified "denominational literature" save us from the dilemma.

We occasionally have young men coming into the ministry, who look about them with the greatest anxiety for intellectual and spiritual culture. We who have come into the ministry without either of these, understand their feelings. Not long since, a brother minister, who had been perhaps twelve years in the ministry, said, "I must have a theological education; I must attend a theological seminary, if it is a Catholic one." He deeply felt the need of theological science; and but a small item of it could he find at home. Shall our young men come into the ministry uneducated, untaught in biblical literature? What can we expect of those who thus become the guides of others? On the several doctrines of religion they need thorough study to become intelligent defenders of them. And what assurance have we that young men springing into the ministry in different parts of the denomination will come with the same ideas of divine truth? We have no acknowledged standards to which we can refer them. They take what comes in their way, and launch forth into the broad sea of mind, to teach them the way of life; and become, or seek to become, the advocates and defenders of the religion that is to reform and save the world. The most learned of the Apostles said, "Who is sufficient for these things?" The corruptions of the world are to be opposed. The sophisms and craft of designing men are to be combatted. The errors in the church are to be dissipated. He who undertakes this, needs to be warm in soul, clear in head, and well informed in all the doctrines of the Bible. But will he be, if he is left unaided in his researches. Such a one needs the sentiments of the denomination—the truths of religion, pure and undefiled—"written in a book."

It may appear that leaders, even, in the church, have no well-digested and established system of divinity to preach. This arises from the fact that there have been no denominational standards as a guide, and each has been left to frame his own system, or go without, or borrow from the writings of others. It will not do to reply to this, "The Bible is our standard;" for so say all denominations, and so said satan, substantially, when he quoted scripture to Christ in the temptation. If the Bible is a guide, all men do not examine it as such, to learn the several items of which it is composed, and see their harmony. These need examining, classifying, and arranging. When this is done, we shall have something that will look like a denominational literature.

Our denomination has received valuable accessions from others. These retain some of their peculiarities. Since my acquaintance with the denomination, it never has been united in all its sentiments. The increase of it does not diminish the disagreement. And even now, were it large enough to divide, there would be danger of such an event. While we are small, we more feel the need of concession and union. Under such a state of the churches, it would be much easier to rake over our sentiments, and save the good, and embody them in a system, and publish them to the world, while the bad might be thrown away. Such an event would be almost sure to take place, if we had a full and reliable literature. But in the science of biblical hermeneutics, we are deficient. If the speech made at Plainfield, or any part of it, shall serve to awaken a greater interest in sacred learning—if from it our learned men shall set themselves to work to perfect a literature so meager as ours—then shall I have hopes that hereafter, when inquirers wish to know our sentiments, they can find them drawn out and illustrated, and that all who shall hereafter unite with us, shall find a system of divinity that they can love, and a literature in which they can delight.

When I first commenced writing, I did not intend to trespass on your columns so much, but I most respectfully beg leave to speak again. J. Bailey.

PROPOSAL FOR A PRIZE ESSAY.

Most cheerfully do we comply with a request to publish the following proposal. The subject which it refers to, and is designed to bring before the Christian public, is one of vital importance to the well-being of the churches of all denominations. May the result be an essay adequate to the subject.

A Layman, believing that the living Ministry is the chief instrumentality appointed by Christ for the advancement of his kingdom in the world, and believing that the churches may do far more than they now do to increase the number and to augment the usefulness of their ministers, by supplying them with more ample and stable pecuniary support, and with larger resources for the prosecution of study and the preservation of health, and also by securing to them more entire freedom of action in the performance of their sacred duties,—believing, also, that unless some such means are used to arrest the tendency of high-minded, cultivated and pious young men to enter other departments of life in preference to the ministry, the churches and the world will long have reason to regret it,—hereby offers a Prize of Two Hundred Dollars, for the best essay on the means to be used by the churches for making the Pastoral office a more inviting and productive field of Christian labor.

The essay may be historical and statistical, as well as argumentative or descriptive; presenting the usages of other churches as well as of the Congregational, and of churches in other countries as well as in this, so far as these usages affect the present subject. It should cover the whole ground of the relation of the Pastor to his people, and show all the means by which an intelligent Christian society may make him who ministers to them in Christ's name most truly and permanently useful to them. It is designed to be published for general circulation among the churches; and should therefore be so brief as to be read without difficulty by those whose time is limited, while it should be long enough to treat correctly and with fullness the subject proposed. It should be written in a simple, perspicuous and attractive style, to convince the judgment and impress the heart.

Rev. Edwards A. Park, D. D., Abbott Professor of Christian Theology in the Andover Seminary, Henry White, Esq., of New Haven, Con., and Rev. R. S. Storrs, Jr., of Brooklyn, N. Y., have consented to act in examining the essay and adjudicating the Prize.

The article should be sent to either of the above-named gentlemen, anonymously, as early as the 1st September; each one being accompanied with a sealed envelop containing the address of the author.

AGRICULTURAL LECTURES—NO. 3.

BY PROF. GURDON EVANS.

Organic Elements of the Plant.

In this latitude, April opens with warming suns, gentle showers, and growing vegetation. The warm earth again revives the dormant energies of the plant, and the life-giving gases now float around its new leaves. Our attention would naturally be directed to an investigation of the constituent elements and the laws governing the growth of the vegetable kingdom.

All plants are composed of gaseous and mineral matter, the latter of which they derive wholly from the earth, the great reservoir of mineral nutrition. By burning, which is a species of analysis, the gases in the plant are disengaged from the minerals, as seen in the combustion of wood, the gaseous substances passing off in smoke, leaving the mineral in the form of ashes. The gas holds an intimate relationship with the mineral, in the various forms of nature; each showing remarkable strength of attachment for the other in chemical affinities, or immoderate repulsion in its fixed antipathies. The mineral composes only a small portion, from one to ten parts of the dry vegetable. Organic substances are constituted of gases, which enter into combination and form a body, and may afterwards be dissipated by decay, burning, or animal digestion. The organic elements comprise four gases, viz: Oxygen, Hydrogen, Carbonic Acid, and Nitrogen. Let us investigate their properties, so that we may better understand the habits and structure of the plant.

Wood is composed of carbon forty-four, oxygen thirty, and hydrogen twenty-six, in every one hundred parts. Nitrogen is not found, except in grains, bulbous roots, tubers, and a few vegetables. A beautiful and universal law pervades the combination of all the elements, which gives to each a fixed proportion in all its combinations with the other elements. To illustrate—it will be found that oxygen eight parts always unites with hydrogen one part in forming water; and hence, in every nine pounds of water, eight of them are composed of oxygen, and one of hydrogen. Thus we say that one is the combining number of hydrogen, and eight that of oxygen, which hold the same in their chemical union with all the other elements.

Oxygen is the great supporter of combustion and of animal life. It is a transparent, inodorous, and tasteless gas. It is a little heavier than common air. Its most distinguished properties are illustrated in the avidity of its combination with the hardest substances, such as iron, steel, platina, diamond, in the process of burning. It is the most abundant gas in nature, constituting one half of the rocks, one fifth of the air, eight ninths of the water, which equals nearly one third the weight of the solid mass of the earth. The oxygen in plants is derived directly from the water, which, as you were informed in the last lecture, enters as a very abundant ingredient into the formation of vegetation. Plants could also imbibe oxygen from the atmosphere, or from carbonic acid.

Carbon six parts unites with two equivalents of oxygen sixteen parts, and forms carbonic acid. Carbon exists as a solid, but by uniting with oxygen it becomes a gas. Oxygen may be considered the solvent of carbon, the same as water is the great solvent of other substances. Charcoal and the diamond, which are different forms of carbon, yield to the solvent power of oxygen. Carbonic acid gas is the grand supporter of vegetable growth. It is imbibed either with the water, which holds it in solution, or directly from the atmosphere, which is composed of one twenty-five hundredths of it by measure, and one thousandth by weight. The plant then decomposes it, retaining the carbon, and sending off the oxygen. It is a colorless and transparent gas at common temperatures, and has a pungent taste and odor. It is once and a half times heavier than common air; hence gathers in the bottom of wells, caverns, deep pits, &c. It is a non-supporter of combustion and of animal life. Its presence is generally tested by its extinguishing a candle placed in it. The natural sources of carbon are decay, combustion, and digestion. In the decay of animal and vegetable substances, the carbon in them is dissolved by the oxygen of the air; in combustion, it unites suddenly with oxygen; and in digestion the carbon is taken into the system, appropriated to its particular use, and afterwards carried to the lungs by the blood, where it unites with the oxygen of the air in the process of respiration. Carbonic acid gas is absorbed by porous substances, as the soil and water. In connection with lime, it forms our common limestone rocks, through which the water percolates and dissolves it; then the water, on reaching the surface of the ground, is deprived of this gas, and deposits the lime in tufa beds. In this way the caverns in limestone rocks are formed. But from these sources carbonic acid is taken up by the roots of plants. It escapes from the soil in which it is formed by decay, and is absorbed by the leaves of growing plants.

Hydrogen combines with the other elements in the proportion of one. It is fourteen times lighter than air. Though it will not support combustion, yet by uniting with oxygen it burns and forms water. It composes one-ninth by weight of water, and united with oxygen forms more than one half of the vegetable. Its sources to the plant are water and watery vapor.

Nitrogen has the combining number of fourteen. It is a little lighter than common air, and will not support combustion. It composes fifteen one hundredths of the gluten of grains, albumen, &c. Many animal and vegetable substances in which it exists easily decay, producing offensive odors. Its source in nature is the atmosphere, of which it composes four fifths. It probably does not enter the plant directly from the air, but is taken up by the roots in combination with some other substances. These are supplied to the plant in the form of ammonia salts, or nitrates found in the soil.

It will be seen in the discussion of oxygen and carbonic acid gas, that vegetable growth, and respiration of animals, are complementary processes—the plant taking in carbonic acid and throwing off pure oxygen. But this oxygen is taken into the lungs, and combines with carbon, and is thrown out in the form of carbonic acid, which in time would vitiate the whole atmosphere, rendering it destructive of all respiratory beings, did not the vegetable absorb it, and apply it to the necessities of its own growth.

Roman Catholics and Common Schools.—The purpose of the Roman Catholics of this country to break up the system of Common School Education, by withdrawing the children of their flocks from the Schools as now constituted, and demanding separate education instead is shedowed forth in various ways. The latest is through a letter of the Bishop of Pittsburg to the Governor of Pennsylvania, in which he proposes to make every school in which a parent has confidence a public school, and give every teacher a share of what is appropriated for education in each district, in the proportion which the number of pupils entrusted to his care bears to the whole number of children educated in the district. He says:

The system would would work as follows: Suppose the public money to be expended in a certain School District amounts to $5,000, and that there are 1,000 children to be educated in the district. This would be $5 expended on each child. Instead of appointing a set of officials to procure teachers, agree for salaries, exercise supervision, &c., I would say, Let every one who desires to do so, open a School; let each parent send his child to any school he pleases. Every teacher would then be entitled to the sum of $5 for every child that he can show to have been in regular attendance at his School during the year."

Prohibitory Liquor Law Movements.—Michigan has passed the Maine Law through both branches of the Legislature by large majorities. The People are to vote on it in July. In Illinois the subject has been agitated, but the only progress made is in abolishing all License Laws. Vermont has voted to sustain her stringent prohibitory law. In New Jersey a bill is before the Legislature, based on the Maine Law, and there are hopes entertained of its passage. Rhode Island will undoubtedly have her Maine Law remodeled forthwith to meet and obviate the objections of Judge Curtis. Maine and Massachusetts are morally certain not to touch their Prohibition Laws this winter, unless to strengthen them; while Connecticut looks hopeful. There are encouraging aspects in Pennsylvania and Ohio.

Half-Century Missionaries.—During the year 1852, there died in South Africa two venerable missionaries, Rev. William Anderson of Pacultsdorp, and Rev. Mr. Read of Kat River, both of whom left England in the year 1800, and after all the varied experiences incident to a missionary life, deceased within a few months of each other. The period of their united labors exceeded a century!

Religious Interest.—We hear of increased religious interest in several Seventh-day Baptist Churches. At the first church in Verona, N. Y., several persons were baptized last Sabbath. Within the bounds of the church in Hayfield, Pa., a number of conversions are reported, and a pleasant state of religious feeling exists. The first church in Brookfield, N. Y., has lately been holding a series of interesting evening meetings.

Errata.—There are two or three typographical errors in the article of Dr. Fahnestock, on our first page to-day, which should be corrected. In the first column, 19th line, for heart read breast of administrator. In the second column, 77th line, for imperative read inoperative. In the fourth column, first line, for offspring read offering.

Madiai Intervention.—The New York Commercial Advertiser closes as follows a leading article on the Madiai persecution, and the importance of action by our Government in relation to it:—

"So long as this Francesco Madiai remains an imprisoned witness of Papal tyranny—so long as he suffers meekly and uncomplainingly the penalty of believing that he ought to read his Bible, and worship his God according to the light derived from that revelation—so long will the Christian nations of the earth watch with jealous vigilance every movement of the Papal power, and become more and more firmly resolved, that no such authority shall ever be exercised over their citizens or subjects. Such a declaration would benefit our Government, would be seasonable, now that the disgust of the world has been so plainly expressed in the case of the Madiais, and would deter Tuscany, or Austria, or Rome, from any attempt at such tyranny over an American citizen; and we repent the expression of an earnest hope, that before the present Congress rises, it will declare, by resolution, its abhorrence of this religious tyranny, and empower the Government to express such a sentiment to Roman Catholic powers in the strongest terms that international comity will allow."

Costume of Rosa Madiai.—A correspondent of an English paper describes the costume and conveniences allowed to Rosa Madiai in her prison:—

"Her chemise is of coarse material like sailcloth; then she wears a knitted worsted garment, over which is a brown duffle robe, such as is worn by the Franciscans. Over all is worn the livery of the prison, i. e., a broad yellow and white striped coarse linen material, the skirt tight as a sack, and on her head she wears a close skull-cap of the same, fastened by a tape under her chin, no hair being seen. She has coarse hose and great thick shoes. I am not sure that I ever told you, when describing her cell, that her seat was a round stool like a milking stool, chained to the wall in a corner of the room; and in the opposite corner is a small footstool, also chained, so that poor Rosa, when at her work on the stool of repentance, cannot make use of the second small stool to keep her feet from the cold brick floor. She told us that when she was brought from Florence, instead of being conveyed at once to Lucca, they kept her a night and a half day in the common prison at Pistoja, which she said was a most filthy place, and the food they gave her was too loathsome to eat."

Asylum for Idiots.—Some two years ago Trustees appointed by the Legislature of the State of New York opened an asylum, near Albany, to try the effect of proper training upon nominal idiots. The second Annual Report of these Trustees has just been presented to the Legislature. They state that there have been, during the past year, sixteen pay pupils in the Asylum, of whom two have been removed on account of sickness, one has died of an old disease, and one removed to make room for a State pupil. There are now twelve pay pupils. The full number of State pupils authorized by law are in the institution, viz., thirty. Of them, there are four from each of the First, Second, Third, Fifth, Seventh and Eighth Judicial Districts, and three from each of the Fourth and Sixth Districts. The Trustees think that there is in this State one idiot to every 1,070 inhabitants, and that the present number of that class is about 2,800. They recommend the establishment of several schools in convenient localities, where pupils may be sent from different surrounding districts. These schools would in time be furnished with practiced teachers, trained and prepared at the central institution, by which uniformity and economy would be secured.

A Congressman in a Fix.—Our readers will doubtless remember the aggravated assault made on Mr. R. M. Titsworth, of Plainfield, N. J., by a member of Congress named McMullen, while on board of a steamboat near Philadelphia. At the time Mr. McMullen was held to answer for the offense before the Court of Quarter Sessions in Philadelphia. The case has been pending until quite recently, when Mr. M. appeared before the Court, and plead guilty. But when it was proposed to pass sentence, his Counsel petitioned for a writ of certiorari, to carry the case up to the Supreme Court. After some delay, the petition was denied; consequently nothing remains for Mr. McMullen, but to receive his sentence, and pay the penalty of his brutal assault by undergoing the prescribed imprisonment.

Mr. Sabine on the Fisheries.—Hon. Lorenzo Sabine has persented to Congress, through the Sec'y of the Treasury, an elaborate report on the "Principal Fisheries of the American Seas." In the month of December, Mr. Sabine entered into investigations with a view to compute the damages which our fishermen sustained the last summer from the interruption of their business by the British fleet sent among them. It led him to the conclusion, that they were not less than a quarter of a million of dollars. Mr. Sabine estimates that the pay received by our fishermen, notwithstanding the extraordinary hardships and hazards they undergo, does not amount to over eighteen dollars a month, gross earnings, to a man.

Cost of Slave-Catching.—In August, 1851, John Bolding was arrested at Poughkeepsie as an alledged Fugitive Slave, brought from Poughkeepsie to New York, went through the form of a three days trial, and although proved to have only one-twentieth of negro blood, was sent back to South Carolina into Slavery. His friends, rather than have him wear out his life in unrequited toil, raised about $2000 to buy him, although he would not have brought his claimant on the auction block more than six or eight hundred dollars. This was thought to be paying pretty dear for our connection with Slavery. But it now appears that in addition to these two thousand dollars, "Uncle Sam" had to pay a bill of $872 62 1-2 for conveying the slave and his three attendants from New York to South Carolina. "What has the North to do with Slavery?"

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Special interest on the subject of personal religion exist in Florence, Pa. A letter dated 21st ult., says:—"We have had a glorious work in our church for some two months; twenty-seven persons have been admitted to communion. There are now some twenty-five more who entertain a hope that they have experienced a change of heart; and many, very many, are more or less concerned for their soul's salvation."

It is said that the Vestry of St. Stephen's church, corner of Broome and Chrystie-sts., New York, have granted to their pastor, Rev. Dr. Price, leave of absence for one year, in order to enable him to travel in Europe for the benefit of his health. They have also determined not only to continue his salary, but to supply his place at their own expense while absent.

The Prairie Herald gives a list of churches in Chicago: 1 Jewish, 7 Catholic, 5 Episcopal, 3 Lutheran, 4 Presbyterian, 2 Congregational, 2 Baptist, 7 Methodist Episcopal, 1 do. Protestant, 1 Unitarian, 1 Universalist, 1 New Jerusalem, 1 Sailor's Bethel, 1 Spiritualist, 1 German, 1 African M. E., 1 Disciples; total 40.

The annual contributions to the cause of Foreign Missions have been made by the Orthodox churches in Boston. The Old South Church contributed nearly $4,000; the Essex-street church has raised nearly $3,000; about the same amount has been given by Rev. Mr. Kirk's church. Deacon Safford contributed $1,000.

The slave Amanda, who was recently given up at Alton, has been purchased for $1200 by citizens of that place, and set free. This is a noble act and highly creditable to the city where once was mobbed a man who dared to advocate universal freedom.

Eld. Leman Andrus is preaching to the Church at Richburg, Allegany Co., N. Y., and requests his correspondents to address him accordingly.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, FEB. 14.

In the Senate, numerous petitions were presented, among which was one from a Mr. Morehead, praying an appropriation to make experiments with his improved patent for carrying cars up inclined planes without danger. The Deficiency Bill was taken up, and several amendments agreed to, but no vote taken on the bill. The "Monroe doctrine" was then discussed by Messrs. Douglass, Cass, and others.

In the House, a discussion on Swamp Lands occupied most of the day. The bill out of which the discussion grew, provides that in cases where the Government has sold swamp lands granted to certain States, the money shall be refunded, on condition that they give a good title to the purchasers.

THIRD-DAY, FEB. 15.

After a variety of private business, the Senate came to the Deficiency bill, and the proposed amendment to grant to California $300,000 of the revenue collected there before her admission as a State, passed; a proviso attached to the appropriation for the extension of the Capitol, placing the funds in the hands of the Commissioner instead of the Architect, caused some debate, and also passed. The Garay grant came up again, but nothing came of it but talk, and the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the bill relating to the smaller silver coins of the United States, after some further discussion, and two attempts to table it, passed. The bill to prevent frauds upon the Treasury, the Post-Office Appropriation, and the Civil and Diplomatic bills, came up, and in connection with the latter, Mr. Venable undertook to show the cause of the delay in the proceedings of Congress, which is now exciting so much dissatisfaction in the country. He assigned the defectiveness of the rules as the cause, which idea, however, found little favor with other members.

FOURTH-DAY, FEB. 16.

The Senate spent nearly the whole day upon the Deficiency Bill, the particular point being to strike out the provision which raised the salary of the Superintendent of the Census from $2,500 to $3,000.

The House passed the Post-Office Appropriation Bill, and talked lengthily upon the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

FIFTH-DAY, FEB. 17.

In the Senate, after the transaction of various items of private business, a large number of important reports were made. Among them was one accompanied by resolutions in favor of demanding religious rights for American citizens, in future treaties. Several resolutions of inquiry passed, and Messrs. Bell and Smith spoke upon the Pacific Railroad bill.

In the House, the provincial reciprocity bill was taken up and debated until the close of the morning hour. The civil and diplomatic bill followed, and all sorts of amendments were proposed, some of which were agreed to, others ruled out of order, and then the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, FEB. 18.

In the Senate, Mr. Brodhead's substitute for the Pacific Railroad bill, namely, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert provisions for a survey of the various routes, was voted down; Yeas 22, Nays 34. The bill meets with strong opposition, and was still under discussion at the time of adjournment.

In the House, after some private business, the Civil and Diplomatic bill came up again in Committee, when it appeared that the appropriation for the expenses of the two Houses of Congress reaches upward of $1,186,000, of which $12,500 are for newspapers, $28,000 for stationery, and $10,000 for folding. The Speaker laid before the House a message from the President, accompanied by a communication from the Secretary of State, in relation to the Mosquito Territory question.

SABBATH-DAY, FEB. 19.

In the Senate, the Pacific Railroad bill came up, and after a short postponement for the transaction of a variety of private business, &c., was further debated and several important amendments offered. An amendment proposed by Mr. Shields, providing that no part of the appropriation should be spent within the States, was carried by two majority.

The House spent the sitting upon the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill.

European News.

European dates to Feb. 5th (one week later) have been received. With the exception of the details of the marriage of Louis Napoleon, there is scarcely anything of interest or importance in the advices. Cotton had advanced, breadstuffs were dull and declined, and other articles generally unchanged.

The deaths of Viscount Melbourne and the Earl of Tyrconnel, with that of the Earl of Oxford, make no less than three peerages that have become extinct within the last fortnight.

The refusal of the Court of Queen's Bench to grant a new trial in the case of Achilli vs. Newman, has been announced. On Monday, 31st ult., the case came up for judgment. After various affidavits handed in and read in mitigation of sentence, &c., Mr. Justice Coleridge delivered the judgement of the Court, which was that Newman pay a fine of £100 to the Queen, and be imprisoned until it is paid.

The Paris Moniteur announces that on the occasion of his marriage, the Emperor has pardoned more than 3,000 persons who were implicated in the events of December, 1851.

There seems to be no limits to the Emperor's profuseness. Among other things he proposes purchasing, out of his private funds, a diamond necklace worth 600,000 francs, and which the Empress declined to receive from the City of Paris. He proposes to build a palace at Marseilles, and they say one in each of the principal towns of France, and reside at each alternately, commencing, next summer, with Versailles, where, on account of the expense, no Sovereign has resided since Louis XIV.

The London Morning Advertiser says that a packet of eighty letters has been stolen from the Emperor's private apartment. Suspicion rested on Mrs. Howard, and the letters, which implicate the first men in France, are thought to be in the possession of the Orleans Princes. 300,000 francs are offered for their recovery.

'A Short Romance.'—Under the above caption Mrs. Swisshelm's paper of last week tells the following:—

"Among the freight which passed through this city last week on the underground railroad was a daughter of a 'wealthy and influential' citizen of Louisania, a young lady of remarkable beauty and no mean supply of spirit and intelligence. She had been well brought up and kindly cared for by her father; but a creditor levied on her for debt. She was placed in a calaboose at New Orleans for safe-keeping, and for the inspection of purchasers. Among those who thought of buying the article was one gentleman, who wished to learn if her bust was indebted to padding for its form; but the girl, resenting this pursuit after knowledge as a personal insult, dashed him from her; whereupon this representative of Southern chivalry drew a heavy whip and dealt her a blow, which she caught upon her right arm and shoulder, and which rendered them quite powerless. That night—the night before the sale—some one came into her prison, gave her a suit of boy's clothes, bade her dress quickly and follow. She did so, and was placed by the unknown friend on a steamboat bound for Pittsburgh, her passage paid, and here she arrived safely."

Copy Right.—We have rumors from Washington, says the N. Y. Times, that a Treaty has been concluded between England and the United States,—and now awaits the action of the Senate,—giving to the authors of each country the control and sale of their books in both. We have no reliable information as to the precise stipulations of this arrangement; but we hear that they are very broad, and cover the whole ground hitherto claimed by the advocates of international copy right; that they give authors the same rights in both countries which they now enjoy in each; that an English author may control the sale of his books in this country without having them reprinted here; and that the object and effect of the Treaty will be to give authors that complete and absolute monopoly of their books, which has been claimed by many as their natural and indefeasible right.

"Uncle Tom" Songs.—The Birmingham (Eng.) Journal of Dec. 11, advertises the following list of songs, written by Charles Jeffrey, and suggested by Uncle Tom's Cabin. They have been set to music by Stephen Glover, and illustrated by sundry artists:—

Eliza's Song—"Sleep, my Child."
George's Song—"My Wife, my Child."
Eva's Parting Words—"Come near me all."
Poor Tom—"Mas'r, I can tell you nothing."
Topsy's Song—"I am but a little Nigger Gal."
Sambo's Lament—"Keep the Wife and sell the Husband." (Music by Tully.)
Duet—Tom and Eva—"The Sea of Glass."
Duet—Emeline and her Mother—"Mother, are you weeping?"

Also, now ready, the Fourth Thousand of Tully's "Topsy's Polka," with the Portrait, by Louis Corbaux.

"Tully's True Topsy Quadrille."

Excursion of the "Ericsson."—The caloric ship has left New York for Norfolk, whither she has been requested to repair by the Secretary of the Navy and the Chairman of the Committee in the House on Naval Affairs. We understand that an offer has been made to the Government, on behalf of her owners, to construct two or more vessels of the largest class for Government service, at the minimum rate of expense for steamers of the same class, to warrant their making ten miles per hour with a consumption of not over eight tons of coal per day, guaranteeing that all their machinery shall last four years—as long as the boilers of a steamship—and offering bonds in any required amount for the fulfillment of the contract in all its parts. The proposition has been very favorably received by the President and the Secretary of the Navy, and it is for the purpose of giving them an opportunity for personal inspection, that the ship has been summoned to Norfolk. Besides Capt. Ericsson and the officers and crew, Commodore Sands was the only person who went with her.

Several weeks ago, the bank of the Ohio Life Insurance Company, at Cincinnati, paid about $15,000 on forged checks presented by a man dressed as a drover. Last week a man named Gage was arrested in New York and identified by the paying teller as the quasi drover.

SUMMARY.

The Frederick (Md.) Examiner records with reverential sorrow the death, on the 5th inst., of Mrs. Catharine Mantz, relict of Major Peter Mantz, one of the worthies of the Revolutionary war, in the 93d year of her age. She was born on the 16th day of October, 1760, under the reign of George II., King of England, and has lived a witness to the whole history of the United States, from the Declaration of Independence to the fruition of the Union of the thirty-one sovereign States. The deceased was the representative of five generations, being a great-great-grandmother, and had a daughter, whose daughter's daughter had a daughter—all living.

The decease of Col. Samuel Starkweather is noticed. He was a native of Connecticut, but at an early age removed to Otsego county, in this State, where he commenced the practice of law. He acquired great eminence at one time in his profession, and there was hardly a criminal suit of importance in the middle counties of the State, in which he was not retained. He was also at one time very prominent in politics, representing his county in the State Legislature with distinguished ability, and frequently stumping the State during important political contests.

A few days since, a Mrs. Palley was walking along Main-st., Rochester, near the New England House, when a runaway horse came along the sidewalk. She tried to escape, when a man seized her, under pretext of protecting her from the danger, and robbed her of a gold watch, chain and pencil. In her consternation she did not discover the robbery till it was too late. This was done in open daylight, and is as cool a piece of rascality as we ever heard of.

A Corporation is in course of formation, having for its object the construction of a Railroad from Kingston, on the Hudson River, west through the Counties of Ulster, Delaware, Otsego, Chenango, Cortland, and Cayuga, and connecting with the road direct from Canandaigua to Buffalo and Niagara Falls. The road is to be of the wide guage, and the route is expected to reduce the distance from this City to Buffalo about 60 miles.

A convention was held at Delhi, Broome County, last week, to consider the propriety of constructing a railroad from Syracuse to Newburgh. About seven hundred delegates were in attendance. A Committee of Fourteen was appointed, seven from Syracuse and seven from Newburgh, to raise funds for surveying the routes and deciding upon the most proper and feasible one.

A new Steamship Company has been organized to open a route via Panama with Australia, which will thus be brought within about thirty-five days of New York. The first ship of the line (the Golden Age) will leave this port for Australia and return to Panama, between which port and Australia she will continue her regular trips. The capital of the company will be $300,000, with liberty to increase to $4,000,000.

As an instance of the improvement in agriculture now in progress, it may be mentioned that the makers of steam engines for agricultural purposes in England have in some cases increased eight-fold within the last three years. One house made in 1848 only 15 engines, but in 1851 finished no less than 294. The same results hold good with respect to other improved agricultural implements. One maker turns out 5 threshing machines a week; another, who made only 56 machines in 1849 and 1850, turned out 192 in the last 21 months.

The Commercial Advertiser states that it learns from a credible source that Madame Goldschmidt has signified her determination to pay another professional visit to this country. She will sing at various places in Germany during the present year, and the following season will appear in opera at London. Afterward, she will come to the United States, and give opera in all the principal cities, remaining here probably two or three years.

Ex-President Van Buren, it is said, will start for Europe next month. He will accompany his son, Martin Van Buren, Jr., whose impaired health, it is thought, will be benefitted by the European tour. Mr. Van Buren, himself, retains all his vigor of mind and body, and his constitutional cheerfulness. The Ex-President will be the only one of the Chief Magistrates of the Republic, we believe, that ever visited Europe after his retirement from office.

Major Wm. Willis, a hero of the Revolutionary War, died at Union, Monroe Co., Va., on the 28th ult., in his 99th year. A brief biographical notice of his death, in the Farmers' Friend, states that he beheld the first flow of American blood and the sacrifice of the first martyrs to our liberties, at Lexington, in 1775. He was afterward at Concord and Bunker Hill, where he fought bravely.

The West Jerseyman says that New York speculators are in Burlington Co., N. J., contracting for poultry of the "capon" breed to be delivered in May at 25 cents per pound. Anticipation of a throng in the city during the World's Fair, is the reason of this exorbitant price for poultry.

Peter Cooper, Esq., has made a donation of $300,000 for establishing in New York an institution to be known as the "Union," the object of which is to be the "moral, mental and physical improvement of the youth of the city, of the State, the country, and the world." The site, selected for the building is bounded by Astor Place, Fourth Avenue, Third Avenue and Seventh Street.

There is an army of at least five hundred shoe-makers in Marlboro, Mass., who manufacture six thousand pairs of children's shoes every working day. One journeyman has worked on the bench thirty years, without losing a day in consequence of sickness, and during that time has saved ten thousand dollars. One firm during the last year has manufactured 217,000 pairs of shoes.

A bill was recently introduced into the Michigan Legislature, for changing the common school system, so as to permit any qualified teacher to establish a private school, and, on presenting a certificate of the number of children taught by him, he may draw his proportion of the public money devoted to educational purposes.

The Legislature of Michigan has adjourned, after a session of forty days. The most important bills passed are those for the construction of the Saut Ste. Marie Canal and the law forbidding the traffic in ardent spirits, which is to be submitted to the people for their adoption on the third Monday in June.

A dispatch from Providence, R. I., dated Feb. 17, says: The Anti-Liquor Law passed the Senate this afternoon, by a vote of 16 to 13—some little alteration having been made. The act goes into effect immediately, but it is to be submitted to the people at the April election, and in the event of their voting not to sustain it, it is to be repealed ten days after the rising of the next General Assembly. The House will concur.

A good deal of excitement prevails in Charleston, Mass., in consequence of the mysterious disappearance of Honora Cochrane, a pretty and intelligent Irish girl of 16 years of age, who has lately become a convert from the Catholic to the Protestant faith. It is suspected that she has met with some unfair treatment.

The Green Mountain Freeman says: Three Fugitive Slaves passed through the place last week, and were supplied with means to prosecute their journey to the Land of Freedom—the Fugitive Slave law to the contrary notwithstanding. How God makes the wrath of man to praise him!

A telegraphic dispatch, published in a Liverpool commercial circular, states that Pries, the man just rendered notorious by his corn speculations and forgeries, has been tried and sentenced to transportation for life.

The report of the defalcation of the Postmaster at Mobile is confirmed. The amount in question is about $20,000. Mr. Metcalf, Agent of the Post-Office Department, has been sent to conduct the office.

The Kingston (N. Y.) Journal, favors a road on the west bank of the Hudson, from Hoboken to Albany, through the Counties of Ulster, Orange, Greene, and Albany. The cost is estimated at less than $4,000,000.

On the 16th inst., President Pierce passed through New York on his way to Washington. His health at the time was not good, and on that account he declined any public demonstrations.

Among other auction sales of the 8th inst., at Charleston, S. C., the Mercury announces that Mr. Gadsden sold a gang of 58 negroes, several of which were old, for $24,780, being an average of $436 each.

Mr. Stephenson, the builder of the Britannia Bridge over the Manai Straits, is on his way to Canada, it is said, to build a similar bridge across the St. Lawrence at Montreal.

New York Market—February 21, 1853.

Ashes—Pots $4 62 a 4 68; Pearls 5 75.

Flour and Meal—Flour, 5 12 for Canadian, 4 87 a 5 00 for State, 5 25 a 5 44 for Ohio, Michigan, and Indiana. Rye Flour 4 87. Corn Meal 3 37 a 3 44 for Jersey.

Grain—Wheat, 1 20 for white Ohio. Rye 89c. Barley 71 a 73c. for mixed and good. Oats 42 a 45c. for Jersey, 46 a 48c. for State. Corn, 62 a 65c. for Southern white and yellow, 67c. for old Western.

MARRIED,

On the 8th of January, by Eld. Leman Andrus, Mr. Ethan M. Stillman, of Scio, to Miss Sarah L. Coates, of Wirt.

On the 12th of February, by the same, Mr. Elijah S. Fuller to Miss A. Jennett Maxson, both of Richburg.

In Otselic, N. Y., Jan. 27th, by Rev. A. Knapp, Mr. John R. Miller and Miss Caroline R. Messenger, all of Otselic.

In Charlestown, R. I., February 14, by Eld. A. B. Burdick, Mr. George S. Greenman to Miss Patience N. Crandall, both of Westerly.

At the same time and place, by the same, Mr. Robert P. Burdick, of Charlestown, to Miss Frances A. G. Crandall, of Westerly.

DIED,

In Milton, Rock Co., Wis., Oct. 1, 1852, Electa Stillman, consort of Clarke G. Stillman, M. D. Sister Stillman was 44 years old. She died of an affection of the heart. She was as well as usual until within some twenty minutes of her death. She was a member of the 1st Church of Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y. She had offered herself as a cadidate for membership in Milton, but from the inclemency of the weather at the time she was to be admitted, she was prevented from attending church. Before she had another opportunity, she went to join the church triumphant. She seemed to enjoy much of her Master's presence for several months before her departure. She was most beloved by those who best knew her.

In Sharon, Pa., Feb. 9, Mrs. Amorila Phelps, wife of Isaac Phelps, and daughter of Abel Maxson, of Wisconsin, in the 25th year of her age. She united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Friendship, N. Y., when about 15 years of age. As death drew near, she was enabled to rejoice in the prospect of soon meeting her Saviour in glory. Her last words were, "I am going to Jesus." The text chosen by herself as the foundation of the funeral discourse, happily expressed her state: "And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them." Rev. 14: 13.

At Panama, New Grenada, January 15, of yellow fever, Mrs. Miriam G. de Bonneville, formerly of Westerly, R. I., aged about 34 years. Mrs. de Bonneville sailed from Philadelphia, on the 15th of December last, for California, for the purpose of joining her husband, but was taken sick at the Isthmus, where she died after an illness of about a week.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses, Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

American Baptist Register.

THIS Volume, now issued, contains 496 pages; or, reckoning the 26 engravings as two pages each, 548 pages. It is printed on beautiful paper, and embraces (including the ornamental stamp on the cover) engravings of 27 church and college edifices. The sketches of State Conventions, Associations alphabetically arranged, names of churches, dates of constitution, counties in which located, pastors, the baptized in 1851, number of communicants, with the names and post-offices of ordained and licensed ministers, fill 373 pages. These are followed by the American Indian churches, also the Welsh and German churches. Summary tables of the Associations in each State, (the most complete we have ever seen,) fill 26 pages. These are followed by valuable tables, embracing a comparative summary, colored members, Sabbath-schools, ratio of churches, ministers and members to the whole population, Baptist periodicals, ordinations, churches constituted, new church buildings dedicated, and obituary notices. Then follows the educational department, embracing theological seminaries, colleges, academies, high schools, &c. Also an account of our Benevolent Societies. Next we find tables of the Baptist churches in other countries, British Provinces, Europe, Asia, and Africa. The concluding pages contain an account of the Anti-Mission, Free-Will, Six-Principle, Seventh-day Baptists, &c., with a grand summary of baptized Christians and religious denominations.

No description of the volume will do it justice. It must be seen to form a correct idea of the expense and labor bestowed upon it. In view of the expensiveness of so many statistical pages, its engravings, &c., it is one of the cheapest volumes ever issued. It contains 200 pages more than was anticipated when the price was announced.

Price, bound in cloth or sheep, $1 50; five copies, $6. It will be sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, for $2.

Published by the American Baptist Publication Society. Orders for the Register should be directed to Rev. B. R. Loxley, 118 Arch-street, Philadelphia.

THE DEMOCRACY OF CHRISTIANITY, or an Analysis of the Bible and its Doctrines, in their relation to the principle of democracy. By Wm. Goodell. Cady and Burgess, New York. Sold also by William Harned, 48 Beekman-street, New York. The first volume is occupied with an examination of the Old Testament; the second volume carries the investigation into the New, shows the bearing of the leading doctrines of the Gospel upon the principle of democracy, examines the institutions of the New Testament, traces the progress and the influence of Christianity in promoting human liberty, to the present time, and, in the light of Scripture prophecy, as illustrated by the signs of the times, unfolds the future prospects of humanity. The work is designed to promote liberty, both in the Church and the State, and to show that the cause of human freedom is identified with the Christian religion. Price $1 50 at retail, $12 per dozen, or $90 per hundred.

SLAVERY AND ANTI-SLAVERY: A History of the Great Struggle in Both Hemispheres; with a View of the Slavery Question in the United States. By William Goodell, author of "The Democracy of Christianity."

This work is designed to embody a great amount of historical information in a single volume, conveniently arranged for reference. It contains fifty chapters on as many distinct topics, embracing the most important facts in the political and ecclesiastical history of the contest, together with an account of the Anti-Slavery agitation in England and the United States up to the present time; the divisions among American Abolitionists, and the various measures advocated among them; and closing with a brief discussion of the question, "What ought to be done?" The book is an abstract of several volumes, besides the Anti-Slavery history of the last twenty years, a great part of which has never before been collected into any volume, but lies scattered in the newspapers of that period. The Table of Contents and a copious Alphabetical Index will facilitate a reference to particular facts, and to dates when desirable.

It is a large royal 12mo. volume, of about six hundred pages, well printed, on handsome paper, neatly bound in cloth, and lettered. Price one dollar per copy, at retail; $9 per dozen, or $65 per hundred, to booksellers and book pedlars, for cash.

The postage on a single copy will be 30 cents to any part of the United States, and must be prepaid.

For sale by the publisher, William Harned, 48 Beekman-street, New York.

Miscellaneous.

The Lawyer's Story.

I was busy looking over old files, one bright, shiny day in November. Hoping for a little leisure, for my office had been filled all the morning, I had just taken my seat, with the object of my search in my hand, when the door opened softly, and a lady came timidly forward.

I begged her to be seated, at the same time bowing to a new comer, who stepped quietly to the window, and busied himself with a newspaper. For some few moments there was silence, save the rustling of the lady's silk dress, and the movement with which she hastily threw back her green veil, displaying, as she did so, mild, prepossessing features.

In a low, tremulous voice, she commenced what I supposed from her manner would be an affecting narrative, and truly it proved so.

"Some fifteen months since, sir, I was sitting with my family in a retired part of the house; it was too late to expect callers, so we were somewhat startled at the ring of the bell, and a strange, smothered noise in the entry. My eldest daughter looking out, declared that some body had entered, and that she saw a dark looking object near the hall door, like a dog crouching down, and so terrified was she that she sank back half fainting in a chair. Mustering courage, I seized the candle, and with my husband ventured toward the entrance, and saw there a wretched looking basket, which we both immediately lifted, and carried into an adjoining bed-room. The odor issuing from it was of so sickening a character, that it was some moments before I could venture to inspect it, but at length, nerving myself with resolution, I lifted the cover, and the tattered fragments from the top."

Here I noticed that the gentleman comer was holding a new paper, which he had just taken from the file, upside down, while with an absent glance that denoted intense interest (in the story, not the paper,) he was looking at one particular spot in its columns. I myself felt singularly interested, particularly as I observed the woman wiping the tears from her bright eyes, and my little red-headed Irish office-boy kept his lips puckered to the tune he had been whistling, but which seemed now arrested on his lips.

"Well, sir," continued the lady, "I gained courage to look within, and, O! sir," she continued, bursting into tears, "I shall never forget the sight. It was a little baby, a little skeleton baby, not more than a few weeks old; and its thin rags, its little blue, pinched fingers, made it one of the most pitiable objects in the world. Its dear little face was covered with a crust of dirt, its blue eyes, sunken way, way down, and the lips, as white as snow, kept trembling as its little gasping breath came through. I bent down to it as closely as I could, for it seemed drenched in opium, or some such poison, and I could not help crying, indeed I could not, sir, to think how cruel and heartless the mother of that baby must be, thus to neglect it, and leave it to the care of strangers when it was dying, perhaps from starvation."

A thrill passed through my veins, for the touching manner of the narrator struck all my heart's chords, and my friend of the newspaper was making queer faces out of the window.

"I sent right away for a doctor, who, when he came, shook his head gravely and told me I had better send it off to the poor-house, for it would certainly die on my hands; he did not see how it could possibly live.

"Oh, sir, my heart yearned to it, and I couldn't do that, indeed I couldn't. Miserable looking object as it was, my heart yearned to it, for it was a little helpless, innocent baby. And I had buried my own child," she continued, with a fresh gush of tears, that acted instantaneously on mine own eyes, "only a little while before, I had laid my own dear infant in its grave, and night and morning my heart called for it; so I said to the doctor, No, doctor, I won't send it to the poor-house. If it lives it will take the place of my own dead baby; if it dies, I'll soothe its last hours; do all you can for it, doctor, as if it was really ours.

"So I washed the poor thing and dressed it, and O! if you had seen the little bones stricking out at its back, and the little claws of fingers and shrunken limbs, it would have made your heart ache."

My heart was aching all the time; for if any thing affects me it is the sorrows of helpless childhood. My friend winked his eyes, but it would not do, so he held the paper up to his face, and let the tears run. The little red-headed Irish boy was making circles on the floor with his boot-toe.

"Next day, while the poor child was sleeping, a woman who lives in the neighborhood, and whom we occasionally employ, came in, and affected great surprise to see the babe lying in my lost Edward's cradle. She is a very dissolute woman indeed.

"'Was it left here, at your door?' she asked.

"'You know all about it,' I said, turning to her, 'you know it was left here, and I shouldn't wonder if you knew also who was its mother;' for I thought she was wicked enough to do any bad deed.

"She turned pale, but cried out that she knew nothing about it; called Heaven to witness, and was very vehement; and this was all before my daughter, and three or four persons who are ready to testify.

"Well, sir, she went away, and after that came seldom to our house; but once, when she did come, she was intoxicated, and pointing to the baby that had grown beautifully, and was a lovely little creature, she declared she knew all about it—a downright contradiction to what she had sworn before, you see, sir.

"Fifteen months went by; our darling, O! sir, we do love him so dearly, had grown to be such a sweet boy! If you could see him with his great laughing eyes, and white skin, his pretty curls, and fat arms and fingers all dimpled over, you wouldn't wonder we take to him;" and she smiled through her tears at the recollection of his beauty.

"Yesterday I was sitting in my parlor, the dear little fellow sometimes clinging to my knees, sometimes toddling round the room, (for he has just learned to walk, sir,) when I was called into the kitchen. There stood two women, one a very young one, but wild and wicked looking, the other, the person I have spoken about before. What do you think, sir?—they wanted to take that child, that darling child, away from us. They did, indeed, sir, and the young woman said it was her baby. But O! sir, I don't believe it; I can't believe that any one can be so cruel to a child, and then claim it, sir; besides, hadn't the other woman taken oath, as it were, that she did not know any thing about the child, and then perjured herself? Oh! I didn't I couldn't give up that child, sir. Our very heart-strings are twined about him, he is the light of our home; positively, were he taken away, could I no longer see his blue eyes and sunny smile, it would kill me. I am almost crazed now at the thought, (her tears fell freely,) my soul is bound up in him; he fills the place, and more, of our lost one."

Commanding my voice as best I could, I asked her several questions, relative to the assumed mother, and after a patient investigation, came to the conclusion that, all things considered, the affair was a plan contrived to extort money or charity of some kind.

"Oh! sir, you are so good. Then you think I can, that I had best keep the child—O! I am so thankful, sir—you can't tell how I love him! my whole soul revolts at the thought of giving him in into such keeping—and he is so noble and beautiful—besides, I cannot think that woman is the mother, for sir, she never once asked to see the child, and would a mother a true mother, have done that? O! no, no, no. I would have searched the house for him; flown to him; covered him with kisses, and cried out that he was my baby, and no power should keep him from me; but she just sobbed a little, and said, 'O! sure, it's my child, mam, Mrs. Merrin knows, mam.'

"And I may keep him, then, you think; retain him at all risks," she cried, joyfully rising from her seat—"why, sir, I'd lose all I'm worth before I'd give him up—bless his heart! I'd go to law a thousand times—unless," she interrupted herself quickly—"unless to his own mother—but I have my thoughts that that mother is dead, and till I know certain, he shall be my child. Thank you, thank you ten thousand times;" and after paying me my fee, which I had earned by my sympathy, if nothing else, she left the office.

I know that, when I looked at myself in my little glass, I was startled at the peculiar tinge about my eyes, and my friend, turning half away, said, in a subdued voice, "Affecting, isn't it?" But I managed to get sight of his eyes, and—they were as red as, if not redder than my own.

A Kentucky School.

"I wanted Darley at my elbow to sketch the interior of this school. Unconsciousness makes beautiful pictures—the r[illegible]ness and grotesqueness of real life grouping, rather adding than otherwise, to their effect. While three or four of the girls just entering upon awkwardhood, had their heels on the benches and sat with their chins on their knees, feeling of their toes, there were three or four of the younger ones, with grace and beauty enough to equip angels—the heaven they were leaving behind them still radiant in their delicious little faces. One I could have taken to my bosom with a hug and stolen (to adopt and to add to the 'Orion's belt of three,' who form my constellation at home;) a little fairy lying flat on her stomach on the top of a sloping desk, and with her heels in the air, and her cheek in her hand, too busy with her spelling-book to notice our coming in. Her heaps of curls were masses of brown, tanned lighter at the curves, and the russet red of her cheek was beaming with tranquil health—eyes large and steady, hand plump and dirty, shoulders and back bare, and frock ragged. There she lay, learning to spell; and meantime more beautiful than she will be when the spelling is learned, and better worth admiring and loving than when her heels are kept down and her rags changed to the petticoat of womanhood. How out of time and place come the things we most want in this world! I am inclined to think Eden is still around us. Its loveliness and happiness are only misled, mislabeled and unrecognized.

"Of the troops on board the bench provided for the jacket and trouser department of the school, one half, at least, were picking the clay from between the logs, and so getting a look at the open air outside; and they had so far succeeded that the four walls let in the light like a honeycomb. There was one window—a hole sawed through one of the logs, that is to say—but the main supply of light came through the door. Near this stood the tall erect, majestic form of the schoolmaster—certainly the largest supply of dignity for the money (twenty-five dollars a month) which I had yet seen in my travels. How so handsome a man could see himself in the glass, once a day, and keep that school for the pay, I presume Providence knew and provided; but he seemed to me to have nature's ticket on his brow for the government of older minds."

Plant Chesnuts.

The New England Farmer says, very truly: The Chesnut, both on account of its timber and the fruit it produces, deserves more attention than it receives. The nuts intended for planting should not be allowed to become thoroughly dry. Those having been kept in quantity in the stores would probably sprout. They should be kept slightly moist through the Winter and planted in Spring. Nature plants them in the Autumn and covers with a thick coat of leaves; but it is probable that large numbers of those spared by the boys and squirrels never germinate, for want of being placed under favorable circumstances of light and warmth. It is said that they need protection the first Winter, as there is danger of their being killed by freezing. In transplanting, the next Spring, they require much the same attention as other trees, but without so rich a soil as is required for fruit trees. In Italy, Chesnuts grow to the size of small apples, and are used for food by the peasantry.

At a farmers' meeting, in New York, Mr. Rice, speaking of planting Chesnut timber, remarked, that he plowed up a tract of unproductive hill side, and planted it with chesnuts, in rows, four feet apart every way. The first sprouts coming up rather crooked and scrubby, he went over the field and cut them down close to the ground, which caused new shoots to spring up straight and vigorous. The trees are very thrifty, completely shade the ground, and grow more and more rapidly as the soil becomes strengthened by the annual deposit of leaves. So well satisfied is he with the experiment, that he is now placing other worthless lands in a similar course of improvement.

Emerson, in his Tress and Shrubs, says the Chesnut tree is found on the banks of the Mousum river, in the county of York, Maine, a little beyond the 43d parallel of latitude, and thence southward as far as Florida, and in the Western States. It is found in every part of Massachusetts, but does not readily and abundantly ripen its fruit in the immediate neighborhood of the sea.

Michaux says Chesnut copses are considered in France as the most valuable species of property; every seven years they are cut for hoops, and the largest branches serve for vine props; at the end of fourteen years they furnish hoops for large tubs, and at the age of twenty-five years they are proper for posts and light timber. The Chesnut grows well on rocky hills, and other lands hardly rich enough for cultivation.

Statistics for Farmers.

ABOUT COWS.

Among farmers there are a great number of cows kept which give milk not more than about eight months in the year, and during this time would not make, on an average, more than two pounds of butter each week. Thus a cow would fall short of making 75 pounds of butter in a year. The average price of butter, in the country, is not over 16 cents, taking one year with another. This would give for the butter $12. Add to this $2 for the milk after the cream has been taken off, and $1 for the calf at three days old, and you have $15 as the proceeds of the cow for one year. Now for her cost. Call the cow worth $15 to turn into beef. The interest of $15 is 90 cents. (Omit tax on the cow.) Her keeping in summer $5. In winter $12. Time and labor in milking and taking care of milk and butter $8. This would make the sum of $25 90 for the yearly expense of the cow, while her yearly income is only $15.

Now suppose that the cow would give milk 10 months in the year, and for twenty-five weeks would make 8 pounds of butter per week, and for seventeen weeks more would make 4 pounds per week, making in all 268 pounds, (which is far below the product of many good cows,) it would amount to $42 88 cents. Who will find a difficulty in seeing that one of the cows is a dead loss of nearly $11 in a year, and would eat her body up, under such circumstances, in less than a year and a half, while the other would give a clear profit of nearly $17 per year, allowing the same expense of keeping, &c. But, making $5 allowance for extra expense of interest, keeping and tending, and there would still remain a clear profit of about $12 per year, or the interest of $200, and a difference in the profits of the two of about $25 per year. A good cow, and good keeping, ought to afford 300 pounds or more of butter yearly.

ABOUT HORSES.

The old horse that does not earn more than a half dollar per week, the year round, will cost for keeping and shoeing not less, certainly, than $50 in a year. Suppose him to be worth $20, and see how the gain or loss will be. Interest on $20 dollars for one year will be $1 20; taxes we will call 10 cents; cost of keeping and shoeing $50; making a total of $51 30. Service of the horse at 50 cents per week, $26. This subtracted from $51 30 leaves a bill against the old horse of $25 30. This is $5 30 more than the horse was worth at the beginning of the year. The old horse has eaten his body up, and is ready to go about doing it again. Pretty soon he will swallow down a calf or a yearling, or perhaps a small cow, besides eating himself up. Whether farmers will continue to keep such kinds of creatures is a matter for them to inquire into.

Barbarous Suggestions.

A barbarian in the Jacksonville News suggests the following method of getting rid of the Seminole Indians. The writer says:—

"The plan which I propose is one that I suggested three years ago, and which, if it had been adopted, would have removed every Indian in less than three months, and saved the Government at least a million of dollars. It is this: that the State of Florida shall take the matter in its own hands, and offer high rewards for killing and capturing them. If $12 be offered for each warrior captured alive, $1,000 for each warrior killed—and $500 for each woman or child captured alive—but few of them will be either killed or captured before the rest will hasten in and surrender at discretion. Supposing, however, that it might be necessary to kill 40 of the warriors (one-third of their whole number) before the rest become terrified at being waylaid and "still-hunted," the whole expense would be but $400,000, and that the General Government would be bound to refund. One great advantage in this plan is, that if none be killed nor captured, there will be nothing to pay—its expense will only be commensurate with its success—and as all other plans, though attended with vast expense, have signally failed, would it not be wise to give this one a trial? That it would fail, appears to me incredible; for there are more than enough Floridians who would promptly organize in parties of sixty or eighty, arm themselves with double-barreled guns and revolvers, provide themselves with dried beef and cold-flower, and "still-hunt" for weeks at a time, with the double object of ridding their State of its greatest curse, and earning, at the same time, a few thousand dollars."

The Poor Man as Rich as the Richest.

The Hon. Edward Everett, in one of his beautiful speeches in Boston the other evening, (at the dinner to Mr. Baring,) argued in his felicitous style, that there could be no anatagonism between capital and labor. The owner of capital, he said, in England or America, really reaps the smallest portion of the advantages which flow from its possession—he being but a kind of head-book-keeper, or chief clerk to the business community. He may be as rich as Crœsus, but he can neither eat, drink nor wear more than one man's portion. Mr. Everett said he remembered hearing a jest made about Mr. Astor's propety, which contained, he thought, a great deal of meaning—a latent, practical phlosophy. Some one was asked whether he would be willing to take care of all Mr. Astor's property—eight or ten millions of dollars—merely for his board and clothing.

"No," was the indignant answer; "do you think me a fool?" "Well," rejoins the other, "that's all Mr. Astor himself gets for taking care of it; he's found and that's all. The houses, the warehouses, the ships, the farms which he counts by the hundred and is obliged to take care of, are for the accommodation of others." "But he has the income, the rents of all this mighty property." "Yes, but he can do nothing with his income but build more houses and warehouses and ships, or loan more money on mortgages for the convenience of others. He's found, and you can make nothing else out of it."

The Caloric Engine.

The Boston Transcript sums up the advantages of the newly invented caloric engine as follows:—

1. The caloric engine burns about one-tenth as much fuel as a steam engine; hence, a caloric ship of the largest size may circumnavigate the globe without stopping to take in coal; hence, not a sail will be seen on the ocean in fifty years after the success of the new principle is certain; hence, machinery will be applied to a thousand arts which now require manual labor; hence, the possibility of that long-desired machine-plough; and hence the coming of that good time when arduous manual toil will absolutely cease under the sun.

2. The cost of the caloric engine is about the same as the steam engine, minus the cost of the boilers.

3. Only one-fourth as many engine-men will be required on board a coloric ship as are necessary for a steamer.

4. No smoke whatever will issue from a caloric furnace when anthracite coal is used, and consequently no huge, unsightly smoke-pipe will be necessary, and the rigging will be as clean as that of a sailing-ship.

5. There can be no bursting or collapsing of boilers, for the simple reason that there will be no boilers to burst. The worst accident that can happen to a caloric engine is for it to stop; nor is watchfulness imperatively required, as in no case can a dangerous accident occur.

6. Owing to the extreme simplicity of the caloric engine, the wear and tear will be very slight, and the duration of the engine proportionably long.

Patent Transplanting Apparatus.

The transplanting machine of Mr. M'Glashen, of Edinburgh, now well known to practical men in the east country, and for which he has received a first-class certificate of merit from the Caledonian Horticultural Society, was tested on a recent afternoon on the grounds of Mr. Campbell, of Blythswood, in presence of a large party of ladies and gentlemen and practical men. Mr. M'Glashen having everything in readiness to proceed with the operation, a fine laurel, the branches of which were twelve feet in diameter, was raised with the ball of earth, five feet seven inches square, and three feet deep, attached and placed on a truck for removal in less than a quarter of an hour. The laurel, with the soil adhering to the root, was calculated to be between four and five tons in weight. The raising of the shrub vertically from its bed was accomplished with the greatest ease by the action of a screw turned by two men. The success of the operation was deemed highly satisfactory, and must have been very gratifying to Mr. M'Glashen, the inventor. The invention is applicable to all departments of gardening, and in its various forms can raise with the same facility the florists' flower and the largest tree.

New Coal Fields.—Mr. Allen, President of the Buffalo and Pittsburg Railroad Company, and Messrs. Mann & Watson, Directors of the Company, have recently examined portions of McKean county, Pa., on the line of the above-named road, for the purpose of acquiring information with regard to the coals of that region. They determined the position of several seams of excellent bituminous coal of considerable thickness, quite accessible above water-level, on the banks of streams very near and on the line of the railroad, within eighty miles of Buffalo. These gentlemen also procured specimens of coal from several places near the line of the Erie and Sunbury Railroad, and not far from the point where the Buffalo and Pittsburg road will connect with that road. One of the specimens is a good article, known as cannel coal, desirable for gas; the seam is of good thickness.

Cast Iron Pavement.—Workmen are engaged in paving Howard-street, Boston, with cast iron. The pavement is of a novel character, being composed of circular boxes of cast iron, about twelve inches in diameter, and five inches in height, divided into six compartments, so small as not to admit the hoof of a horse. In the present experiment, these spaces will be filled with gravel, but some other substance, such as a composition of asphaltum and sand or gravel, may be found more suitable. The surface of the pavement is grooved, to prevent horses from slipping, and on the outer edge of each box are keys which fit into the edges of the surrounding boxes, thus binding the whole firmly together The thickness of the outer rim and the inner divisions is about an inch. The street will be covered with a net work of iron, filled in with a substance to produce a smooth, durable surface. The inventor of this plan is Mr. William D. Terry, of Boston, and it is the opinion in Boston that it will be successful.

An old Anecdote Revived.—Some have not yet learned that "brevity is the soul of wit," and for their benefit we repeat a favorite story of Franklin, which shows how much verbiage may be pruned away by those who study the art. A hatter setting up business consulted his friends on the inscription for his shop:—"John Thompson, hatter, makes and sells hats for ready money," with the sign of a hat. The first friend suggested that "hatter" was superfluous—the second that it was better not to mention "ready money," for it was sometimes prudent to give credit—and a third, that the purchaser of a hat cared not a fragment of nap who made it. The inscription was abridged in obedience to these suggestions to "Thompson sells hats." "Sells!" exclaimed a fourth, "why, who would expect you to give them away?" Upon which the last two words were expunged, and all that remained of the original device was "John Thompson," with the sign of a hat.

A Sad Case.—An industrious Irishman, residing in Boston, had accumulated and saved money enough from his earnings, to secure and furnish a snug little tenement, and to send for his family to come over and occupy it. They took passage in the ship Moses Wheeler, which arrived last week, after a stormy and tedious voyage, having been long and anxiously expected. Day after day he had watched for their coming until hope deferred had made his heart sick, when the welcome announcement that the ship had arrived reached his ears. He immediately proceeded to meet and greet his loved ones, and convey them home; but was met by the terrible announcement that his wife and six children had died during the passage over, and he was left alone!

Youthful Crime.—A Fitchburg correspondent of the Boston Traveler states that four boys have been arrested in that city for store-breaking and larceny. One of them, the son of a highly respectable mechanic, was arrested in the High School, of which he was a member. The writer says: "In the progress of the examination it appeared that they had regularly prepared themselves for thieving, and had fitted up a small room in a barn adjoining the house of one of them as a receptacle for stolen goods. On examining this room, a large number of articles, which were ascertained to have been stolen, were discovered. A book was also found, in which was a long list of houses and stores that had been entered, and an account of all the articles taken. A ledger was also found, in which each boy had an account, and was credited on one side with the amount he stole, and on the other side was charged with the amount he received of the stolen property. A large quantity of tools, taken from different workshops in town, were also found. The boys had regular signals, and have been in the habit of attending public meetings and creating disturbances. Two of the offenders were sentenced to the State Reform School during their minority, and the other two were fined $10 each and costs. They were all liable to go to the State Prison, but clemency was shown with the hope of reform. All the boys belonged to respectable families, and had enjoyed, as is believed, excellent home privileges and instruction. The oldest was but 16 years of age, and the youngest 13.

"My Last Sketch."—A week or two since, the newspapers of this city published a paragraph in which it was stated that a gentleman justly celebrated as a portrait painter, had been sent to the House of Correction as a common drunkard. A few days before this occurred, the unfortunate individual, suffering all the horrors of the mania a potu, went into the reading room of a hotel in this city, and observing in one corner a gentleman with whom he formerly had some acquaintance, went up to him, and taking his hat from his head, pointed to the inside, and said, "Colonel, will you be so good as to look at my last sketch?" The Colonel complied, and saw written on the inside of the crown of his hat, "For God's sake, give us a quarter!" and this was the poor inebriate's "last sketch." The Colonel, with a heart beating for wrecked humanity, gave the man a quarter, and he sought once more oblivion in the fatal cup.

Fainting at the right Time.—A Washington correspondent of The Concord Democrat, writing Jan. 22, says: "Yesterday, in the House, a poor lady over 60 years of age, who had been for six years prosecuting a claim on Congress, in the name of her mother, a woman 89 years old, was the occasion of quite a scene. The bill, at last, after so many days of hope deferred and anxious poverty, was brought up. The lady herself, who was present, in scant attire of sable, listened to the debate with painful interest, and when at last the indications that the bill would pass became too evident to be doubted, the long-pent emotions of her heart were stronger than her strength, and she fainted and fell insensible on the floor. The claim, amounting to some $2,000, was put through instanter. Never did woman faint in better time. There was hardly a show of opposition."

Common Schools of New York.—The expenditures for teachers' wages during the last year, amount to $1,681,316.01. Expended for libraries, and other school purposes, $2,249,814.02. Whole amount of public moneys received $1,384,367.09. Ditto disbursed $1,242,916.10. Leaving unappropriated $105,450.99. The Comptroller reports that there are in the State 862,507 pupils attending public schools; 1,767 attending private schools; 105 colored schools, with 4,416 scholars.

VARIETY.

Ole Bull's Norwegian settlement, in Pennsylvania, is going on well. Since the snow fell they have been as active as before, and they are now busily engaged in making roads, building houses, mills, and other works. Several new houses have been entirely completed already since winter set in, and the prospect now is that preparations will be made by spring for receiving a large addition to the settlement. At Cartee Camp a new school house has been erected, and school opened in it. A steam saw mill and two water mills are already under way, and everything about the settlement indicates energy and prosperity.

The New London (Conn.) Chronicle, under the head of "A splendid specimen of female task," states that a lady of that city has made two bed-spreads of pieces of silk and satin, "one of them containing 8,000, and the other 12,052 pieces, the whole combined with a taste almost equal to that displayed upon the Gobelin tapestry, and sewed together with so much art as to equal tho finest mosaic work."

The Shippensburg (Pa.) News, Jan. 29, says that the Broad Mountain Vein at Coal Castle, which took fire on the 13th of Dec., thirteen years since, still continues to pour forth its sulphuric gases, and in wet weather steam may be seen rising in volumes. For a distance of half a mile, this large vein has been entirely consumed above water-level!—how far below is not known.

The Counties of Van Buren, Ingham, Eaton, Branch, Berrien and Barry, of Michigan, were named after Gen. Jackson's first Cabinet, formed in March of 1829: Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, Secretary of the Navy, Attorney-General and Postmaster-General: and Jackson County was named after the Old Hero himself.

The people of the United States pay as much for imported cigars as they receive for exported wheat; and drink in the form of French brandy, the whole proceeds of the Indian corn exportation.

On the 18th ult., a negro man, named Harry, died a few miles west of Murfreesboro, (Tenn.,) at the advanced age of 120 years. Also in the vicinity of the same place, a negro woman aged 113.

Dr. Benjamin Vale, of Guilford, Chenango County, died on the 16th ult., at the advanced age of 102.

Abraham Miller, who was with Wolfe, at the taking of Quebec, is still living in Canada, at the age of 115 years.

A man named Joseph Clarke was hung in New York on Friday, Feb. 11, for the murder of a Police Officer in April, 1851.

DEDICATION OF CHILDREN.

BY WILLIAM M. FAHNESTOCK, M. D.

Its Nature.

With the foregoing preliminary remarks—extended prolegomena—rendered necessary to a clear understanding of the subject before me, I proceed to discuss the validity of the privilege of the blessed Master, by which our offspring are brought into consecrated association with the family of the redeemed, and the importance of observing the duty inculcated by the example set for our imitation by the Head of the Church—Matth. 19: 13—15, and Mark 10: 13—16.

And the first matter, worthy of observation, that I would call attention to, is, that the great Prophet and Lawgiver was teaching, and was teaching for posterity—He was giving utterance to principles and doctrines designed for the visible church; and it may be well to add, that he did not reserve his operative and obligatory teachings, to be respected by his chosen people, in after times, to elaborate homilies and discourses from the "sacred desk." He did not reserve his mandates of law and duty to be proclaimed within "holy places," to royal auditories, for he had no regular place of worship—no Meeting-House, no Church, if I can persuade myself to connect that term, by any strained metonymy, with wood and brick, or stone and mortar, and some gew-gaw tinsel, for my plain idea of a Christian Church is nothing more nor less than a family of Believers on the Lord Jesus Christ, in covenant with their Maker and Reedeemer. Christ was teaching, and the dedication of children he taught, explicitly, both by precept and by example; and until one wiser than Solomon shall show me, when Christ's sayings, in reference to his kingdom—his church—are to be operative, and when a nullity, I shall adhere to his words and to his example, most uncompromisingly.

I contend, that we have no authority to cast aside a jot or title of all that he has declared for our edification and sanctification. He was expounding the doctrine of divorce, and explaining the marriage contract. Are not the doctrines or the principles of either of these important matters operative still, or are they a nullity? If both are embraced in the Christian code, and are so received and respected by the Christian Church, throughout the world, why not the other? By parity of all correct reasoning, it possesses the same binding regard, on all the followers of the Lord, in every age, and every clime. "Why make fish of one, and flesh of the other?" Some exceedingly wise ones in their own conceit, have founded an objection, on it being an act, simply, to rebuke the Pharisees, who, it is alledged, desired to obstruct the ministry of the Redeemer, for they were confounded by his wisdom, which could penetrate the secrets of their invidious motives, to confuse and destroy the influence of his doctrines. Well, notwithstanding that may have been the case, yet, have not the same circumstances, on more than one occasion, evoked from the Redeemer the radical and abiding principles of the Gospel? But it must be remembered, that it was not the Pharisees, that were so officious on that occasion; for it is expressly declared, that it was the disciples who rebuked the persons that presented their offspring. The blessed Master was teaching, and I repeat, that he had no Temple, no Hortatory, no Hall of Audience, in which to teach—the Manger was his birth-place, and his Sanctuary the Way-side. He sanctified every thing, in every place. He had no "sacred desk" from which to announce his doctines, nor any set form of dialectics to make disciples and define the order of his house; but the most of his doctrines and practices—his ordinances, rites, and privileges—were brought out, as it were, by the peculiar circumstances attending his sojourn upon earth. Still, in other matters, they are not repudiated and laid aside. Why should this be? It has as legitimate claims to paternity, and equal incentives to our sacred regard. This was Christ's chosen way to introduce and establish his kingdom here below—this the logic of the New Covenant. And, doubtless, he was confiding enough to think, that those who professed to believe on him would keep his words, and imitate his examples, from their simple announcement or exhibition. He did not act as if his sayings needed a major, a minor, and a conclusion; but that his intimations and examples spoke loud enough to influence his redeemed. In not a single ordinance, or rite, did he resort to the schoalstic form of syllogism to impose any service on his people, although he could confound all the astute philsophers of the age, and put to shame even the profoundest sceptic and reviler.

The great mass of professed Christians regard the duty of bringing little children unto the Lord, and dedicating them in very early life to the Most-High, as an imperative, a covenant duty. The feeling is almost universal in this matter; but it is strange, passing strange, indeed, that in a matter of this nature there should be such a diversity of opinion on the subject, and such a wide departure from the original design of the great Institutor, who has not only made it a matter of clear revelation, but the most unmistakable example. How men, good and true men, can be so far led astray, to pervert the gracious design of the Redeemer, in this institution, is inexplicable, except by giving themselves over to that greatest of follies, "being wise above the written word;" and it is scarcely less inexplicable, how men, good and true men, can so wholly neglect, so shamelessly disregard the one introduced and established for the express purpose of meeting that want of the regenerate heart.

As many excellent ministers, in sermonizing, undertake to show, first, what their text does not mean, to prepare the way to exhibit the true interpretation, I shall avail myself of that common practice, in expounding my subject; and, first, show that it does not mean "infant baptism," as it is generally regarded, and afterward explain its true import, and how it is to be observed; and as I desire to be as brief as possible, and being well assured, from much observation, that mooted points are generally decided, more by the weight of venerated authorities than by argument, as general readers do not relish an extended critique, I shall, in a great measure, draw my sustaining evidence on this occasion, from such sources rather than from extended arguments, especially as I can derive abundant material of that kind from the admissions of the Pædobaptists themselves.

Various as are the phases of the positions of the Pædobaptists, to sustain themselves in their bold assumptions, still the great majority of them rely, mostly, on the same general grounds, to maintain their perverted, mutilated institution. There would be no end to a review which would attempt the slightest glance at the innumerable variations of argument, and the most cursory refutation of their sophistry, which they resort to, in the absence of scriptural example, to defend their unwarrantable practice.

Of late most all the expounders and commentators take their pitch-note from Dr. Lightfoot, who has, certainly, given the whole gist of the argument on that side of the question, in the most able form; but as I have an author of no mean pretensions and standing, of much more recent date, at hand, Professor Schmucker, of the Lutheran church—a gentleman of erudition and tact, and well posted up on the subject, who has treated it with as much ability and perspicuity as any writer since the days of Lightfoot and Doddridge, I avail myself of his treatise, "Elements of Popular Theology"—the text-book in the Theological Seminaries of the Lutheran denomination—to present their gloss of it.

The main ground on which all Pædobaptists predicate "infant baptism," is, that of its being an ordinance instituted by Christ Jesus, as a substitute for the ordinance of circumcision. The failure to find a command, or even an intimation, in the Scriptures, for that rite, and the exposure of the fallacy of it being a substitute for circumcision, will, I trust, be sufficient to explode the groundless assumption.

PÆDOBAPTIST VIEW.

Dr. Schmucker, I am happy to remark, in limine, does not regard baptism as a regenerating ordinance, as is now strenuously insisted upon by one or two so-called Protestant churches, or at least the "high-church party" of that branch of Zion, but treats it—1. As smybolic; 2. As initiatory; 3. As federal.

> 1. Symbolic. It figuratively represents, says that writer, the process of purification, and thus—1. implies that natural depravity, of which we need to be cleansed; 2. teaches the remedial nature of the New Testament church, which prescribes the means of purification; and, 3. the purifying influences of the Holy Spirit.
> 2. Initiatory. This, says the same writer, is explicitly taught by the Saviour, when he says, "Make disciples of all nations (by) baptizing," and teach them, &c. It was viewed, moreover, in this light by the Jews generally, (?) and by the Essenes, before it was appointed by the Saviour; and it has so uniformly been considered by Christians from the days of the Apostles (?) Baptism is, therefore, that ordinance by which alone men can be admitted into the visible church of Christ.
> The Abrahamic covenant, or economy, is a reiteration of the covenant of grace, made by God with Abraham, or rather published by God to him, for himself and his descendants, and after the advent of Christ for all others of every nation whom the gospel should reach. "For the promise," says Peter, "is to you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." In the terms of this covenant are evidently embraced, the Jews with their children, and also, after the coming of Christ, all others to whom the gospel is preached, together with their children. The visible church is a visible society, established by God for the visible administration of the instructions, ordinances and discipline prescribed by him in the Abrahamic and different other developements of the covenant of grace. To this visible society, or church, must belong all those who have pledged themselves for the performance of the duties prescribed for its members, who are actually engaged in their performance, and have been admitted in the prescribed form, if any has been enjoined. But if any form or rite of initiation has been prescribed, which in its nature is also applicable to children, who cannot yet pledge themselves, nor perform duties prescribed for adults, then children also, who have received this initiatory rite, are likewise embraced in the visible church.
> In accordance with these views, we find the Saviour requires baptism when directing his followers to go and make disciples of all nations, evidently regarding it as the initiatory rite; and the practice and requisition of the apostles fully accord with his example.
> This view of baptism as an initiatory rite seems to be placed beyond doubt by the apostle Paul in 1 Cor. 1: 13, when speaking against divisions or sects in the church. He says, that if he had baptized any persons in his own name, he would thereby have represented himself as the head of a sect, and they be obliged to him as their head; but as they were baptized into the name of Christ, they were thereby united to his (Christ's) church, evidently implying that baptism is the ordinance of initiation or adhesion to the church.
> From these positions it follows, Dr. Schmucker concludes, 1. That the children of Jewish parents were embraced in the Abrahamic covenant before circumcision, but not in the visible church. 2. That the children of professing Christians are included in the Abrahamic covenant by virtue of the terms of said covenant, prior to baptism, but not that they are members of the visible church. 3. That the children of the Jews were, and of Christians are, entitled to membership; that is, possess all the qualifications required by God, and are intended to be admitted; but that their actual admission is made by baptism under the new, as it was by circumcision under the old dispensation.
> 3. Federal. By this ordinance we enter into a solemn covenant with our God, as did the Jews by circumcision.
> It was in this view of the ordinance that the early Lutheran church disciplines (kirchen ordnungen) required it to be performed in public in cases of adults, "Baptism, they say, shall in all cases be performed like confirmation, in the church, before the congregation, and not in private dwellings; for Christ, without naming any exceptions, says, 'Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess before my father in heaven.'"

While Dr. Schmucker, generously, admits, in his remarks on the "Subjects of Baptism," that "adult believers are proper subjects of baptism—who, "having heard the gospel call, believe in its representations, and have resolved to accept the offers of mercy as presented in it"—yet, he maintains "that the children of professing Christians are also entitled to this ordinance," which he attempts to sustain in the following condensed argument:—

> God expressly commanded the admission of infants into his visible church, when he first made his covenant with Abraham, appointed circumcision as the initiatory rite, and determined to whom it should be applied. On this subject there never had been and never could be any doubt. The covenant was expressly extended to infants descended from Abraham, to servants born in Jewish families, and to servants purchased with money. The covenant which God thus made with Abraham, and on the basis of which infants were received into the visible church, was not a temporary one, soon to be abolished; but it was to remain in its essential features through all future generations, for an everlasting covenant; God promising to be a God unto them and to their seed after them, and requiring them to be his people. The same covenant was promulgated anew by Moses, as the covenant made with "Abraham;" and represented as the basis of that visible people of God, which should possess his name in all future generations.
> The force of these circumstances, says our author, is augmented by the fact that baptism had been introduced among the Jews in connection with circumcision, as an initiatory rite, and was thus applied to infants. * * The Jews generally, and the Essenes in particular, had, prior to the Saviour's advent, been in the habit of receiving proselytes by baptism. But their own writers inform us, that it was customary also to baptize the children of those who were thus received.

In addition to the foregoing remarks from Dr. Schmucker, I append one or two short extracts from Drs. Lightfoot and Whitby, to give the Pædobaptists all the advantage of their best positions and the most authoritative names among their distinguished writers.

> "You see (says Dr. Lightfoot) baptism inseparably joined to the circumcision of proselytes. There was indeed some little distance of time: for they were not baptized until the pain of circumcision was healed, because water might be injurious to the wound; but certainly baptism ever followed. We acknowledge, indeed, that circumcision was plainly of divine institution, but by whom baptism, which was inseparable (? only proselyte,) from it was instituted, is doubtful. And yet it is worthy of observation, that our Saviour rejected circumcision, and retained the appendix, baptism; and when all the Gentiles were to be introduced into the true religion, he preferred this proselytical introductory (pardon the expression) unto the sacrament of entrance into the Gospel."
> "Baptism (says Whitby) is a rite of initiation to Christians, as circumcision was to the Jews; for by virtue of our spiritual circumcision in baptism he (the apostle) proves we have no need of an outward circumcision to be a type of the purity to be obtained by baptism. Hence I infer, that baptism is Christ's ordinance for infants of believing parents, as circumcision was of old for infants of the Jews; for if it had been otherwise, and infants under Christianity had not been received by any federal rite into covenant with God, the objection of the necessity of circumcision, as to them, would still have held, they entering into covenant by no other rite, and so remaining strangers from the church and as much aliens from the adoption, the covenant, and promises, as the Gentiles were."[*]
> "Hence, then, (says the same writer in another place,) the argument for infant baptism runs thus: If the holy seed among the Jews was, therefore, to be circumcised, and be made federally holy by receiving the sign of the covenant, and being admitted into the number of God's holy people, because they were born in sanctity, or were seminally (?) holy; for the root being holy, so are the branches also; then, by like reason, the holy seed of Christians ought to be admitted to baptism, and receive the sign of the Christian Covenant, the Laver of Regeneration, and so be entered into the society of the Christian Church."[†]

The foregoing extracts embrace the sentiments of the Pædobaptists generally—the Lutherans, the Presbyterians, the Episcopalians, and the Methodists, Dr. Clarke adopting Dr. Lightfoot's view, and appropriating it in his Commentary. And what do they amount to? Assumptions the boldest—assumptions without a particle of scriptural proof, to show that baptism was designed as a substitute for circumcision, or that baptism was connected with circumcision.

Agreeing, in the main, with Dr. Schmucker, in the Symbolic and the Initiatory features of the ordinance of baptism, I shall pass them by with one remark, and that is, while I admit that baptism is the initiatory rite of admittance into the visible church, it cannot be an initiatory rite to those who cannot comply with its prerequisites and conditions. It is a rite only for persons having volition, persons capable of exercising faith and repentance—emphatically, for "men," as Dr. Schmucker calls believers.

The most that can possibly be made from the foregoing extracts, representing fairly and impartially the sentiments of the Pædobaptists, for "infant baptism," is—1. That Baptism must be regarded as a substitute for, or as "having come in the place of, circumcision." 2. That proselytes and their children were baptized after being circumcised under the Abrahamic covenant. 3. That the promise of covenant blessings to the seed of Abraham, or, as Peter expresses it, "to you, and to your children," implies baptism imposed and required.

It is not necessary for me to prove, that circumcision has been abolished, for that is generally conceded; but it may be well to add a remark of Dr. Alexander, to the point, whose orthodoxy, as a Pædobaptist, no one will question: "Circumcision, (says he,) had continued about 1900 years, but was abolished by means of our Saviour's death and resurrection; and the use of it as necessary to saluation became wicked and damnable, because it imported that the true Messiah had not made satisfaction for sin, and was a practical rejection of him and his atonement." If abrogated, it has been abrogated thoroughly, radically; and consequently no part of it can be a copy or a pattern for the Gospel church, unless such part of it can be shown to be excepted by the Scriptures. If abolished, it was abolished wholly, with the expiration of the old dispensation. I, therefore, proceed to examine the validity of the three propositions above stated; and appropriate some very pertinent remarks from the masterly argument of Mr. A. M. Bebee, who has given us an unanswerable essay on the flimsy pretext of the substitute; prefering, as I always do, the very language of a writer who has given his particular attention to a matter, and has penned a clear and satisfactory exposition of it, rather than to vamp it anew, to gain a little eclat for apparently original development. When a writer has once elaborated a subject creditably, it is gross plagiarism, to filch his ideas and cloak them in other words, for self-aggrandizement. It is a contemptible trick, which betrays a weak mind and a disingenuous spirit.

BAPTISM NO SUBSTITUTE FOR CIRCUMCISION.

> If, indeed, as our Pædobaptist friends say, baptism came in the room of circumcision, the time of its substitution must have been known to some person or persons. It could not have been introduced clandestinely, and without command; and it could not have been left to be guessed at by theologians of modern days, and their conjectures to be issued for the credence of their successors. The rite of circumcision was of too high authority, and too holy in Jewish estimation, to be readily abandoned for any substitute which was sanctioned by less than a supreme Legislator. If, then, baptism was substituted for circumcision, it must have been so substituted by the supreme Lawgiver, the Lord Jesus Christ; for all allow, Baptists and Pædobaptists, that it is a gospel ordinance, and was instituted under the gospel dispensation. Both the ordinance of baptism and that of the Lord's Supper are acknowledged by both to be gospel institutions, deriving all their authority from the positive commands of Jesus Christ. If, then, baptism came in the room of circumcision, Jesus Christ must have pronounced it such substitute in the presence of those whom he selected as his disciples. If such were indeed the fact, these constant companions of the Lord must have known it. If they did not know of this great change, no persons rising up in after days, and presuming to make the assertion, can be entitled to any attention. That the apostles or primitive Christians ever knew that baptism came in the room of circumcision, must be refuted with the force of demonstration, by the narration of the events recorded in the fifteenth chapter of Acts.
> The first verse of the chapter states that "certain men which came down from Judea taught the brethren" that "except they were circumcised after the manner of Moses, they could not be saved." The brethren so taught were Gentiles, members of the church at Antioch, with whom Paul and Barnabas were abiding (as will be seen by reading the last four verses of the preceding chapter,) after their return from a missionary tour into Asia Minor. Those who so "taught the brethren at Antioch," mark, were the brethren from Jerusalem, the seat of intelligence, as is evident from the twenty-fourth verse. Now, that these persons should have been ignorant of this substitute for circumcision (Jews too,) who had themselves been baptized, and should have insisted upon the observance of an abrogated rite, is truly perplexing and unaccountable. But after a most unreasonable allowance for such ignorance in persons from the fountain head of light, where this substitute could not have failed to elicit both private and public instruction, we meet with still greater perplexity in the ignorance of such men as Paul and Barnabas, in regard to this substitute! that they should not have urged this fact before the church of Antioch, and silenced the great contention with which it was agitated! Not a word of this substitute, however, seems to have been mentioned, and a delegation is appointed, composed of "Paul and Barnabas, and certain others," to "go up to Jerusalem unto the apostles and elders about this question." What question? Whether the Gentiles must not be circumcised.
> Certainly, the apostles (all will acknowledge) must have known, if any mortals in the world knew, that baptism was the substitute for circumcision, if such were the fact; and when the question from Antioch was presented, they must have settled it at once with a reply something like the following: 'Why, brethren, we are exceedingly glad to see you, and rejoice in the intelligence you bring us of the progress of the Redeemer's kingdom; but we are surprised at your mission about an A B C question which is connected with the first instructions of the gospel convert. Circumcision was abolished with the introduction of the gospel, and baptism has come in its place, as all well know here in Jerusalem. Is it possible, that Barnabas, whom we sent to you more than a year ago to instruct and comfort you, has baptized so many, and not yet taught you that baptism has come in the place of circumcision? Is it possible that Barnabas and Paul were with you a whole year before they brought us the endearing testimony of your love, which was timely in relieving our wants, and before their missionary tour into Asia Minor, gave you no information of this well-known fact?" If baptism had indeed come in the room of circumcision, this would have been the natural reply of the brethren at Jerusalem. Every one must see that no reply could have been given, in which this information could possibly have been omitted, had such been the case. It must be irresistibly clear, to every candid reflector, that no intelligent Christian could have touched the question without adverting immediately to the substitution. But how is the important question answered?
> In the sixth verse we learn that "the apostles and elders came together for to consider of this matter;" and in the seventh verse, that "when there had been much disputing, Peter rose up." If the fact was, as alledged by Pædobaptists, that baptism came in the room of circumcision, how in the name of common sense could there have been a chance for dissension? However ignorant Christians might be elsewhere, about the abrogation of circumcision, and the institution of baptism in its place, here—at the fountain-head of ecclesiastical intelligence, where the apostles, the first and constant companions of the Saviour, dwelt—the idea of ignorance on this point is utterly inadmissible. And yet, after all, there was "much disputing" in this illuminated body as to the circumcision of these Gentiles at Antioch! Indeed! Baptism the substitute of circumcision, and yet these wise men engaged in "much disputing" as to the exemption of these Gentiles from an abrogated rite! Was ever a greater absurdity imposed upon the credulity of human beings? Disputing on a settled point, where there could not have existed any thing but harmony and unanimity for years! What will not the prejudice of education content men to take up with!

Conclusive as the foregoing argument of Mr. Bebee must prove to all unprejudiced minds, still I shall add a few brief notices from one or two distinguished Pædobaptists writers, as I always delight to fortify a position I may be advocating, by the admissions, even if they be constrained admissions, of an opponent. Dr. Emmons, a very distinguished New England divine, in answer to Dr. Hemmenway, one of his own brethren, "repudiated all arguments drawn from this Old Testament document, and plead that the ordinances of the gospel should be ascertained from the gospel itself." Dr. Halley, of England, has lately, in a very formal manner, taken the same ground: "I have, says he, and ought to confess it candidly, some serious objections to the acknowledgment of baptism as the substitute for circumcision. * * The general opinion that baptism is substituted for circumcision, as a kind of hereditary seal of the covenant of grace, appears to be ill-sustained by scriptural evidence, and to be exposed to some very serious, if not absolutely fatal objections."[*]

"PROSELYTICAL" BAPTISM.

I need not say much on the subject of proselytes among the Jews having been baptized by them after circumcision had been performed, which appears to be the pivot of the discussion, or rather the bulwark of "Pædobaptism," for there is not a particle of scriptural injunction or intimation for it; and it would occupy too much space to examine the apocryphal testimony adduced to favor it, for I unhesitatingly declare, that I have no confidence in any proof, outside of the Inspired Word of God, to sustain a divine institution—the very circumstance of going outside of the Scriptures of Truth, excites great doubt, and betrays great weakness. Indeed, "proselytical" baptism is so palpably an excrescence of man's invention, that its greatest advocates admit the fact, and yield the point, although it is with a bad grace; for some of them still adhere to it enough to twist it into an argument to sustain their theory of a parallel between circumcision and Christian baptism. Thus we have seen Dr. Lightfoot unequivocally admits it—I repeat his words: "We acknowledge, indeed, that circumcision was plainly of divine institution; but by whom baptism (proselytical) which was inseparable from it, was instituted, is doubtful." The whole testimony adduced is a few notices of it from Jewish writers, of about as much weight as the contradictory statements and arguments of the "Early Fathers" of the Christian Church, on which sole authority, a thousand and one vagaries are foisted on the church as of divine appointment; which term, Catholic, I employ and apply, solely, to the church which first claimed it, and which, unquestionably, is entitled to it, from priority and numbers, while I do not admit that any one church is entitled to it, par excellance, above another. They, those Jewish writers, are just about as good authority for "proselytical" baptism, as is that of the "Early Fathers" of the Christian Church, for the "sacredness of the first day of the week," reverence for relics, and invocation of the saints, &c., &c. I, therefore (while I do not deny it having been practiced, yet question the authority to do so) dismiss it, as a groundless piece of supererrogation in regard to legitimate circumcision.

Even admitting, for argument, that baptism was administered to proselytes and to their children, yet there is not the slightest evidence from a single writer, that it was ever administered to a child of an Israelite. Men, to suit their purposes, make a distinction between the circumcision of an Israelite and of a Gentile. God never did. He provided no distinction in the mode of performing it in either case. It was a man-made appendage. The difficulty arises, entirely, from man's meddling with a divine intstiution; and if history proves any truth, not any thing is more certain than that, whenever man meddles with divine institutions to improve them, he makes sad, bungling work of it; and so, particularly in this instance. I shall have another opportunity, in a more appropriate connection, to introduce a definition of proselyte, and give some clear elucidation of it, when I come to consider the meaning of disciple; as a correct understanding of these terms may serve to remove some of the difficulties, or rather some of the stumbling blocks thrown into the way by our Pædobaptist friends. "Dr. Owen thinks, (says Dr. Gill,) this custom was taken up by some Antemishnical Rabbins, in intimation of John the Baptist; which is not very probable, though more so than any thing before advanced. To me it seems a clear case, adds Dr. Gill, that this custom was framed upon a general notion of the uncleanness of the heathens, before embracing the Jewish religion; and, therefore, devised this baptism, or dipping, as a symbol of their purity, which was, or ought to be, in them, when they become Jews."[*]

If the obligation to baptize infants is derived, as Pædobaptists assert, from that rite as connected with circumcision, why not retain and imitate the other ceremony said by the same authority to be connected with it, namely, sacrifice. Calmet says: "The Jews require three things to a complete proselyte—circumcision, baptism, and sacrifice; but for women, only baptism and sacrifice." Stackhouse alledges, that "the custom of the Jews, in all ages, has been to receive their heathen proselytes by baptism, as well as by sacrifice and circumcision;" and Witseies affirms, that "when a Gentile becomes a proselyte of righteousness, three ceremonies were used—circumcision, baptism, and sacrifice."[‡] Maimonides, often called the Eagle of the Doctors, Jewish doctors of divinity, and who is relied upon, principally, by Dr. Lightfoot and other Pædobaptist writers, to sustain the "proselytical" baptism, says, "Circumcision, baptism, and an offering (sacrifice) were required of every Gentile, who assumed the vows and entered into the covenant to obey the law and take refuge under the wings of the divine majesty."[‡] If a substitute for "proselytical" baptism, why not perform the other ceremony performed by the Israelites when the child dies without circumcision. Dr. William Brown assures us, in his Antiquities of the Jews, which information he gives on the authority of Buxtorff,[§] that children dying before the eighth day, were circumcised in the cemetery, on the lid of the coffin, and names given to them, that they might be known at the resurrection of the just. To be consistent, they must assuredly adopt and carry out the revolting, inhuman ceremony, if it be much more extravagant, or a greater folly, than a like superstition of sprinkling an unconscious infant in the agonies of death.

FEDERAL RELATION OF BAPTISM.

It is barely intimated by our author, Dr. Schmucker, that one import of Baptism is federal, while many, nay, almost all Pædobaptist writers contend, and contend strenuously, that baptism, like circumcision, is a federal rite—a covenanting rite; and the obligation to present our children for baptism being drawn, principally, from that relation, it becomes us to examine it somewhat more minutely than I should otherwise deem it entitled to.

What the true interpretation of the promise to the seed of the Patriarch of Israel may include, I do not now attempt to determine, nor attempt to solve how far it is implied under the Gospel Dispensation. If the term embrace the idea of imputed or derived holiness, as is claimed from the remark of Peter, in Acts 2: 38, 39, relied upon so confidently to sustain it, I should have but little confidence in it, less than little, for that gloss has been most effectually demolished by Whitby, a Pædobaptist himself, who shows conclusively, that it has no reference whatever to the application made of it, but that it attaches, exclusively, to the bestowment of the Holy Ghost: "These words, says that excellent commentator, will not prove a right of Infants to receive Baptism; the Promise mentioned here being that only of the Holy Ghost, mentioned ver. 16, 17, 18, and so relating only to the times of the miraculous effusion of the Holy Ghost, and to those persons who by age were made capable of these extraordinary gifts."[||] If a federal rite, and it confers federal holiness to unconscious babes, and confers church membership in the visible church upon them, why does it not carry the privilege with it of partaking of the communion? Nay, not only the privilege, but rather the right and the duty? Why not force the Communion on them, as well as force Baptism? To be consistent, they must actually do this. That has been done, time after time, as is shown by Bingham, Giesseler, and others of highest authority as ecclesiastical historians. Circumcision, Baptism, and the Eucharist, are placed in the same category, and are maintained on the same grounds, by distinguished Pædobaptists, both in the Catholic and the Protestant churches. The learned Dr. Waterland maintains this position most tenaciously. From that writer's Essay on the Eucharist, I cull the following corollaries, and set them in juxtaposition, for the contemplation of my readers. 1. Circumcision was manifestly a federal rate, or formal stipulation between God and man, carrying in it mutual engagements of blessing on the one hand, and service on the other.[*] 2. Baptism is a federal rite, a formal stipulation between God and the party baptized.[†] 3. The former sacraments, (Circumcision and the Passover,) were federal rites; that single consideration affords us a presumptive argument, that this, the Lord's Supper, is so likewise.[‡]

I cannot consume the time of the reader with the refutation of many of the fancies and fallacies connected with these positions, but refer him to Dr. Cudworth's "True Notion of the Lord's Supper;" who has exploded the whole flimsy tissue of papal concoction. I shall only add, that most of the modern Pædobaptists maintain the federal relation of baptism; as yielding that point would invalidate their assumption so materially, as to render any further effort to sustain it perfectly hopeless. Dr. Schmucker dispatches the matter by simply declaring: "The third import of baptism is federal," without attempting to give the rationale, or to offer a single reason to substantiate it. Brown, more clearly and distinctly declares, "that infants of one or both believing parents are holy, not only by legitimacy, for that is not the point here handled, nor is the faith at least of one parent necessary to it—federally holy, as belonging to God, and separated to his service. * * Children are rendered federally holy through the faith of their immediate father or mother." And this gloss is regarded so essential to the Pædobaptist theory, that Watson remarks, "We have called baptism a federal transaction; an initiation into, and acceptance of, the covenant of grace, required of us by Christ as a visible expression and act of that faith in Him, which He has made a condition of that salvation. It is a point of so much importance to establish the covenant character of this ordinance, and so much of the controversy as to the subjects depends upon it, that we may consider it somewhat at large."[§]

Whether the design of the instances we have on record of the faith of a second person obtaining favor for another, is to inculcate this belief, or is only given as instances of miraculous power to confirm belief in the truth of the Gospel, when it needed such adjuvants, I do not attempt to discuss at this time; but while I confess that I do not profess to understand the efficacy of federal holiness as applied to baptism, I grant that a superficial glance at some transactions might favor that idea with persons possessed of strong predilections for that doctrine. Thus, the servant of the Centurion being healed upon the faith of his master, the Ruler's daughter restored to life and health on account of her father's faith; and the woman of Samaria obtaining by her faith the like blessing for her daughter. Notwithstanding these facts, which admit of another explanation, I cannot but regard it as a very equivocal dependence for blessing. The process or rationale of federal holiness, I repeat, I cannot comprehend. I might much more readily comprehend the term democratic rite, in the vulgar acceptation of the term—"all made of one dirt"—for we are all alike sinners—all need to be brought within consecrated association and consecrated allegiance; for an ally is a much more intimate relation than an associate. These two terms may serve, in some measure, to illustrate the distinction between consecrated infants and consecrated believers. The infant is an associate in the family of the redeemed; the consecrated believer, a covenanted ally. An ally is in covenant bonds with the contracting parties; an associate is permitted to commingle, for good example and improvement; and afterward, when he comes to a true sense of his own sins and wickedness, and feels the need of an interest, in the redemption purchased by our Saviour's blood on Calvary, to seek admission and recognition of fellowship, (for, again, I make a very considerable distinction between association and fellowship,) in the Gospel Church, by submitting to the initiatory ordinance—by putting off the "old man," and becoming a "new creature" in Christ Jesus—by being born again—by being buried with Christ in baptism, and rising to newness of life. Then, and then only, are we admitted into consecrated allegiance—then, and then only, we become entitled to the rights of the household of faith. Admitted into consecrated association, by the laying on of hands and prayer, we are simply brought under the droppings of the sanctuary, to inhale the incense of Christian example and holy living. The association serves the office of the seminal leaves of some seeds placed in the ground for germination, when the radicle has taken root—becomes "rooted and grounded in the love" of Christ—the seminal leaves drop, and it henceforth flourishes under a certain sustenance, and enjoys an infinitely more vital existence.

PRESENT ASPECT OF THE WORLD.

That the elements are working up to a terrible crisis, can scarcely be doubted by any one who watches the progress of events. Politicians have their own speculations concerning the state of things, and the results likely to grow out of it, and in many respects will be disappointed; but those who take heed to the sure word of prophecy, follow a light which will not deceive. In our opinion, the time has fully come, when Christians should anxiously inquire into the nature of passing events, and their probable bearing upon the cause of God. Indeed, this was always their duty, but at the present time, when the powers of darkness seem to be mustering their hosts for a great battle, the duty appears to be more than usually important. In connection with the passing events of the day, Christians should study prophecy, and earnestly pray that the entrance of God's words may give light.

Due caution is to be used by Christians, however, in giving the results of their inquiries to the world. Sometimes they commit great blunders, and expose themselves to ridicule, to say nothing of the injury they do to the cause of truth. Certain great events are foretold in the Bible; but, connected with these events, and preparatory to them, are numberless particulars, in the foreknowledge of which the Bible does not enlighten us. As these transpire, one after another, the student often imagines that certain results must immediately follow, which will be nothing less than the great foretold events themselves. But in a little time, he finds that the results immediately apprehended have not taken place; some unexpected turn has been given, and the events of prophecy are postponed.

One of the foretold events which has deeply interested students of prophecy, is the extinction of the Ottoman Empire. That being accomplished, they look for the speedy "gathering of the kings of the earth, and of the whole world, to the battle of that great day of God Almighty." Rev. 16: 14. The signs of its accomplishment have seemed to glimmer in the horizon for a long time, and the wonder to some is, that it has been so long delayed. Still it does not take place, God, for some wise purpose, holding it in abeyance. It is well known, that the Czar of Russia has been watching his opportunity for years to make a descent upon Turkey, and nothing but the combined alliance of the other great powers to preserve its integrity has prevented him destroying it long ago.

Knowing how easy it is to be deceived, and that the providence of God often gives a turn to affairs which no human foresight anticipated, we hazard no predictions of what is to result from the present state of things in the Old World. Sagacious statesmen say, that a campaign looms in the future; that the powers of Europe will soon be involved in a general war. We think this very probable; indeed, it would not surprise us to learn that the struggle has already commenced.

Napoleon III. is that comet in the political heavens, whose eccentric motions seem to defy all calculation. He proclaims peace, but is thought to mean war. He declares toleration, but is thought to mean oppression. Nobody trusts his plans; nobody believes his promises. Whether he will prove the mightiest scourge the world ever saw, or whether, after blustering awhile, he will sink into comparative littleness, and leave the other powers to breathe easy again for a time, it may be somewhat difficult to tell.

It is not long since he raised the dispute between the Greek and Latin churches concerning the custody of the keys to the Holy Sepulchre into a matter of considerable importance. In 1740, a treaty had been concluded, under the auspices of Turkey, with the consent of France and Russia, that the Greeks should have one half the Church for their use, and the Latins the other half, and that the keys should be divided between them, on condition that they were to provide in equal rates for repairs. The repairs not having been provided for by the Latins, according to the stipulations of the treaty, the old dispute was revived, and the Sultan was called upon to decide the questions that grew out of it. But alas! how shall he decide? If in favor of the Latins, he offends Russia, the religion of the Greek Church being the national religion of that empire; if against the Latins, he offends France. Adroit diplomacy finally patches up the trouble, so that war is not the immediate consequence.

In the mean time, Russian intrigues stir up insurrection in Montinegro, a small province of Turkey on the eastern side of the Adriatic Sea, whose inhabitants profess the faith of the Greek Church. Without assigning any reason, and without any previous declaration, the Montenegrins attack the small Turkish fort on Lake Scutari, murder the Turkish garrison, and fortify the place. This petty squabble soon grows into a question of peace or war between Austria and Turkey, Russia all the time striving to embroil the two countries. But Turkey proving completely victorious over the Montenegrins, there is no more chance for Russian intrigues among them.

But now another event takes place. The Italians, goaded beyond endurance by the Austrian yoke, make an outbreak at Milan. What the result of it is, we are not yet very definitely informed; but, at all events, it insures peace between Austria and Turkey for the present. Napoleon is said not to be hostile to the Italian movement. Be that as it may, it shows that the affairs of the East are becoming much complicated.

In the mean time, England is uneasy. She is completing her naval armament and her national defenses, and every dock-yard is full of activity. Prussia is providing Coblentz, her strongest fortress on the Rhine, with military stores, as if in anticipation of a seige. Russia marches her army in a south-western direction. Every body anticipates some movement pregnant with important consequences.

What are these signs of the times? How much, or how little, do they mean? Who can tell? We venture no positive decision, but we know that God rules, and let the kings of the earth decide what they will, his great and glorious purposes will not fail of being accomplished. Perhaps the drying up of the mystical Euphrates is just at hand. But let Christians study their Bibles, watch, and pray.

Sunday Opening of the Crystal Palace--Sunday Street-Sweeping--Clergy Reserve--Jewish Disabilities--The Holy Places, &c.

GLASGOW, February 11th, 1853.

A second meeting of the London workmen desirous of the Crystal Palace being opened on Sundays, was held two nights ago. They have resolved to petition Parliament that it may be so, and they will doutless have the aid of the secular press in prosecuting this object. The Times of yesterday speaks of the advantages that would accrue from "the innocent amusement" thus to be afforded to the working classes. The religious periodical press are appalled in contemplating the probable issue. They speak of the daringness of setting God's law at defiance; although no such law as that of Sunday observance is to be found in the divine statute-book. I have already stated, that, at the first of these Metropolitan Meetings, Mr. Mayhew took up the theological objection, not casually, but "as the main one;" yet, although pretty fully reported by the Daily News, this part of the speech is almost wholly excluded from the reports in the Christian Times, the Record, and the Patriot—although, for the express purpose of opposing the opening of the Palace, this last-named paper had, not long before, reprinted in its columns a small volume on "the law of the Sabbath," by the Editor.

In the Sunday Street-sweeping case at Leith, which we formerly recorded, the Police Commissioners, at a subsequent meeting for considering the proposal of Mr. Moffat, the contractor for cleaning, that he should at his own expense place boxes in the worst localities as receptacles of the filth, if sweeping were dispensed with, the proposal was rejected, on the ground that the health and comfort of the community required that they should continue to clean the streets on Sunday mornings, as at present.

In the House of Commons, last night, Lord John Russell intimated that the Government intend to propose a Bill enabling the Legislature of Canada to dispose of the Clergy Reserve Funds, with a due regard to the interest of present holders of lands.

Government also intends, on an early day, to move for a Select Committee to relieve the Jews of their civil disabilities. The object is to allow Jews to enter Parliament. It is indeed remarkable, that just when God has begun to make it evident that His time to favor Zion has come, and thus to encourage His people to seek back to their own "good land," a growing indifference to their long-cherished hope and desire now manifests itself in the case of many. That it is the result of increasing infidelity in the divine promises, is evident. They have abandoned the belief of a coming Messiah, and are willing to accept honors and emoluments in the lands of their "captivty." But the divine promises are not to be contemned with impunity, nor the divine purposes thwarted by men's infidelity. The determination is, "I will bring you out from among the nations."

Jerusalem and "the holy places" are still the subjects of dispute between the Greek and Latin churches, through the Governments of Russia and France. The latest accounts say that the Greek Patriarch has not only resigned his office, but that he has quitted Jerusalem, with the keys of the Holy Sephulchre, which were to have been given over to the French. The Patriarch and the keys are now in quarantine at Smyrna. How little the contending parties know that Jerusalem shall yot be "a burdensome stone" for all nations! The King of Prussia, who takes much interest in the English Bishopric there, is having a dwelling-house erected for the Bishop. The expenditure and ecclesiastical staff there are considerable, and the measure of success comparatively little. Their traditions can hardly seem much better to the Jews than their own.

The French Emperor and Empress, at the request of the Archbishop, have agreed to be god-father and god-mother to—to what does the reader think?—the great bell of Bordeaux. The Emperor has requested the Mayor to represent him "in the ceremony of christening." Could folly and superstition farther go? A bell is "christened," and the highest in the land stand to it in the relation of father and mother! Infant baptism, however unscriptural, is wisdom and well doing compared to this.

THE PRESS AND THE PULPIT.—Some of the Dissenting Churches in England have taken measures to promote a systematic circulation of papers and books, as an aid to the services of the pulpit in the enlightenment and salvation of the people. They appoint an officer whose duty it is to edeavor to persuade every family to take some paper, and to bring to their access good books. This is a wise and thoughtful measure, which the churches in this country might adopt with most salutary effect. The importance of the press as an agency in doing good, is but poorly appreciated by religious teachers.

DENOMINATIONAL LITERATURE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Having spoken of our lack and need of a denominational literature, in my former articles, I now propose to name some of the leading causes of that lack, and the means of removing it.

Till lately the denomination has never had in operation a press of its own, and an organization to make that press efficient in the propagation of truth. All that has been done heretofore has been on individual enterprise and responsibility, and usually at considerable pecuniary sacrifice, and always under embarrassing disadvantages. If any one had been disposed to devote himself to literary labors, he would have been completely checked by the difficulties of publishing and selling his productions. And thus it has turned up the truth, unpleasant as it may be, that we have not an American book of denominational literature, save on the question of the Sabbath. We have authors, but not on denominational questions. We have literary men, but they have not devoted themselves to the perfecting of a religious literature. The means of doing so have been wanting.

Heretofore our main reliance for the propagation and defense of our sentiments has been upon our ministry. Among them we have had strong minds and noble hearts, ready to undertake the task of overturning the world; and when they have been called out, they have never retired vanquished. It is more a matter of wonder, that they have accomplished so much, than so little. What more could they do? They have mostly been men of poverty, living and bringing up families on salaries varying from nothing to three hundred dollars. How could they be men of learning? How could they become authors? And yet master spirits among them have dived into the "depths profound," and brought out the glittering pearls of sanctified thought. We can never forget them or their labors. But while we honor them for their noble hearts and noble labors, we may chide ourselves that they have not been better sustained in their efforts.

Our men of wealth have not been literary men. They have neither devoted themselves to sacred literature, nor furnished the means for those to do so who would, but could not. Many of these might have left precious legacies to the church, and become the greatest propagators of neglected truths, had they furnished the means to those who had the minds for the work. As it is, noble, aspiring minds, have been crushed, and wealth has descended, it may be, to sons who have dishonored the truths their fathers loved, while truth has lain neglected in the streets. A combination of minds and means would have thrown a halo of literary and divine glory around our churches, and made them most emphatically "the light of the world." May the history of the past, with its meagerness of fruits, furnish admonitions for the present, and lessons for the future. Wealth must be consecrated to the cause of God, or it is a curse to the possessor. Minds must be unfettered from their bondage, and not left to starve in the prison of bones and sinews, with scarcely enough of aliment to stick them together.

Formerly we had no literary institutions to which our young men could resort for mental culture and literary research. Under great disadvantages have some of us struggled in the pursuit of knowledge, seeking it where we must lose one day's instruction in each week. Happy in the peculiarities of our sentiments, and sustained by the hope of a brighter future, have we struggled hard to overcome every obstacle. But who could rise to eminence in such an unequal contest? Our faith has grasped the truth, that 'the battle is not always to the strong, nor the race to the swift,' and when faint has been pursuing, animated with the thought that victory would yet turn on our side. The pent-up feelings have been beating and throbbing, until the barriers of ignorance and the battlements of error have begun to tumble down. Let the feeble band now unitedly lift up and prolong the shout, We come! WE COME! and the armies of the aliens shall give place. Then shall the standard of truth be planted on the battlements of intelligence and righteousness, and throw to the breeze the banner on which is inscribed, in Greek, Hebrew, and Latin, "The commands of God, and the faith of Jesus." And shall that day come? The hope will inspire each student of divinity with greater ardor in his researches, and call out the "material aid" from its hoarded repose.

To redeem ourselves, and to frame and publish a "denominational literature," such as we need, and must have, and as yet never have had, still greater efforts must be made. Our ministers must be sustained so much above anxiety for the future, for themselves and families, that they can enter with all their energies into critical biblical exegesis and interpretation, and from thence bring out essay and volume successively. The churches must cease saying of their ministers, that they can live on meager salaries, and feed their flocks. Ah! who wishes the frightened ghost of a starved mind to stand each Sabbath before the altar of God, and declaim and harangue in broken phrase of empty thought. They who would be fed with spiritual food, must themselves minister to him who feeds them. We ask not that an avalanche of bread be tumbled upon him; but we ask that he be sustained above anxiety, that his library be well filled, that he be allowed the time and the means to enrich his mind and refresh his soul in the repository of sacred literature. Then will his labors bless the church and enlighten the world. Who among our ministers have published a sermon even? Where are our books of sermons? Where the essays, the lectures, that are needed for family reading? Where the learned dissertations on Christian doctrine? Where the guides to the young—the counsels to the aged? Where the advice to the inquirer—the instruction to the needy? Where the warning to the wanderer—the alarm to the guilty? Oh! how pang after pang thrills the soul, as echo answers, Where?

We must have more learned men, and our learned men must be more learned, to meet the necessities of the church, the wants of the age. A knowledge of English, and a smattering of Greek, will not supply the demand. Where infidelity has gone for its cavils—where error has gone for its cloak—must we also go, to tear open their refuge and unmask them. If others understand the classics, so must we. If others can read the wisdom of the sages of former times in the language in which they wrote and spoke, so must we. Our men must read in Chaldee, talk in German, sing in Hebrew, and dream in Greek, as readily as others. All that others can do, we must do. Towards this there is now an increased progress. Hearts are beating quicker and harder as the advance is made. Shall the progress be checked? Shall the hopes that begin to animate our souls be crushed? Never, no, never! Let those who have the means, and those who have the minds, join the work together. If profounder research is needed, let the head that can make it have the outfit, and be sent to the search. If men have truths and arguments stored in their minds, let means be furnished to bring them out and publish them. And let whatever of wisdom or learning that may now be possessed or may be obtained, be brought out and published. Let Sabbath-School Libraries be filled, and family libraries be embellished, with such works of sanctified thought as the denomination can furnish, and should furnish; so that we really shall have a "denominational literature." Then, if I speak again before the Publishing Society, at its anniversary, I will give no offense, as now perhaps I have given.

J. BAILEY.

"WE HAVE NO DENOMINATIONAL LITERATURE"—NO. 1.

The remark may have been uncalled-for and unwise. For the advocate who detracts from the merits of the dead, or the living, gains nothing to his cause by the means. And we have not yet forgotten the sting occasioned at another Anniversary, by the repeated assertion, "If we had a College and Theological Seminary, and these ever so richly endowed, we have not the men qualified to fill the places of instruction." We felt the keen reproach, and anxiously wished that a noble ambition might inspire our young men to wipe away that reproach. But in reviewing the charge, "We have no denominational literature," we are disposed to treat it rather lenient. Not that it is strictly true, but it is so nearly true that the living may well pardon the offense, and lay it to heart. We certainly have an astonishingly small amount of denominational literature—meaning by literature "the collective body of literary productions." —Webster. This is no slander. Would that it was. The Sabbath question has been very fully and ably discussed. Beyond that, we have but little that deserves the name of literature. We would commend, as highly as any one, our denominational papers, if they needed our commendations; but the numbers are rarely preserved for binding, and when they are they can only be used for reference. They may contain materials that would furnish many choice volumes of literature; but for all literary purposes, they are valueless beyond the week of their publication. Look into our libraries. Who wrote the books found there? Those who wrote them impressed their own sentiments upon them. And those sentiments we have imbibed.

It is said, the literature we have is not read. That is true, and the reason is obvious to every man of discernment. Our people are not a reading people. And they never will be, till we have a denominational literature. The Methodists were not a reading people till they had a literature of their own; nor were the Baptists. But so soon as their presses began to multiply books, the people began to read. Children's libraries, church libraries, neighborhood libraries, and individual libraries, were formed. And they were read too. And they have done an invaluable amount of good. The same thing would be done among our people, if we had the books prepared by writers that love our Zion, and published from our own press. It is not enough that we furnish one, two, or a half dozen volumes, ably discussing and enforcing a single doctrinal truth, however valuable that truth may be. We ought to have books in every department of literature—books for the child, books for the student, books for the general reader, books for the clergyman.

The printing press is an engine of mighty power, whether for good or for evil; but as yet we have availed ourselves of its power only to a very limited extent. The Presbyterian and Congregationalist, the Methodist and Baptist, the Episcopalian and Lutheran, have magnified their denominational peculiarities on every page of their widely-circulating literature. And their children are, from their infancy, imbued with a profound respect for the creeds of their fathers. Not so with us. Others have written the books in the hands of our children, and we need not be disappointed, when we ascertain that others have gained their hearts also. We have labored much to make others acquainted with our peculiar sentiments, but while we have gained one convert to our cause, we have lost twenty of our children, who have gone over to Sunday-keeping, or to no-Sabbathism. This is a fearful truth, but the legitimate result of our mistaken policy. And, unless we do produce, speedily, a literature that shall sustain and magnify the creed of our church, we may rest assured that our children will grow up to abandon the Sabbath whenever opportunity presents. And if opportunity does not present, they will be Sabbath-keepers that will have scarcely more respect for the Sabbath than many among us now have.

THE SCHOOL AT WEST UNION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

By a communication recently received from Wm. F. Randolph, I am informed that no competent teacher has been obtained to take charge of the school at West Union, Va. I trust the time is not far distant when some qualified person of our denomination will embark in the enterprise of establishing a Literary Institution in that rising village on a firm basis. I can but feel a deep interest in this subject, in view of what has been done already, by the friends of the cause in that locality, for the accomplishment of this object, and the anxious desire of a large circle of youth connected with that branch of our denomination to enjoy the advantages of an academic course of study. If the present opening for a school under the supervision of our denomination, can be immediately occupied, and a judicious course pursued by a competent teacher, I apprehend that every difficulty may be obviated, and the enterprise brought to a successful consummation. If no teacher can be obtained, the friends of the enterprise may be discouraged, the object may be abandoned, the capital which has been appropriated to the purchase of a lot and the erection of a commodious building for a school, may receive a different direction, and the opportunity for our denomination to exert a favorable influence in that section of Western Virginia, in favor of education, and the cause of truth generally, by means of such a school, may be lost—and lost forever. I should deplore such a result, as a serious misfortune to the denomination, but especially that branch of it located in Western Virginia.

For the purpose of imparting some information in relation to the school, which may be useful, I have ventured to transcribe a few sentences from the letter already referred to. Speaking in reference to the school, Bro. Randolph remarks:—

"It is very certain that it cannot prosper without the aid of a competent teacher. Our poor success in obtaining one has evidently retarded its progress already, and, may be, diminished interest in the minds of some, if not all those who have put their hands to the work. Yet I can but view the prospects as somewhat favorable, if a suitable character, with the requisite qualifications, can be obtained soon. The need of a well-organized school at West Union has been much augmented since the enterprise was started, by increased population, and which will without doubt continue to increase. There is no other opening or apparent calculation for a school but ours. This seems to be understood and appreciated to a considerable extent by others, as well as those of our own denomination. This being the case, I am inclined to believe, that if a teacher can be obtained, others will be very likely to take hold and encourage the work. Considering the much that has already been done, together with the increased need and opening prospects before us, it will be with great reluctance that the object will be abandoned. When these considerations pass through the mind, together with the fact that all depends upon getting a teacher, the heart is ready to sink at the thought of the ill success attending our efforts in this respect. Hope is faint, flickering, and almost ready to fly away at this point."

The cause of the increasing population of West Union will be understood by those who know that a railroad is in progress passing directly through that village, and which in the course of a few years may render that county seat an important place for business.

AZOR ESTEE.

CORRUPTION IN HIGH PLACES.

Charges of corruption in the present Common Council of New York, have been plentifully made during the last three months. At the opening of the February Term of the Court of General Sessions, the subject was commended to the attention of the Grand Jury, in the charge of the Recorder. Last Sabbath, Feb. 26th, the Grand Jury presented their report, in which they find true bills of indictment against Aldermen Wesley Smith and James M. Bard, for misdemeanor in receiving bribes. It was shown before the Jury, that Ald. Bard had received $500 to prevent interference with certain existing privileges at the south side of Wall-st., and that Ald. Smith had received $500 (and claimed $3000 more) for obtaining a favorable report upon a Catharine-st. ferry lease, and $250 for suppressing a resolution reducing the fees of Coronors. In the case of one piece of property sold by the city, it was shown that a faverite of some members of the Common Council bought it for $160,000, while another applicant offered for the same $300,000. The Jury say that many witnesses whom they subpœnæd refused to attend, while others who did attend refused to answer the questions put to them. In view of all the facts, "the moral conviction has been irresistibly forced upon the minds of the Grand Jury, that gross and stupendous frauds and violations of their official duties have been perpetrated on the part of various members of the heads of departments and the Common Council, an indictment for which against individual members has, they have reason to believe, been prevented by their willful disobedience to the process of the Court on the part of those absent witnesses."

It is a curious circumstance, that when the report of the Grand Jury was presented, the Court consisted of Recorder Tillou, and Aldermen Smith and Bard—two men sitting upon the Judge's bench to receive notice of their own indictment.

It is to be hoped, that these cases will be thoroughly sifted, and the guilty parties brought to justice; for if the "City Fathers" are allowed to do such things with impunity, who can tell how much worse things in the same line the city children, growing up under the example of such fathers, may be encouraged to do?

EPISCOPAL MISSION AT SHANGHAE.—Bishop Boone, of the American Episcopal Mission at Shanghae, returned to this country a short time ago. On the 12th of September, a short time before leaving China, he "confirmed" five persons. Of operations at Shanghae, the Spirit of Missions gives the following account:—

"The difficult question of conflicting jurisdiction, between Bishop Boone and the English Bishop of Victoria, has not yet been adjusted.

"An old woman named Dong has, after long wavering and many fair professions, gone over to the Romanists.

"Rev. Mr. Syle is preparing a dialect version of the Book of the Acts of the Apostles.

"A contract was concluded, on the 4th of September, to build a mission chapel, 60 feet by 30, for $2,000. A chancel 16 feet square, at one end, and a bell-tower, 60 feet high, at the other, are included in the contract. About $600 have been subscribed here by members of the foreign community.

"Mr. Syle has concluded to return home with his wife and children in the spring, the health of all having suffered too severely to endure another summer in that place."

CHURCH-MEMBERSHIP OF MINISTERS.—A correspondent of the Independent asks:—

"Does not strict Congregationalism require that a minister settled over a church should himself unite with the church to which he ministers?"

To which one of the editors replies:—

"No church would think of having for deacon a man who is not and will not be a member; why then should they have such a man for pastor? The office of pastor, like that of deacon, is an office in the church, and not simply over it. If the pastor is not a member of the church in which he holds office, he must either be a member of some other church, or of no church at all. But of what church can he be a member, in regular standing, if not of that church in which he worships, and in which he has communion at the table of the Lord? Non-communing, non-attendant, non-resident members, are proper subjects of expost[illegible]and censure on the part of the chur[illegible] which they are in covenant. To say th[illegible]pastor should be a member of no church[illegible]o deny the first principles of the Congr[illegible]onal theory."

THE NEW BIBLE HOUSE.—The splendid edifice lately erected by the American Bible Society, on the Fourth-avenue, Astor-place, Third-avenue and Ninth-street, New York, is so nearly completed that there is no doubt, of its being ready for occupancy on the 1st of May next. Besides the Bible Society, whose immense business in the various departments of printing and binding is to be conducted in the building, several stores and officers have already been rented, and the following Societies have engaged rooms in the Bible House: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; American Home Missionary Society; Protestant Episcopal Foreign and Domestic Committees; Protestant Episcopal Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge; New York State Colonization Society; Society for the Melibration of the Condition of the Jews; New York Society Library; Home of the Friendless; Society for the Reformation of Juvenile Delinquents.

REVIVAL AT MYSTIC, CT.—We learn from an exchange, that there is a revival of religion of great power in progress in the Mystic Bridge Parish in Stonington, Conn., under the ministerial labors of Rev. W. R. Long, late of St. Louis. The work commenced in a series of consecutive evening meetings for prayer held from house to house. Inquirers were multiplying, and meetings for preaching have been held for a short time in the church, and the hoping and anxious are daily increasing. The movement bids fair to extend to all the churches in the place.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—The Christian Intelligencer states, that the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country is divided into 20 dioceses. Two years ago, the date of its last Report, it numbered 1,558 ministers, 1,500 parishes, 92,228 communicants, 120 candidates for orders. Its present membership is estimated at 100,000. Nearly one-fifth of its clergy are said to be without parishes—a fact attributed mainly to the inadequate support rendered by numerous parishes.

PROHIBITORY LIQUOR LAW MOVEMENTS.—On Fourth-day, Feb. 23d, the Rhode Island Senate passed the Prohibitory Liquor Law. It is now a law, and goes into effect ten days after the rising of the Assembly, which took place last week. The Prohibitory Law Convention held at Harrisburg, Pa., Feb. 24th, made an appropriation of $1,000 to canvass the State of Pennsylvania.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN PIEDMONT.—At Volterra, recently, a Piedmontese was tried and sentenced to three years imprisonment for having taught the principles of Protestantism. As this is clearly contrary to the spirit and letter of the Constitution, it has led to much controversy, from which great advantage to the cause of Protestantism is expected.

A VOLUME OF SERMONS.—Some time ago, the Board of the Publishing Society appointed a Committee to collect and arrange a volume of Sermons by Seventh-day Baptist Ministers. The Chairman of that Committee informs us that he has communicated with most of our ministers, many of whom approve the plan, and promise aid in carrying it out. He requests early communications from those who have not yet replied to his letters upon the subject.

THE MEMORIAL.—We have sent the first number of the second volume of the Memorial to all subscribers for the first volume. It would be a great accommodation to the establishment, if each subscriber would acknowledge the receipt of this number by remitting his subscription.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, FEB. 21.

In the SENATE, a long conversation took place whether to take up the Pacific Railroad, the Homestead, or the Texan Debt bill, which finally resulted in favor of the former. The vote on adopting Mr. Shields's amendment was again made the topic of discussion, and, on the question being taken, it was rejected by a vote of 24 Yeas to 28 Nays. Mr. Weller moved a proviso that the $25,000,000 appropriated should be spent exclusively in the Territories of the United States, an amendment which Mr. Borland declared to be the same in fact as that just voted down. It however passed. Nothing definite was done when the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, many amendments were made to the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill, and it then passed and was sent to the Senate. A couple of private bills also were passed in the course of the sitting.

THIRD-DAY, FEB. 22.

The SENATE passed a Joint Resolution extending to the 1st of June next, the period at the end of which the law for securing safety to passengers on steamboats shall go into effect. Mr. Underwood reported in favor of inserting a clause in future treaties providing for the settlement of international disputes by arbitration instead of war. The Pacific Railroad bill was taken up, and Mr. Seward offered an important amendment, to the effect that the Postmaster-General shall contract with any State beyond the Mississippi, through which the road may pass, for the carrying of the mail over it through that State for 30 years at the rate of $600 per annum. A debate followed, during which the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Fuller, of Maine, concluded his speech against Reciprocity. Mr. Sabine proposed a new bill to settle the fishery difficulty alone, leaving Reciprocity in general for the new administration to act on. Mr. Tuck went for the bill before the House. A communication from Com. Jones in relation to charges of malversation in California made against him, was discussed and referred, after which the Indian Appropriation bill was considered.

FOURTH-DAY, FEB. 23.

In the SENATE, some private bills passed, and the Army Appropriation bill came up. The topic of debate was the proposal to place the National Armories again under civil superintendence, as was the case prior to 1842. It was decided to let them remain as at present under the Superintendence of Officers of the Ordnance Corps. A large appropriation was made for fortifying the harbor of San Francisco. A bill then was introduced and passed authorizing Consul Sharkey, at Havana, or any Judge of the United States, at Key West or otherwhere, to administer the oath of office to Hon. W. R. King.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Jones reported that Franklin Pierce, of New Hampshire, accepted the office of President of the United States, which acceptance was duly recorded upon the journal. The Reciprocity bill was further debated by Messrs. Tuck, Clingman, and Townshend, until the close of the morning hour. The Indian Appropriation bill was then debated until the adjournment. The amendment pending was to pay the Creeks for lands taken formerly from them and never paid for. The amendment passed with a proviso, offered by Mr. Toombs, that $335,167 of the sum be paid to citizens for depredations committed upon them by those Indians.

FIFTH-DAY, FEB. 24.

In the SENATE, after some unimportant business, the Army Appropriation Bill was taken up, and Mr. Chase moved additional sections appropriating $150,000 for a survey of routes to the Pacific, with a view to the selection of one for a Railroad. Mr. Walker moved an amendment which would, along the line of such surveyed and selected route between the Mississippi River and the Eastern limits of California, survey six townships wide of the public lands on each side, every alternate section of which should be granted to each head of a family who shall settle upon and cultivate it. These two amendments brought both the Pacific Railroad and the Homestead matters under debate, but no action was taken upon either of them.

In the HOUSE, the Indian Appropriation Bill was discussed and adopted; including an appropriation of $50,000 to open negotiations to extinguish the Indian title in Nebraska. The bill making appropriattons for carrying the mails in ocean steamers and otherwise was passed. The Senate resolution was adopted for straightening the Southern boundary lines of the Naval Hospital, New York. The passage of a private bill and the Post Route bill concluded the business of the day.

SIXTH-DAY, FEB. 25.

In the SENATE, private bills were passed. The Army Bill was discussed, and the amendment of Walker, providing for the survey and location of a railroad to the Pacific, was rejected. Several other amendments were adopted, but no action was taken upon the bill.

In the HOUSE, the bill making appropriation for the naval service was under discussion, the main point being a proposed appropriation of $10,000,000 to build, equip, and arm three frigates and three sloops of war.

SABBATH-DAY, FEB. 26.

In the SENATE, the Military Appropriation Bill passed; after which the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill came up and was amended in many particulars. The mission to China was raised to the full grade, $20,000 appropriated for the expenses of a Turkish Frigate to the World's Fair, and $70,000 to continue the Mexican Boundary Survey. The bill was then postponed, some private ones passed, and the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, papers were read refuting certain charges recently brought against the Secretary of the Interior by Col. Gentry. The Naval Appropriation Bill was taken up in Committee, some amendments made, and then reported to the House, which concurred in the amendments, passed the bill, and then adjourned.

SHINPLASTERS IN ILLINOIS.—The House of Representatives of the Illinois Legislature has passed the Senate bill in relation to shinplasters. It provides that no Banking Company shall be organized until the necessary deposit of stocks is actually made with the Auditor. No Bank, Corporate body or individual shall issue, pass, or receive in payment, any bill of credit, bond, or promissory note, written or printed, designed as a circulating medium, other than the notes of the "secured" banks of this State, or the specie-paying banks of other States, of $5 denomination and upward, under penalty of $50 for each offense, to be recovered in an action of debt, by any person who may sue for the same before any justice of the peace, or court having jurisdiction of the same. Persons violating the law may also be indicted and imprisoned in the county jail—not more than one year. Act to take effect on the 1st of August.

European News.

One week later news from Europe has been received since our last.

By this arrival we have the exciting intelligence of the outbreak of an insurrection in Italy, with proclamations from Mazzini and Kossuth, urging Italians and Hungarians to the overthrow of Austrian despotism. It is stated that the rising was promptly put down, with the loss of five men killed fighting at Milan, and with the shooting of others afterwards. The telegraphic dispatches announce that this insurrection broke out in three different quarters of the City of Milan, on the evening of Feb. 6th; that it was suppressed with the loss of six lives on the part of the insurgents; that the mass of the population took no part, and that "order" was restored on the 7th.

The Paris Police lately arrested some twenty persons in the night, on the charge of having fabricated and circulated injurious reports concerning the Empress. Most of them were connected with the Press—some as writers for Paris papers, and others as correspondents for Italian and German journals. There was unquestionably strong provocation to such punishments, for the Press has certainly dealt very freely with the character of the lady in question. Still, the summary and arbitrary manner of the act affords a striking illustration of the utterly despotic character of the present French Government, and the entire absence of anything like civil rights or personal liberty in France.

The monthly shipping lists (London) show an enormous increase in the number of ships destined for Australia. Ninety-five vessels, nearly 40,000 tuns, are announced to sail in February, from the Thames, besides eighty from Liverpool, and others from different outports. Several of these vessels are foreigners of small tunnage, intended for conveyance of merchandize. There is great speculation at present in this branch of trade.

The Shipwrecked Fishermen and Mariners Royal Benevolent Society, have presented medals to Capt. Nye and the crew of the boat who heroically saved the men from the wreck of the brig Jessie, of St. Johns.

The first snow of the season fell at Liverpool Feb. 11th, about one inch and a half in depth; and at Southampton on the day preceeding for the first time in two years.

The picturesque ruins of Charlemagne's Castle of Heinsberg, near Aix la Chapelle, fell to the ground recently, after an existence of a thousand years.

California News.

California news to Feb. 2d was received at New Orleans Feb. 20th—only eighteen days from San Francisco. It came from San Francisco to Acapulco by the regular Panama steamer Tennessee in 7 days and 16 hours, thence to Vera Cruz in 5 days and 12 hours, and thence by steamship to New Orleans. This is the new route by which it is proposed soon to send the mail.

The Mail steamship Tennessee sailed from San Francisco for Panama on the 1st inst. with $2,430,000 Gold Dust on freight.

We gather some few items from the California papers—among them the gratifying fact that the mining intelligence is of a highly favorable character.

The Census returns show the present population of the State of California to be 224 400.

The total amount collected at the recent election toward the Washington Monument fund was $3,840.

From Oregon the news is wholly unimportant.

Honolulu dates to the 1st January had reached San Francisco.

Advices from Hong Kong had been received at San Francisco to the 11th of Dec., by the clipper bark Pathfinder. Great excitement prevailed there respecting alledged traffic by the English in Coolies for the West Indies.

MAINE LAW IN NEW YORK.—It is said that the Committee of the Assembly, on Petitions for a Maine Liquor Law, have prepared a bill which will give great satisfaction to the friends of Temperance and Moral Reform. It will be shorter than the act of Maine, but not less stringent, while some of its provisions are calculated to render it more efficient and easily enforced than the prohibitory laws of other States have been. In one respect a signal improvement has been made. Instead of Town Agents or other functionaries appointed to sell Alcoholic Liquors for medical or mechanical purposes, this bill provides that any citizen may obtain a permit to sell for such purposes, by applying to the proper authority, giving bonds that he will not abuse the privilege, and taking an oath not to sell except in consistency with the provisions and intent of this act. So far very good; but the chances that the Legislature will pass the bill are very small.

STEAM FROM CALIFORNIA TO CHINA.—A dispatch from Washington, dated Feb. 21, says: It is understood that the Chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, will report favorably on the proposition of A. W. Thompson, to establish a line of steamers between the western coast of our country and Eastern Asia. The line is to consist of six steamers, of 1,300 tuns, and armed with heavy batteries, for war purposes. It is proposed that the vessels shall make semi-monthly trips between California and China, touching at the Sandwich Islands, as well as at some port in Japan, provided that communications are opened with that Empire. The projector asks for a contract to carry the mails for ten years, and to receive the amount collected on the mailable matter transmitted by the steamers,—one half the amount estimated of said postage, to be paid in advance in Government Bonds.

THE FERTILITY OF PALESTINE.—From one of our exchanges we learn that at a meeting of the Syro-Egyptian Society, London, Jan. 11th, Mr. W. H. Black read some 'Notes on the Restoration of Fertility to the soil of Palestine;' in which he attributed the desert appearance of the land, in general, to the neglect of cultivation for many ages, and not to natural causes, as erroneously supposed. Mr. Black briefly narrated the experiments made by Mr. Meshullam of Jerusalem, and some Americans keeping the seventh day as the Sabbath, who have jointly established a small agricultural colony at Artos, near Bethlehem, with great success. He also read several extracts from their correspondence, and confirmed the fact by the testimony of individuals who have recently visited that interesting settlement, that within the past year they have raised successive crops of grain (the wheat growing as high as a tall man,) besides an abundance of fruit and vegetables, both native and exotic. The paper was followed by a conversation, in which the possibility of recovering the far-famed fertility of Palestine was confirmed by Mr. Bonomi, and by Risk Allah Effendi, from their peasonal knowledge of the country. Mr. Black also presented to the Society a copy of an address just printed by a recently-formed "Association for encouraging Jewish Settlements in Palestine," which contains many important facts and suggestions on the same subject.

THE "ARITHMETIC OF HEAVEN."—The Puritan Recorder quotes the following striking expression, ascribed to Mr. Webster by Rev. E. N. Kirk, in a published sermon commemorative of the great statesman. Says that paper:—

"We find in this discourse, a remark of Mr. Webster's authenticated, which we had before supposed might be apocryphal. We quote: 'Having noticed that on several occasions gentlemen have endeavored to show that his religious views were not definite, but indefinite, or, as some would term it, liberal, I would here mention an anecdote which from his own lips I am authorized to say is authentic. Being asked by a Unitarian gentleman, as he was coming out of an Episcopal church in this city, whether he believed that three and one are the same thing, he replied in a manner perfectly characteristic, as it properly disposes of the real difficulty of the Trinity: Sir, I believe you and I do not understand the arithmetic of Heaven.'"

MISSING VESSELS.—The Pilot Boat "Commerce" left Jersey City about the 1st of January, on her regular cruise, and the last that has been seen or heard of her was off Little Egg Harbor during the snow storm of the 12th. She is supposed to have been lost, with all on board, including four pilots, an apprentice, a boat-keeper, and four hands. A fishing vessel belonging to Waterford, Ct., Thomas Beebe captain, was seen about the same time and place, and has not since been heard from. She had on board six or seven persons, of whom three, we believe, were members of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Waterford.

THE NORTH AND THE SOUTH.—Under this head a correspondent of the Independent says that taking up the Journal of Missions for February, and reading the table of donations in December last to the A. B. C. F. M., he finds that the amount received in that month from the States and Territories was as follows:—

Six New England States,	$14,885 00
Three Middle States,	7,780 81
Six Western States,	2,422 54
Eight Slave States and D. of C.,	108 80
Seven Slave States,	000 06

EXPLOSIVE ALARM SIGNAL.—This is a recent invention (says the Buffalo Republic) by J. F. Wilkinson, of Syracuse, for railways. In case of accident, the signals, which can be placed on the track, explode as the wheels pass over them, making a noise equal to the explosion of a four-pounder. An alarm is thus given to the train approaching the one detained by accident or otherwise. In the night-time they are of essential service, as in a few minutes they may be placed on the track a sufficient distance in advance to prevent any collision. They may be made useful as signals on many other occasions. The Hudson River Railroad have them in use, and it is believed they will be generally adopted.

SUMMARY.

A correspondent of the Tribune writes from Leon, Cattaraugus Co., that on the 18th Feb. a Mr. Andrew Franklin, of that place, returned home in the evening, having been absent during the day, and as he entered his house stumbled over the bodies of two of his children, lying dead on the floor. A third was lying near, severely wounded, and nearly frozen. Passing into an entry, he found his wife hanging dead. A postscript, dated the 20th, says: "I have just learned verbally the result of the inquest—that the children came to their death from blows inflicted by the hand of the mother, with some weapon unknown, and the mother by her own hand."

The frauds upon the Government in Pension claims must be very numerous; for we see it stated, in an Illinois paper, that Mr. Macon, an agent of the Pension Office, has recently been investigating certain pension cases, where the bounty of Government was suspected of having been obtained through fraudulent representations; and that out of ninety pensioners examined by him, some sixty-eight were found not to be entitled to the benefits of the law.

The Moniteur Algerien states that, since 1736 to 1846, the number of Christian slaves at Algeirs was never less than 500, and at times amounted to 2,000. In 1816 it was 1,450, but in that year the Dey of Algiers, after the bombardment of the city by Lord Exmouth, entered into a treaty, by which he put an end to the slavery of Christians.

A good business is doing in ship-building at the ship yards in the vicinity of New York. There are now on the stocks here and at Williamsburg and Hoboken, vessels which, in the aggregate, amount to 30,000 tons measurement, of which about 9,000 tons are in steamships, and 14,000 tons in clipperships and first-class packets.

A new steamship company has lately been organized in this city for the purpose of opening direct and speedy communication with Australia via Panama. The needed amount of capital has been readily subscribed, and it is proposed to send out at once a first class steamer, originally built for the Collins Liverpool Line, which after going direct to Australia, will thenceforth ply between there and the Isthmus. The company expect to make the trip from Australia to New York in about thirty-five days, and from Australia to London or Liverpool in fifty.

The publishers of the New York Evening Post have contracted for one of Ericsson's caloric engines. It is to have sufficient power to drive one of Hoe's rotary presses at the rate of 10,000 impressions an hour, and four job-office presses, with a reserve force of two or three horse power, and yet it is to occupy only the space inclosed in a cast iron box six feet square and between five and six feet high. It is to be finished and in operation by the middle of April.

The Edgartown Gazette says a gentleman of that place, a brother of Capt. Pease, late master of the ship A. H. Howland, of that city, recently reported lost near Honolulu, some time since dreamed that his ship was totally wrecked. The circumstance so impressed his mind that he effected an insurance upon his brother's voyage to the amount of two thousand dollars! This is dreaming to some account.

A sloop was struck with a sudden squall on Friday night, Feb. 18, opposite Yonkers, and immediately capsized and sunk in deep water, carrying down with her the crew, consisting of three persons. The captain, who was at the wheel, was enabled to jump into the boat towing astern, and cut her adrift. He heard the cries of his drowning crew, but being without oars could not go to their assistance. The boat eventually drifted ashore with the captain nearly frozen to death.

Engineers, with the view of bridging the Mississippi, have taken surveys of every feasible point, and have decided that a bridge can be constructed with less expense at Rock Island than at any other place on the river. There is a spot near Lyons, Clinton County, called the "Narrows," where it is ascertained that next to Rock Island a bridge could be erected at least expense.

The returns of the General Post Office in England, for the past year, give additional proof of the efficacy of the penny postage system in every respect. In 1839 the number of letters was 76 millions; in 1840, first year of the new system, 169 millions; in 1845 the number reached 271½ millions; in 1850 it was 347 millions; and in 1852 it had increased to 379½ millions.

A correspondent of the Times writes: It has been asserted by an experienced breeder of poultry, that to feed an ox to 1200 lbs. weight usually takes five years, while the same weight of poultry can be made ready for the table in about three months, and at less than half the cost in food! Poultry always sells fifty per cent. dearer than beef.

Castner Hanaway, now a resident of Chester Co., Pa., has applied for relief from Congress, through Joshua R. Giddings, for the expenses occasioned him by the Christiana treason trial, in which he was charged as an instigator of treason against the government in resisting the laws of the United States.

The Cooperstown Freeman's Journal says: An interesting fact was mentioned to us by the Pastor of the Presbyterian Church of this village. Of the nine deaths which last occurred in that congregation, the youngest was 55, the eldest 99—the average of the nine was over seventy-seven.

A traveler writes: "I visited a cotton factory of 25 hand looms in Rome, standing within fifty feet of the Senate chamber, where are woven cotton shirtings from English yarn, which are sold at 210 Bajocchi, (about 31 cents) per yard, which, at New York Mills, would scarcely bring 6 cents."

Two boys have been arrested in Springfield, Mass., on suspicion of having set fire to a closet in the school-room, and then going out and locking the door on the outside, so as to prevent the escape of the teacher and scholars. The fire was extinguished before it had done much injury. Such an act is fiendlike.

The Fredonia Censor, in noticing the fall of butter in Albany, New York, &c., states that a great reduction has taken place in Chautauque country, and that some lots for which 26 cents per pound was lately refused, are now selling at 16 cents in trade.

DIED,

In Williamsburgh, L. I., Feb. 26th, of erysipelas, after an illness of six weeks, MAXSON ROGERS, in the 60th year of his age. Mr. Rogers was a native of Waterford, Ct. He made a profession of religion in early life, and was baptized, though he did not become a member of the church. For nearly forty years he had done business in New York, where his uniform kindness and sterling integrity secured for him a large circle of friends. During his last illness, which was more than ordinarily painful, he expressed entire resignation, often saying, "It is all right—all for the best."

In Alfred, N. Y., Feb. 20th, 1853, Mrs. SABINA TRUMAN, wife of Dea. Nathan Truman, in the 52d year of her age. She obtained a hope in the Saviour in early life, but did not make a public profession of the same until several years after. Soon after the formation of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Friendship, she was baptized by Eld. Richard Hull, and united with that church. Afterward, upon settling with her husband in Alfred, she connected herself with the 1st Alfred Church; but on the organization of the Church of Hartsville, Steuben Co., N. Y., she became a member of said church, (or rather was one of the number forming the church,) of which church she was a member at the time of her death. Sister Truman had been in feeble health for more than twenty years, with an affection of the lungs. During her sickness, and the trials incident to it, she seemed ever to enjoy the presence of her Saviour, being an intelligent and trustful Christian. Nor did her faith leave her at the hour of death, but without a fear did she meet that terror of our race, and in holy reliance upon Him who has conquered death, did she fall asleep!

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses, Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

West Troy, Albany Co., N. Y., 1852. 2151

American Baptist Register.

THIS Volume, now issued, contains 496 pages; or, reckoning the 26 engravings as two pages each, 548 pages. It is printed on beautiful paper, and embraces (including the ornamental stamp on the cover) engravings of 27 church and college edifices. The sketches of State Conventions, Associations alphabetically arranged, names of churches, dates of constitution, counties in which located, pastors, the baptized in 1851, number of communicants, with the names and post-offices of ordained and licensed ministers, fill 373 pages. These are followed by the American Indian churches, also the Welsh and German churches. Summary tables of the Associations in each State, (the most complete we have ever seen,) fill 26 pages. These are followed by valuable tables, embracing a comparative summary, colored members, Sabbath schools, ratio of churches, ministers and members to the whole population, Baptist periodicals, ordinations, churches constituted, new church buildings dedicated, and obituary notices. Then follows the educational department, embracing theological seminaries, colleges, academies, high schools, &c. Also an account of our Benevolent Societies. Next we find tables of the Baptist churches in other countries, British Provinces, Europe, Asia, and Africa. The concluding pages contain an account of the Anti-Mission, Free-Will, Six-Principle, Seventh-day Baptists, &c., with a grand summary of baptized Christians and religious denominations.

No description of the volume will do it justice. It must be seen to form a correct idea of the expense and labor bestowed upon it. In view of the expensiveness of so many statistical pages, its engravings, &c., it is one of the cheapest volumes ever issued. It contains 200 pages more than was anticipated when the price was announced.

Price, bound in cloth or sheep, $1 50; five copies, $6. It will be sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, for $2.

Published by the American Baptist Publication Society. Orders for the Register should be directed to Rev. B. R. Loxley, 118 Arch-street, Philadelphia.

Just Published.

THE DEMOCRACY OF CHRISTIANITY, or an Analysis of the Bible and its Doctrines, in their relation to the principle of democracy. By WM. GOODELL. Cady and Burgess, New York. Sold also by William Harned, 48 Beekman-street, New York. The first volume is occupied with an examination of the Old Testament; the second volume carries the investigation into the New, shows the bearing of the leading doctrines of the Gospel upon the principle of democracy, examines the institutions of the New Testament, traces the progress and the influence of Christianity in promoting human liberty, to the present time, and, in the light of Scripture prophecy, as illustrated by the signs of the times, unfolds the future prospects of humanity. The work is designed to promote liberty, both in the Church and the State, and to show that the cause of human freedom is identified with the Christian religion.

Price $1 50 at retail, $12 per dozen, or $90 per hundred.

SLAVERY AND ANTI-SLAVERY: A History of the Great Struggle in Both Hemispheres; with a View of the Slavery Question in the United States. By WILLIAM GOODELL, author of "The Democracy of Christianity."

This work is designed to embody a great amount of historical information in a single volume, conveniently arranged for reference. It contains fifty chapters on as many distinct topics, embracing the most important facts in the political and ecclesiastical history of the contest, together with an account of the Anti-Slavery agitation in England and the United States up to the present time; the divisions among American Abolitionists, and the various measures advocated among them; and closing with a brief discussion of the question, "What ought to be done?" The book is an abstract of several volumes, besides the Anti-Slavery history of the last twenty years, a great part of which has never before been collected into any volume, but lies scattered in the newspapers of that period. The Table of Contents and a copious Alphabetical Index will facilitate a reference to particular facts, and to dates when desirable.

It is a large royal 12mo. volume, of about six hundred pages, well printed, on handsome paper, neatly bound in cloth, and lettered. Price one dollar per copy, at retail; $9 per dozen, or $65 per hundred, to booksellers and book pedlars, for cash.

The postage on a single copy will be 30 cents to any part of the United States, and must be prepaid.

"THE HIGHER LAW."

There are few subjects of greater importance in our country than what is called "the higher law" doctrine. It is dividing the nation into two parties, to quite an extent. It also seriously affects the church. If we are to take men as they express themselves, we must conclude that there are those, even professedly Christians, who acknowledge the law of the land as supreme, so much so as to release one from the law of God, should the last conflict with the first. And even among those who would not allow themselves such latitude of expression, there seems to be quite a hesitancy which ought to be obeyed, the law of God or that of man.

To my mind the question is clear—settled. For if we concede that one Government has a right to enforce obedience to its laws, irrespective of the laws of Jehovah, then all Governments have the same right. If Congress has a right to enforce obedience to the Fugitive Slave Bill, then has the Grand Duke of Tuscany the same right to enforce obedience to a law forbidding the reading of the Bible. And if Francesco Madiai's death would be martyrdom to the higher law, the law of Jehovah, equally so was the death of Torrey. And it is equally as relevant, and as much called for, for the Duke of Tuscany to enter his protest against this country for the imprisonment of Torrey and others, as for Congress to protest against the imprisonment of the Madiai family. All of it grows out of a mistaken and unchristian notion of duty to the "powers that be."

A writer in the Stonington Advertiser says: "If our rulers find war necessary, it is our duty to sustain them in it." (As I quote from memory, it may not be verbatim, but the sense is given.) Let us see. Suppose our rulers should find war necessary with Spain, in order to possess Cuba; am I bound to assist in carrying it on? Was Jezebel justified in getting possession of the vineyard of Naboth? And were the two sons of Belial innocent in aiding in the matter? See 1st Kings, 21st chapter—the whole of which ought to be read in Congress on the 4th of March, by the Chaplain thereof. If war be wrong then no power that is, or may be, this side of Jehovah, has a right to enforce obedience in carrying it on. To suppose any subject of civil government obligated to obey that government, when it contravenes the government of God, is little short of blasphemy.

From whence arises the obligation to obey any human government? Certainly not from the government per se; but because such human governments are coincident with the Divine. All human laws involving acts of a moral nature which conflict with the Divine law, are a nullity. They not only impose no obligation to obedience, but ought to be disobeyed. Silent acquiescence in such laws might involve guilt.

The blind reverence to human laws which now obtains, is one of the alarming signs of the times. This spirit of man-worship may yet reveal "that man of sin, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshiped, so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." 2 Thess. 2: 4. This antichristian submission to human authority has been the prolific source of evil to the church. But few there are who dare say that war, slavery, intemperance, &c., are not contrary to the spirit of Christianity. If they are contrary to the spirit of Christianity, then they are wrong, wicked, sinful, and all aiding or abetting them incurs guilt. But how did they find entrance into the church? Through the sophistry of duty to human authority. The church, losing sight of her true glory, true greatness, true honor, has bartered her holy religion for the privilege of participating in human governments. And ecclesiastical bodies can find no religion now in a church which aims at fitting itself to engage in reforming or regenerating the world. So much has the religion of this day divorced itself from the evangelizing of the world. Should the missionary to a foreign country so connive at existing evils, or so shape Christianity to a sinful conformity to the "powers that be" in those countries, would it be tolerated? Should the Emperor of China, in order to possess himself of California, find war necessary, would it be the duty of our missionaries to sustain him in it? But here at home, so low has Christianity fallen, that for one to denounce war, slavery, intemperance, &c., as anti-christian, and to openly maintain the true principles of Christian non-resistance, and obedience to human governments, is to subject himself to the 'cold shoulder' of some, and the ridicule of others.

I desire to understand the true position of the church on these points. If Christianity may make compromises with sin in one form, why not in another? Must Christianity wait for the world to lead in declaring sin to be sinful? War, slavery, &c., will not be more sinful when our government abolishes them, than they are now. If right, they ought not to be abolished; if wrong, no human enactments can make them right or justify their practice.

Has not the time come when we, as a denomination, should define our position upon the great moral questions of the day? I had supposed that as a denomination we held war, slavery, intemperance, the sale of intoxicating drinks, to be wrong, and that all obedience to human government in these respects, was sinful. But from communications made to me, I find that I was mistaken. Different opinions also prevail as to what is the ground taken by our denominational paper. Much has been said, (and perhaps well said,) about Foreordination, Freewill, Secret Societies, Associational Power, and other important subjects. Now, while these ought not to be left unattended to, there are many other subjects which some of our people feel are not sufficiently attended to. I find, also, that the periodicals which appear to take higher and advanced ground upon the questions of the age, are selected, taken, and read, with more interest than others that do not. Let our people but arise, and stand upon the naked truths of Christianity, leaving all compromises with the world—let us stand where Jesus, Peter, Paul, and the early Christians stood—and victory is certain. But let us refuse thus to do, and defeat is equally certain.

AGRICULTURAL LECTURES—NO. 4.

BY PROF. GURDON EVANS.

The Plant.

The ultimate object of the growth of the Plant, is doubtless to mature a new seed by which the species is propagated. Man takes advantage of the condition of various parts of the plant, at various stages of its growth, and appropriates the nutritious portions to his own sustenance and that of his animals.

The objects and influences in nature which promote the growth of vegetation, are the Earth, Air, Water, Heat, Light, and perhaps Electricity.

The Earth bears to the plant a three-fold relation. It forms a foothold or standing-place, enabling it to rear the trunk, branches, and leaves, into sunlight, and subjecting it to genial atmospheric influences. The earth also furnishes to the plant important elements of its growth, the mineral, that part remaining as ash when the plant is burned, and constituting from 1 to 30 per cent. of its dry weight. The mineral is essential to vegetable growth, composing a portion of the seed as well as the stalk, and serves, when consumed by the animal, to build up the boney framework. Besides these two offices, the earth serves as a great reservoir for water, furnishing the growing plant with a constant supply of water, necessary to dissolve the minerals and other nutriment taken into the plant, and as a circulating medium by which vegetable growth is carried forward.

The Air, so necessary to animal existence, is no less so to the thrift of the plant—a species of respiration being carried on through the leaves, similar to that in the lungs of animals, by which the gases of the air are constantly ministering to the growth of the plant, and eventually makes up by far the larger portion of the solid plant. Carbonic acid is the gas from which the plant receives its most important support, and exists in the air to the two thousand five hundredth part—an apparently insignificant amount, yet over seven tons are found over each square acre of the earth's surface. The Oxygen of the air also performs an important office in promoting the decay of vegetable and animal substances, thus indirectly furnishing ærial aliment to the growing plant. The presence of air is necessary to the germination of seeds.

Water is of no less importance to the germination of seeds and the growth of plants than the air. It is to the vegetable what the blood is to the animal, constituting a general circulating medium through all parts of it, by which both its mineral and gaseous elements are transported to every point of growth. It is, in fact, the great carrier, bearing from the earth its mineral elements, and from the leaves the ærial elements of growth. Water, also, by combining with the carbon of the plant, forms over a half of its dry weight, as in an uncombined state it constitutes a large portion of its mass while growing.

Heat, to a proper degree, is essential to vegetable growth. By its influence the sap and juices of the perennial shrub and tree are liquefied and set in active circulation in the vernal months; and under the genial influence of the sun's rays, combined with suitable moisture, the seed is germinated, and the growth of the plant sustained, through the warm seasons. The farmer finds it useless to put his seeds in the earth till a heat sufficient for germination is attianed. This varies considerably in different plants. Wheat readily germinates at a little above the freezing point, while corn will not germinate much below fifty degrees, each seed germinating at a given temperature. The ripening of fruits and grains is promoted by a genial warmth. Freezing, a phenomenon resulting from the withdrawal of heat, has the effect to destroy the sugary and starchy portions of vegetables, probably by exploding the minute cells in which the substances are secreted. The expansive effect of water freezing in the soil serves to finely pulverize it, and bring it into a condition better suited to vegetable growth.

Light.—The magical influences of this subtile agency upon vegetation, are no less surprising than important—clothing the earth in its mellow hues, and transforming the liquid elements of the plant into substantial forms. No one has failed to observe the blanched appearance and succulent state of vines and plants growing in dark cellars, or other shaded situations. Growing in the dark, the potato forms poisonous substances, which, under the influence of light, are rapidly converted into a harmless condition. Instinctively, the shaded plant reaches forth for light toward any opening; and grains growing in the deep shade of forests, are often observed to lean away from the dark object. The sunflower faithfully bows to the source of light, in whatever part of his path he may be. May we not draw a profound lesson from this interesting law in nature?

How much influence electricity exerts upon the growth of vegetation, is not very manifest, though the learned have sometimes attributed to it important agencies.

Education in Wisconsin.

We are indebted to P. C. Burdick, Esq., of the Wisconsin Assembly, for the Fourth Annual Report of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction in Wisconsin. It gives rather an encouraging view of the educational affairs of that rising State. We copy a few items, which strike us as of general interest.

Number of Children, &c.

Reports have been received from thirty-three counties in the State. Within the year, School districts have been organized, and schools have been opened in the two new counties of Oconto and Waushara. No reports have been received from the six organized counties of Adams, Door, Kewaunee, Lapointe, and Marathon.

The whole number of children between the age of four and the age of twenty, residing in the State, is 124,783

This number is about one-third of the whole population of the State. The number reported last year was 111,431

The increase in the year has been 13,442

The number of children who have attended the public schools of the State, exclusive of those in towns from which no reports have been received, is 88,042

The total number of attendants in all the towns is estimated at 90,000

The following table will exhibit the whole number of children in the State, the number who have attended the public schools, and the per centage which the latter forms of the whole, for each year since the organization of the public schools under the State government:

	No. of children.	No. who have attended sch.	per cent.
1849	70,457	32,174	46
1850	92,041	61,597	67
1851	111,431	78,944	70
1852	124,783	90,000	72

In the number of attendants at the public schools of the State, the increase in four years has been from thirty-two thousand one hundred and seventy-four to ninety thousand; from a proportion of less than one-half to one of nearly three-fourths of all the children in the State.

The whole amount of money received from all sources, is reported at	$127,718 42
Amount remaining unexpended at the commencement of the year,	5,755 37
Expended this year for teachers' wages,	105,122 83
do. do. Libraries,	5,641 14
do. do. other purposes,	11,981 87
Remaining unexpended,	2,622 13

The School Fund.

The following is a statement of the condition and resources of the School Fund, at the present time.

Due on lands sold,	$681,931 71
do Loans,	132,491 64
In Treasurer's hands,	4,777 15
Total,	$819,200 50

The University Fund.

Due on Lands Sold,	$40,051 26
do Loans,	3,395 00
In Treasurer's hands,	1,995 58
Total,	$45,441 84

These two amounts constitute the School and the University Fund. The interest at seven per cent. upon the former, is to be expended for the benefit of the Public Schools; the income derived from the latter is for the use of the State University.

School Houses.

The whole number of School-Houses in the State, is 1730

The number erected within the present year, is 221

Of this number there have been built of brick, thirteen; of stone, nineteen; of logs, eighty-one; framed, one hundred and eight. Of the whole number in the State, sixty-six are of brick; seventy-four of stone; seven hundred and seventy-eight of logs, and eight hundred and twelve framed.

The total valuation of school-houses in the State, is $261,986 32

There has been raised by tax, within the present year, and expended in building, repairing, and hiring School-houses the sum of $53,757 35

Teachers.

The amount of money expended for teachers' wages within the year, is $105,082 83

Of this sum there was raised by tax $46,781 06

The average number of months during which the public schools have been taught, is five and one-half. In the county of Kenosha, which shows a higher average than any other county in the State, schools have been taught during eight months in the year. In the county of Richland, which shows the lowest average, schools have been taught during three months in the year. The highest average last year was seven and a half; the lowest but little over one and one-half. The general average was five and thirty-nine-hundredths months.

The wages paid to teachers, except in a few localities, are uniformly low. In some of the cities and principal villages, five hundred, six hundred, and in one instance, seven hundred dollars per annum have been paid to the principal teachers. The average price paid throughout the State to male teachers, per month, is $16 34

In the county of Grant, which shows the highest average in the State, the sum paid is 22 74

The lowest in any county is in Richland, 10 00

The average price paid to female teachers per month, is 8 50

The highest price paid to female teachers in any county, is in the county of Brown, 15 00

The lowest in any county is in Waushara, 5 33

As these reports, in the great majority of cases, are received from school districts situated in agricultural sections of the State, they probably refer to the wages paid, exclusive of board, which is furnished to the teacher by the different families of the district, in rotation. Where this plan is not followed it is usual to pay the teacher six dollars per month in addition to the regular wages, and the district is relieved of all responsibility in the matter. But as the former is the most general plan, the sum of six dollars should be added to the averages above given, which will increase the amount paid to male teachers to twenty-two dollars and thirty-four cents, and to female teachers, fourteen dollars and fifty cents.

OLD CHURCHES.—A note to the recent sermon of Rev. Mr. Budington, says the Evangelist, commemorating the two hundred and twentieth anniversary of the First Church in Charlestown, states that the oldest Congregational Church in New England, is in Windsor, Conn., which was originally formed in Plymouth, Old England, in the beginning of the year 1630, in anticipation of emigrating to this country. In 1636 the Church was planted in this country. It is also stated in connection with the recent dedication of the Church in West Barnstable, Mass., that it is the oldest Congregational Church in the world, though not the oldest in this country, having been originally organized in England in 1616. Its first pastor fled from persecution to this country. The subsequent pastor, Rev. John Lothrop, after a long and cruel persecution, came to this country, with all the Church that could be gathered, in 1636, and settled in Barnstable.

A White Indian.

Some fourteen years since, says the Adrian (Mich.) Watchtower, a boy by the name of Chubb, then aged about six years, was missed by his parents, who resided at Blissfield, in this County, and many of our citizens recollect the search that was made for him at the time, but which proved totally unavailing. Within the past few days, this boy, now grown to a man's estate, has returned to this place. It appears from his statement, that he was stolen from his home by a party of the Chippewa Indians, who were then hunting in this part of the State, and who, after some days' concealment, placing him at night in hollow logs, took him off West, and traded him off for a pony with some of the Western Indian tribes. Subsequently he was again sold to the Blackfeet Indians, among whom he has resided to the present time, and is now married to a daughter of one of the chiefs. During the 14 years that he has resided among the Indians, he has been totally ignorant of the place of his nativity, and has only ascertained it during the last year. As soon as he did ascertain it, he came on here at once to see his parents, one of whom—his mother—he finds to be deceased, and his father to be living near Detroit. He was through here, it seems, a year since, and stopped at our village, but was at that time wholly ignorant of the part of the country from which he was stolen. A white man, a physician among the Blackfeet, seems to have been possessed of the secret, and has but recently imparted it to him. Chubb now resides near the source of the Missouri, and has become so attached to the Indian mode of life, that he has no idea of remaining among his white kinsmen. He says there are now among the same tribe two white girls and two or three other white boys. He has repeatedly been engaged in the Indian fights, and in the course of his wanderings has become somewhat acquainted with the Mormons, whom he describes as a rascally set, who steal from other white men, and lay it to the Indians.

Curious Case.

Mr. Weber has reported a bill in the Senate of Maryland "explanatory of the act of 1717, chap. 13, relating to servants and slaves," to meet a most singular case, the particulars of which a correspondent of a Southern paper thus relates: "It appears by the law referred to, that any white person found guilty of marrying what is commonly termed a colored person, that the parties are liable to be sold, the man and woman for a term of years (I believe seven) into servitude, and their issue, if any, as slaves for life. The case referred to is somewhat after this fashion narrated: A white citizen of this State, some years ago, married a female whom he believed to be of pure white descent. The woman is said to be handsome, of excellent qualities, and does not bear in any way the slightest marks indicative of her being otherwise than of the Anglo-Saxon race. The man has acquired a fine property, and is held in great respect by all who know him and his family. They have three children. Some person having undertaken to trace out the pedigree of the wife, alledges that her blood is tainted—some of her grand or great-grand parents probably have been of the colored species; and the parties have accordingly been indicted in one of the Circuit Courts of this State. A tainture of blood works the serious penalty mentioned. The indictment is said to be the result of malice. The neighbors, all who know the family, have taken a deep interest in their behalf. It is said that Gov. Lowe, upon due representation of the case, has offered to grant a nolle prosequi, which would relieve the parties of the process of the Court; but the parents, feeling anxious to redeem their offspring from all stain in the public estimation, have preferred standing trial, and hence the present action of the Legislature. This is not only a novel but most serious case."

Artificial Production of Fish.

The French Government is continuing to act on the admirable discovery of Gehin and Remy, fishermen of the Vosges, for artificially fecundating the eggs of the fish. It has, in particular, caused it to be practiced on a grand scale at Huningen; and the fish produced by it there are, on arriving at a certain degree of maturity, to be sent into different rivers and canals. In the southern Departments, also, the same system has been practiced with extraordinary success. It consists in collecting the spawn of the female fish, instead of allowing them to deposit it in the beds of rivers, and in applying it to the milt of mates, instead of leaving the males to do it themselves. The eggs thus prepared are preserved until they become hatched. The consequence is, that many thousand fish are thus produced from each female's spawn, whereas only very few indeed are obtained when the fish are left to effect the fecundation themselves, owing to the eggs being devoured by other fish, washed away, or injured by dirt. Rivers, streams, canals, lakes, and ponds can thus be made to teem with fish; and a new branch of commerce is thereby created, while an abundant supply of wholesome food is obtained. The expense of applying the system of Remy and Gehin is very trifling indeed. These men have been recompensed by the Government for the great services they have been the means of rendering to the public. Their plan is applicable to all sorts of fish that spawn in rivers.

AN INTERESTING SCRAP OF HISTORY.—The Washington correspondent of the Pennsylvanian states that during the proceedings at the Colonization Meeting, last week, Hon. Charles F. Mercer stated, as an extraordinary fact, that the act of Congress of 1807, in relation to the slave trade, provided that recaptured Africans, whenever our Navy might overtake them, should be taken into the nearest port of this country, and there disposed of according to the legislation of the State. Georgia passed a law that the captives should be sold; one half of the money to go into the State Treasury, and the other half to the captors. And this, too, under the pretext of abolishing the slave trade. Georgia was asked to abate the law, but she refused. Subsequently, however, a law was passed by Congress to return such captives to their native land, and one hundred thousand dollars was appropriated for carrying the law into effect. Mr. Monroe was at that time President of the United States, and employed a gentleman to superintend this humane plan; thus, in effect, relieving the Colonization Society of the expense of an agent. So, Mr. Mercer insisted, that Mr. Monroe, in fact, established the first Colony on the coast of Africa—Liberia—and in honor and acknowledgement of this, the Capital was called Monrovia.

COPTIC WORSHIP.—In the pastoral letter of Rev. Dr. George Duffield, of Detroit, to his congregation, dated Thebes, Upper Egypt, Dec. 23, he says:—

At Siaret I visited on the Sabbath day, the 12th inst., the Coptic Church. Their worship differs from that of the Roman Catholic and the Greek Church, and resembles somewhat the Mussulman, or I should rather say the latter have adopted their more ancient customs in some respects. Every worshiper enters barefooted and remains so during the service. I was not required to take off my shoes, nor were my companions. We were treated with marked distinction. The service was very peculiar, but it was ritual. Boys read the Arab Scriptures under the eye of the priest, who afterward read in Coptic, a dead language resembling the Hebrew. The women were not visible, but worshiped unobserved in concealed apartments within hearing. It appeared, and was, in fact, an idolatry of the priest to a very great degree. After service, I sought an interview with two of the priests, and although I had a poor interpreter in our dragoman, yet the conversation was as full of interest to them as to me."

VARIETY.

The announcement of the death of Sir Walter Scott's only surviving grandson, the son of Mr. Lockhart, at Abbottsford, has created a melancholy feeling among all who take an interest in the family history of men of genius. Sir Walter is an instance of how painful would be the faculty of looking into the future. His great passion, far stronger than that of literary fame, was to found a race, and leave a noble residence to his descendants. Yet none of his blood have lived more than a few years to inherit his honors, and enjoy what, despite of his vast losses, fell ultimately into the hands of his family.

There were four good habits a wise and good man earnestly recommended in his counsels, and also by his own example, and which he considered essentially necessary for the management of temporal concerns; these are Punctuality, Accuracy, Steadiness, and Dispatch. Without the first of these, time is wasted; without the second, mistakes the most hurtful to our own credit and interest and that of others may be committed; without the third, nothing can be well done; and, without the fourth, opportunities of great advantage are lost which it is impossible to recall.

The census of St. Louis, just taken, gives a total population of 87,654. The white population is 84,340. Free colored, 1,455; slaves, 1,859. The census gives other items of interest. The merchants number 945, the grocers 461. The statistics tell a hard story of the consumption of ardent spirits in the city. In the six wards there are 355 dram-shops, and 65 beer-houses. One ward has 99 dealers in liquors, and another 73. The total number of buildings in the city, wooden, brick, and stone, is 11,956.

A letter at Lloyd's reports that the ship Maries, on her passage from Liverpool to Caldera, when 12 miles from the equator, in longitude 19 West, met with a remarkable convulsion of the sea, similar to what might be caused by the eruption of a submarine volcano. The waves continued boiling for about fifteen minutes, all command over the ship being lost, and the wind blowing from all points of the compass. Shortly after, a quantity of wreck and fragments of a screw steamer were passed.

At an oyster supper the other day, in Albany, there were present—one father, three daughters, one son, one mother, one brother, three grand-daughters, three sisters-in-law, one uncle, one brother-in-law, three aunts, four cousins, one wife, one nephew, one grand-son, three nieces, one husband, and three sisters. And yet, strange to say, there were only four persons present.

The King of Prussia has presented to Ira Aldridge, the American negro actor in Berlin, at the close of his performances, the great gold medal, with an autograph testimonal—a distinction bestowed only on persons of the first eminence in their professions.

The News says, Halifax has always been considered, and justly too, as one of the healthiest cities in the world. The number of deaths during the past year (1852) was only three hundred and sixty! This, out of a population of at least twenty thousand souls, is a remarkable fact.

The market for Land Warrants is firm, as there is but little prospect that Congress will do anything this session with the public lands. We quote 160 acres $163 and $167, 80 acres $84 and $86, 40 acres $43½ and $44½.

A sort of prepared linen is now used in Germany to print children's books on. It is dearer than paper, but the youngsters cannot tear it.

Women's rights are sometimes recognized in Russia. The Duchess of Leuchtenberg has just been chosen to preside over the Imperial Academy of Sciences.

The number of births in the State of New Jersey during the past year was 10,683; marriages, 2,682; and deaths, 6,317.

The use of opium is getting common in England. In 1850 the import was 103,718 lbs.; in 1852, 251,792.

Mrs. Beecher Stowe's minor tales have been translated and published at Paris, under the title of Nouvelles Americaines.

Cincinnati, Ohio, has an aggregate population of 160,186. Dunkirk, N. Y., has a population of 4,500.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in Advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

DEDICATION OF CHILDREN.

BY WILLIAM M. FAHNESTOCK, M. D.

Its Nature—Continued.

Having exposed the fallacy of the foregoing assumptions—baptism a substitute for circumcision, "proselytical" baptism, and the federal relation of baptism—I now turn to the Pædobaptist proposition, or rather assumption, of scriptural proof—strained inference—for "infant baptism;" and here, again, I turn to Dr. Schmucker, for a fair exposé of the Pædobaptist view of this point, in a concise form.

PÆDOBAPTIST "SCRIPTURAL AUTHORITY."

1. We begin (says that writer) with the testimony of our Saviour himself—Mark 10: 14—"But when Jesus saw it, he was much displeased, and said unto them, (the disciples,) Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God." It is well known to those who are acquainted with the phraseology of the New Testament, that the expressions, "kingdom of God," and "kingdom of heaven," are familiarly used to designate the church of God under the New Testament economy. Thus John the Baptist preached, saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. It will not be supposed that heaven was literally descending to the earth, and had almost arrived amongst us; but the Saviour evidently meant, that the time for remodeling his church into the New Testament form, was at hand. Accordingly, in the above passage, his meaning evidently is, Suffer these little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such also shall my church consist. Nor could he have meant, "My church shall consist of such adults as have a child-like disposition;" for that would have been no reason for wishing actual children to be brought to him.(a)

2. The next passage is the declaration of Paul, "The unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife; and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband; else were your children unclean, but now they are holy." It is admitted by all, that the word "holy" has two generic significations in scripture; consecrated or set apart to the service of God, and moral purity. In the former, which is its primary sense, it is applied to temples, cities, priesthood, Jewish nation, &c. Thus the name is applied to the Jewish nation in the midst of their corruption, and by some of the Rabbins, to their most profligate kings. Now, in the passage under consideration, the latter signification is inapplicable, for what could be more absurd than the supposition, that moral purity is propagated by natural generation! The former must, therefore, be its import, which moreover harmonizes fully with the context. The apostle is discussing the relation of marriage to the church, and supposes the following case: A Corinthian might say, "I perceive that the children of my *un*believing (?) neighbors are regarded as holy, that is, consecrated to God, received as belonging to the church, and my unbelieving neighbors and their children are declared unclean together, not belonging to the church or holy people of God; what is to become of my children? I indeed am a believer, but my wife or my husband is an unbeliever; are my children to be regarded holy unto God, or not?" The apostle answers, God has determined that the believing party shall so sanctify or overrule the relation of the other to God, that their mutual children, by virtue of the right of the believing party, shall be regarded as "holy" to God, that is, as belonging to his church or people.(b)

3. The declaration of Peter, "Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins; and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost, for the promise is (was given) to you and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call" (to a knowledge of the gospel.) But was there any particular promise, known among the Jews as the promise? O yes! The son of Abraham will answer, "that promise which God made to our father Abraham, that he would be a God to him, and that they should be a people to him forever; the promise of eternal life through the Saviour; the covenant on the basis of which we, the Jewish people, both parents and children, are separated from other nations as the professing people of God. This is the promise, and we all understand what it means." Well, this promise, says Peter, is continued unto you now under the New Testament dispensation, as well as under the Old, and not to you only whom I am addressing, but also to your children. What can be plainer?(c)

4. But in addition to all this evidence, there are several instances in which the apostles baptized whole families, that is, according to the ordinary signification of the terms, both parents and children—the family of Lydia, Acts 16: 15; the family of the Jailor at Phillippi, Acts 16: 33; and the family of Stephanas, 1 Cor. 1: 16.*(d)

REFUTATION OF THE FOREGOING ASSUMPTIONS.

(a.) Nor could he have meant baptize them, for he gave no precept to that end, neither did he use any water in the rite he performed on that occasion. Had Professor Schmucker just given the whole passage, or even the concluding verse, v. 16—"He took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them"—it would not have needed any comment whatever, for it would have carried its own unsophisticated interpretation along, and proved the surest confutation of such a perversion of it; for what child that can read the passage would give it such an incongruous exposition as that of implying the sprinkling of an infant, and investing an unconscious babe with the rights and the responsibilities of membership in a Gospel church? No one; and no discriminating mind, most assuredly, but a legerdemain theologist, could contort so simple a precept, and so plain an example, into so distorted an ordinance—so riduculous an institution, if an institution it may be called—certainly, not a divine institution, for a divine institution must have an express and an explicit "thus saith the Lord," before it can command any respect. Dr. Sherlock judiciously remarks: "What is matter of institution depends wholly upon the divine will and pleasure; and though all men will grant, that God and Christ have always great reason for their institutions, yet it is not the reason, but the authority, which makes the institution. Though we do not understand the reasons of the institution, if we see the command, we must obey; and though we could fancy a great many reasons why there should be an institution, if no such institution appear, we are free, and ought not to believe there is such an institution because we think that there are reasons assigned why it should be."† I repeat, that we must have a "thus saith the Lord," for every binding ordinance in the Gospel church—not a vague inference. The rule of my good and honored friend, Elder William B. Maxson, is most appropriate in this matter—"No more, nor less, nor otherwise, than the example."‡ God has given us no institution, if its language is too vague for every one to understand it. To command respect, it must be couched in language which commends itself to every conscience, or it cannot be binding on that individual. If he is to do "no more, nor less," the institution must express it clearly, distinctly. Does the precept of the Saviour before us contain an injunction to sprinkle little children with water; if not, then to do so is "more" than the injunction; and if the example contains the laying on of hands and prayer, or blessing, then to neglect or disregard it is "less" than is imposed; and in either case we do not fulfill our duty. Christ's precept and example must be the sole rule, "no more, no less." Dr. Heidegger truly observes: "There is in the church no more power of changing the rites of the sacraments appointed by Christ, than there is power of changing his word or law. For, as his word contains a sign audible, so those rites contain a sign visible of his divine will."* The will and the example of the Master, in the matter before us, is simply imposition of hands and prayer, or blessing; and no church under the sun possesses any authority to impose water where water is not enjoined. Bishop Taylor truly remarks: "It is certain God put no disguises upon his own commandments, and the words are meant plainly and heartily; and the further you remove from the first sense, the more you have lost the purpose of your rule."†

(b.) So far from it, that it is very probable that He meant something widely different. A cause must be weak, indeed, when its advocates have to resort to so far-fetched and so irrelevant a subterfuge to sustain it. The position here taken is the fanciful suggestion of Augustine; which has been vamped and revamped a thousand times over, to bolster pædobaptism. A single precept, or example, would prove ten thousand times more conclusive than the rickety stilts of untainted descent, or the vague surmises of the clashing opinions of the "early Fathers." It has not even the recommendation of the approximation of unanimity of sentiment, among themselves, to endorse it. Many of the strongest advocates for "infant baptism," give it an entirely different and an infinitely more probable rendering. Ambrose, and a host of other learned men, since his day, have contended, that the allusion in the passage, is to the legality of the marriage bond under the circumstances of the case. The popular Dr. Macknight (a well-known Pædobaptist) says:

> Our translators here seem to have understood the terms, sanctified, unclean, and holy, in a federal sense, which, indeed, is the common opinion. But, first, it is not true in a federal sense, that the unbelieving party in a marriage is sanctified by the believing party; for, evidently, no one hath a right to the blessings of the Gospel covenant by the faith of those to whom they are married. In the second place, it is as little true, that the children procreated between believing and unbelieving parents, become unclean by the separation of the parents, and clean by their continuing together, as the apostle asserts, if by unclean we are to understand exclusion from the covenant, and by clean admission into it. For the title which children have to be members of the covenant, depends not on their parents living together, but on the faith of the believing parent.‡

To this I simply add the very satisfactory explanation of the highly-esteemed J. L. Dagg, of Georgia, formerly of Philadelphia:

> The Jews considered all Gentiles to be unclean, and thought it to be unlawful for a Jew to be in the house, keep company, or eat with, or touch a Gentile. By some means, possibly from the influence of Judaizing teachers, the church at Corinth seems to have been agitated with the question, whether the same rule ought to be established to regulate the intercourse of the members of the church with other persons; that is, whether the church ought not to decide, that all who were without were unclean to them who were within; just as the Gentiles were unclean to the Jews; and that therefore it was inconsistent with Christian purity, to dwell, keep company, or eat with, or to touch them. While this question was undergoing discussion in the church, it was perceived, that it involved a very important case. Some of their members were married to unbelievers, and if such a rule should be established, their members would be compelled to separate from their unbelieving husbands or wives. Although the lawfulness of the marriage was not questioned, yet it would be unlawful for a believing husband to dwell with his wife until God had converted her. The church resolved, probably after much discussion of the question, to write to the apostle respecting it. This letter he had received, as appears from the first verse of the chapter. On the general question of intercourse with unbelievers, he treats in the fifth chapter, and decides that to keep company or eat with persons who make no pretension to religion, is not unlawful, and that, were all such persons to be esteemed unclean, and their touch polluting, Christians must needs go out of the world. On the particular case of those members of the church who were married to unbelievers, the apostle treats in the chapter before us. He decides, in v. 12 and 13, that they may lawfully dwell together, and in v. 14, for the conviction and silencing of any members of the church who might object to his decision, he in substance says: "The unbelieving husband is not unclean, so that his wife may not lawfully dwell with him; the unbelieving wife is not unclean, so that her husband may not lawfully dwell with her. If they are unclean, then your children are unclean, and not one parent in the whole church must dwell with or touch his children, until God shall convert them; and thus Christians will be made to sever the ties which bind parents to their children, and to throw out the offspring of Christian parents into the ungodly world from their very birth, without any provision for their protection, support, or religious education. * * * * * *
> It may now be asked, where is the proof which we propose to draw from this text against infant baptism? We have already proved that it makes nothing for it. On the contrary, it is clearly implied, in the apostle's argument, that all the children of the Corinthian Christians had no nearer relation to the church than the unbelieving husband of a believing wife. He declares that their cases are parallel; and that rules of intercourse, which would require the believing husband to separate from his unbelieving wife, would require believing parents to separate from their children. But there is no conclusiveness in this argument, if children had been consecrated to God in baptism, and brought within the pale of the church; for then the children would stand in a very different relation to the church and to their parents, from that of the unbelieving husband or wife. Therefore, unless we charge the apostle with arguing most inconclusively, infant baptism and infant membership were wholly unknown to the Corinthian church; and if to the Corinthian church, unquestionably, to all the churches of those times."§

(c.) What plainer? Why, "nutmegs is nutmegs;" and still plainer, "walnuts is not hickory-nuts." I have already shown, from Dr. Whitby, (Pædo.) that this passage has no reference whatever to the baptism of the children of believing parents, but applies exclusively to "the times of the miraculous effusion of the Holy Ghost, and to those persons who by age were made capable of these extraordinary gifts." Witsius refers to it on this wise: "And it shall come to pass, that I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh, Joel 2: 28, concerning which Peter speaks, Acts 2: 39, For the promise is to you and your children." Dr. Doddridge remarks, "Considering that the gift of the Spirit had been mentioned just before, it seems most natural to interpret this as a reference to that passage in Joel where God promises the effusion of his Spirit on his sons and daughters." Dr. Owen observes: "This promise of the Spirit is sometimes called the promise of the covenant, (Acts 2: 39,) The promise is to you, which promise is that which Christ received from his Father, v. 33, even the promise of the Holy Ghost." And Dr. Hammond says, in reference to Pædobaptists (himself a Pædobaptist) arguing "infant baptism" from the above passage, "If any have made use of that very unconcludent argument, (Acts 2: 39,) I have nothing to say in defense of them. I think the word children, there, is really the posterity of the Jews, and not particularly their infant children."*

This is the second time and place that Dr. Schmucker has introduced, if not obtruded, this passage, (Acts 2: 39.) That learned gentleman must have known, as well as any one else, that there is no relevancy in its application here; but, as it belongs to the "shop," and withal is a very cheap article, has, I presume, to be thrown into the mortar, as one of the ingredients, like sawdust, inert as it may be, to make up the Pædobaptist pill or bolus; for it is a big dose for some to swallow—a big and a bitter dose—yet, notwithstanding all that, swallowed it must be—whether with a good or a bad grace, down it must go. It is, perhaps, the best "subtil powder" in the dredging-box to dust the sight of the credulous—proves the best material to blind those who would see, and therefore must be dusted the more profusely. I dismiss it with the following rational explanation from Dr. Gill.:

> "It is pretended that this (Acts 2: 39,) refers to the covenant made with Abraham, and to the covenant promise made with him, giving his infant children a right to the ordinance of circumcision; and is urged as a reason with the Jews why they and their children ought to be baptized; and with the Gentiles, why they and theirs should be also, when called into a church state. But—1. There is not the least mention made in the text of Abraham's covenant, or of any promise made to him, giving his infant seed a right to circumcision, and still less to baptism; nor is there the least syllable of infant baptism, nor any hint of it, from whence it can be concluded; nor by children are infants designed, but the posterity of the Jews, who are frequently so called in Scripture, though grown up; and unless it be so understood in many places, strange interpretations must be given of them; wherefore, the argument from hence for Pædobaptism is given up, by some learned men, as Dr. Hammond and others, as inconclusive. 2. The promise here, be it what it may, is not observed as giving a right or claim to any ordinance; but as an encouraging motive to persons in distress, under a sense of sin, to repent of it, and declare their repentence, and yield a voluntary submission to the ordinance of baptism, when they may hope that remissiom of sins would be applied to them, and they should receive a large measure of the grace of the Spirit; wherefore repentance and baptism are urged in order to the enjoyment of the promise: and consequently must be understood of adult persons, who only are capable of repentance, and of a voluntary subjection to baptism. 3. The promise is no other than the promise of life and salvation by Christ, and of remission of sins by his blood, and of an increase of the grace of his Spirit; and whereas the persons addressed had imprecated the blood of Christ, they had shed, upon their posterity, as well as on themselves, which distressed them, they are told for their relief, that the same promise would be made good to their posterity also, provided they did as they were directed to do; and even to all the Jews afar off, in distant countries and future ages, who should look on Christ and mourn, repent, and believe, and be baptized: and seeing the Gentiles are sometimes described as those afar off, the promise may be thought to reach to them who should be called by grace, repent, believe, and be baptized also; but no mention is made of their children; and had they been mentioned, the limiting clause, 'Even as many as the Lord God shall call,' plainly points at and describes the persons intended, whether Jews or Gentiles, effectually called by grace, who are encouraged by the motive in the promise to profess repentance, and submit to baptism; which can only be understood of adult persons, and not of infants."†

(d.) If I were not tired of giving definitions, or apprehensive of tiring my readers with them, I should almost be tempted to give one of household; but as I shall be obliged to introduce one or two more in matters more intimately connected with my subject, I prefer to adduce a remark to the point by a gentleman, a well educated gentleman, from the north of Ireland, Professor John Young, who, after having a thorough preparation for the ministry in the Presbyterian church, embraced the doctrines of the Baptist church; and on one occasion, while residing at Trenton, in this State, in expounding the passage in reference to the baptism of Lydia and her household, exclaimed: "He thought it a great scandal on a Christian lady, to insist upon her being the mother of children, without first showing that she had a husband." I have witnessed more than one household baptized, even where there were children, and not an infant among them; nay, not one under twenty years of age. It is the most puerile and preposterous presumption—for it is no argument—to insist, that a household must necessarily contain infants.

Our Pædobaptist friends are very fond of throwing the onus probendi on the Baptists, and demanding of them to prove the negative—show that infants are excluded by positive injunction. It is time enough to do that, when the Pædobaptists present the first explicit text embracing them. It would be much more logical and apposite, on pertinaciously affirming that they are included—that "Christ had commanded infant baptism," and that there actually were infants in the households of Lydia, the Jailor, and Stephanas—than to infer so bold an assumption without a particle of testimony to sustain it. When any man or set of men make a broad, bold declaration, in such a serious matter, it behooves them to show, honestly and indisputably, not from vague inference, but by actual and sufficient authority, that there is an explicit "thus saith the Lord," for the assertion. Any fool can ask a question, or make a broad assertion, but it takes something more to answer and sustain it. When a man asks a question which cannot be answered, it becomes his duty, his bounden duty, to answer it; unless it be, truly, a simple question for information, and not as a snare to inveigle; and when a man makes a bold assertion, it becomes his duty to sustain it, and not claim a negative to disprove it. That is a disingenuousness that ever marks little minds. An assertion without being followed by legitimate proof; nay, ten hundred thousand such assertions, are as vapid as the empty wind. Such latitude of inference, and such jesuitical circumlocution, is competent to sustain the vilest error ever propagated as religious truth, and is sufficient to circumvent and take captive a much more enlightened order of mind than we find once in a hundred among the masses. The masses, generally, are awed into a profession or an admission of a doctrine or practice, without attempting to comprehend the faith or the doctrine imposed on their credulity; and this not only among the much-derided Catholics, but equally among the masses of the Protestants; and this alike in respect to Baptism, as on the subject of the Sabbath. But I draw my remarks on this assumption to a close, by some brief extracts from the honest admissions of some of the most intelligent and learned Pædobaptists. Dr. Doddridge frankly asserts, in reference to the household of Stephanas, that "this seems to imply, that it was the generous care of the whole family to assist their fellow Christians, so that there was not a member which did not do its parts."* Dr. Hammond says: "I think it unreasonable, that the Apostle's bare mention of baptizing this household should be competent to conclude that infants were baptized by him."† Henry admits, that "there was none in his (the Jailor's) house, that refused to be baptized, and so made a jar in the harmony; but they were unanimous in embracing the Gospel, which added much to the joy."‡ And Neander, the candid, the faithful historian, honestly observes: "As baptism was closely united with a conscious entrance on Christian communion, faith and baptism were always connected with one another; and thus it is in the highest degree probable, that baptism was only performed in instances where both could meet together, and that the practice of infant baptism was unknown at this period. We cannot infer the existence of infant baptism from the instance of the baptism of whole families, for the passage in 1 Cor 16: 15 shows the fallacy of such a conclusion, as from that it appears that the whole family of Stephanas, who were baptized by Paul, consisted of adults—that not till so late a period as (at least certainly not earlier than) Irenæus, a trace of infant baptism appears; and that it first became recognized as an apostolic tradition in the course of the third century, is evidence rather against than for the admission of its apostolic origin; especially since, in the spirit of the age when Christianity appeared, there were many elements, which must have been favorable to the introduction of infant baptism—the same elements from which proceeded the notion of the magical effects of outward baptism, the notion for its absolute necessity to salvation, the notion which gave rise to the mythus that the apostles baptized the Old Testament saints in Hades. How very much must infant baptism have corresponded with such a tendency, if it had been favored by tradition."§

PLEA FROM THE SILENCE OF THE SCRIPTURES.

In the absence, the utter absence, of all Scriptural proof to sustain themselves in this matter, the Pædobaptists, are driven, in their extremity, as a last resort, to demand a negative for what they cannot, possibly, find the shadow of an affirmative, and throw themselves on the silence of the Scriptures, not interdicting it—not upon an express, not upon an implied warrant or injunction, but absolutely on the silence of the Scriptures. Truly, a master-piece of logic—potent, irresistible proof, certainly, must be the silence of the Scriptures, as the expressed will of God, for particular action. On any other subject, such a position could not fail to make laughing-stocks of all its advocates. But it is not only the Pope who may use his ipse dixit—expunge Scripture and institute new canons. A Protestant Sanhedrim may do, and have done, the same; and Protestant minions, like Catholic devotees, cry, Amen! Amen! There is scarcely a Pædopatist writer, who does not endorse, in amount, what Dr. Lightfoot has said, long since, on this point, if they do not transfer his own words; which I here insert to exhibit their fallacy. Dr. Lightfoot remarks: "To the objection, 'It is not commanded to baptize infants, therefore they are not to be baptized; I answer, It is not forbidden to baptize infants, therefore they are to be baptized. * * * His (Christ's) silence, and the silence of the Scriptures, in the matter, confirms pædobaptism, and continues it to all ages." Dr. Doddridge, likewise, contends, that "though nothing is said in Scripture to enjoin infant baptism, it is not necessary that it should be expressly enjoined, just as neither the age nor sex of those admitted to the Lord's Supper is mentioned or prescribed. On the other hand, there was a good reason why that should not be done; namely, lest superstitious persons should stick at the bark only of the doctrine, and give their chief attention to what is ceremonial, to the neglect of what is essential." Dr. Doddridge makes a gross blunder, (which like blunder has been also perpetrated by Dr. Dwight, Theology, vol. 3, p. 313, and other distinguished Pædobaptists,) for the age and sex are sufficiently intimated or declared by the Apostle Paul in Galatians 3: 27, 28. Speaking to baptized believers, he says: "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek; there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." Whitby's paraphrase renders it perfectly clear and satisfactory, both as to age and sex, perfectly, irresistibly conclusive, without a single comment, and therefore I append it. "For as many of you as have [believed in Christ, and upon that have] been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ, [and so have become sons of God; for to as many as believed in him, he gave power to become the sons of God, John 1: 12.] There is [under the Gospel dispensation] neither [distinction made of] Jew, nor Greek; there is neither [of] bond nor free; there is neither [of] male nor female, [as under the Jewish economy, the male only bearing the sign of the covenant,] for ye are all one, [as to the privileges of the Gospel,] in Christ Jesus." This defines the age, believers, sufficiently, and declares the sex equal. What more can a quibbler want? Professor Stuart says: "I have only to say, I believe in both the propriety and expediency of the rite (infant sprinkling) thus administered; and therefore accede to it ex animo. Commands, or plain and certain examples, in the New Testament, relative to it, I do not find. Nor, with my view of it, do I need them. If the subject had respect to what is fundamental or essential in Christianity, then I must find either the one or the other, in order to justify adopting or practicing it. But as the case now is, the general analogy of the ancient dispensation; the enlargement of privilege under the Gospel; the silence of the New Testament on the subject of receiving children into a special relation to the church by the baptismal rite; shows, at least, that there was no dispute in early ages relative to this matter." Both Whitby and Clarke quote and adopt Dr. Lightfoot to the same end. Dr. Woods coincides in the same view of the value of silence as a proof: "In these circumstances, (says he,) it was, I apprehend, a matter of course, that they should understand the divine appointment of baptism for Christian proselytes as including their children. And it being a matter of course that they should so understand the subject, there was not the least necessity that the baptism of children should be expressly required, or even mentioned." And Dr. Mason, the great Dr. Mason, out-Herods Herod on this point: "Conceding, then, (says he,) to the opposers of our children's claim as members of the Christian church, all they ask with regard to the silence of the New Testament, that very concession works their ruin. If their views are correct, it could not have been thus silent. Out of their own mouths we draw their conviction; and cast them in the judgment by the very evidence which they offer in their vindication."

A NEW DISCOVERY.

But while such an array of profound divines as Lightfoot, Doddridge, Whitby, Clarke, Mason, Woods, Stuart, and a host of others, frankly acknowledge, that there is no direct scriptural command for "infant baptism," we have among us, in the present day, one who surpasses all others, if not in recondite research and critical acumen, yet, certainly, in boldness of assumption—one who stoops not to untie or unravel difficulties, but cuts the Gordian knot at one fell blow. Yea, Pædobaptist friends, you need no longer lament the absence of Scriptural injunction for your practice in this matter, for a man (and a learned D. D.) has recently discovered, nay, not discovered, but has assumed, and assumed with a boldness to awe into silence minds not versed on Scriptural lore and theological chicanery—theological subterfuge and perversion—one who has boldly asserted, just in so many words: "Christ has commanded infant baptism!" Do not be startled, reader, after the acknowledgments spread before you, from such an array of distinguished, authoritative writers, claiming the utter silence of the Scriptures, the absence of any intimation, as the strongest evidence of the obligation to administer infant sprinkling But where?—where do you suppose that command is to be found? Where? Where, do you ask, that none of the preceding minds could discover it? Can you believe it, reader, yea, it is even in Matthew 20: 19, 20—in Christ's commission to his disciples, to go into the world, to teach and baptize all nations. Surely, reader, you are ready to receive and believe it; for, certainly, it is as clear a command for "infant baptism," as mud is mud. Indeed, if I had not a personal knowledge of the gentleman, Dr. Kurtz, from childhood, and being fully certified of his excellent Christian character and standing, I should judge him to be carrying out the tactics of Voltaire, who urged D'Alembert, when worsted in his attack on the Christian religion, and placed in a sad dilemma, "to lie, lie boldly;"* but I am confident Dr. Kurtz could not be guilty of such an iniquity, jesuitical disingenuity as it may be; still, while I attribute it solely to over zeal in his cause, and a too enthusiastic desire to discover some new hue to the chameleon, never yet discovered by his predecessors, I can but regard such an obliquity, such a studied obliquity, little short of absolute blasphemous dereliction; akin to the same mystery of iniquity, which began to work in the times of the Apostles.

If our friend had assumed that the commission of the Master implies "infant baptism"—implies it consistently and satisfactorily—I should treat it as I do a thousand other vagaries and extraneous matters dragged into the discussion, for no other purpose than to cast dust into the eyes of his readers; but as he boldly assumes, that "Christ commanded infant baptism," I shall examine the passage in one or two aspects, to endeavor to detect some extenuation for the presumption; for my desire is truth, and truth alone, having many years since hung out, in all my investigations, in science, religion, or medicine, the banner of an ancient writer, and have adopted it as my motto, in the discussion of all mooted points: "If any one can convince me that I am wrong in any point of sentiment or practice, I will alter it with all my heart. For it is truth I seek, and that can hurt nobody. It is only persisting in error or ignorance that can hurt us."†

As I am admonished, by the great length to which I find my article running, to curtail my own strictures as much as possible, I shall, therefore, confine my remarks to the single point, "to teach," to ascertain wherein infants are commanded to be baptized, as assumed by Dr. Kurtz.

To remove the inconsistency of the commission "to teach," with the incapacity of infants to comprehend the prerequisites—the conditional prerequisites—to baptism, it has become fashionable of late years to render it: "Go," and "disciple" or "make disciples" of all nations; as if the substitution of the word disciple could change the scriptural phase of it; whereby they attempt to cloak the meaning of the passage; which compels me, again, to resort to definition and explanation of terms, to blow away the mist, and place this matter in its true light before my readers; and to a just appreciation of the elucidation I desire, I must premise the explanation of disciple by that of proselyte.

Calmet defines Proselyte the "name given by the Jews to those who come to dwell in their country, or who embrace their religion, not being Jews by birth. They distinguish two kinds of proselytes. The first, proselytes of the gate; the others proselytes of justice. The first dwelt in the land of Israel, or even out of that country, and without obliging themselves to circumcision, or any other ceremony of the law, feared and worshiped the true God, observing the Noachical rules, or what the Rabbins call the seven precepts of Noah. Of this number was Naaman the Syrian, Nebuzar-adan, general of Nebuchadnezzar's army, Cornelius the centurion, the eunuch of Queen Candace, and some others mentioned in the Acts. * * * Proselytes of justice were those converted to Judaism, who had engaged to receive circumcision, and to observe the whole of the law of Moses. Thus they were admitted to all the prerogatives of the people of the Lord, as well in this life as the other. The Rabbins inform us, that before circumcision was administered to them, and they were admitted into the religion of the Hebrews, they were examined about the motives of their conversion; whether the change were voluntary, or whether it proceeded from interest, fear, ambition, &c. Maimonides assures us, that under the happy reigns of David and Solomon, they received no proselytes of justice, because there was reason to fear, that the prosperity of these princes, rather than any love to religion, made them converts to Judaism. The Talmudists say, that proselytes are, as it were, the canker and rust of Israel, and that very great caution must be taken not to admit them too readily.‡

Crabb distinguishes correctly between conversion and proselytism, which I introduce, to a better illustration of the subject. "Conversion, (says he,) is a more voluntary act than proselytism; it emanates entirely from the mind of the agent, independently of foreign influence; it extends, not merely to the abstract or speculative opinions of the individual, but to the whole current of his feelings, and spring of his actions; it is the conversion of the heart and soul. Proselytism is an outward act, which need not extend beyond the conformity of one's words and actions to a certain rule; convert is therefore always taken in a good sense; it bears on the face of it the stamp of sincerity; proselyte is a term of more ambiguous meaning; the proselyte is often the creature and tool of a party; there may be many proselytes where there are no converts."

Disciple, Calmet says, signifies, in the New Testament, a believer, a Christian, a follower of Jesus Christ; and, good and correct as this definition is, I resort, once more, to Crabb, that prince above all princes in the distinction of words—the king of Synonymia: "Scholar and disciple are both applied to such as learn from others; but the former is said only of those who learn the rudiments of knowledge; the latter of one who acquires any art or science from the instruction of another; the scholar is opposed to the teacher; the disciple to the master: children are always scholars; adult persons may be disciples. Scholars employ themselves chiefly in the study of words; disciples as the disciples, of our Saviour, in the study of things."

With these definitions and illustrations of the terms proselyte and disciple, I proceed to apply them, briefly, to the question before me, to educe, if possible, the command in the commission of the master (Matth. 28: 19, 20,) for "infant baptism."

The term proselyte was a very proper one in the place and for the purpose originally employed in reference to the incorporation of the Gentiles and strangers under the ancient economy. Proselytism is more an external party act than an internal conviction of good and truth—than as partaining to the interests of the soul—that proselytism to Judaism was more ceremonial and national—more a nominal act for national purposes. Christian discipleship comprises a vital exercise of religious sentiment, and is not restricted to the recognition of any one nation. It embraces the radical change of the natural man, and the consecration of all his powers to promote the cause of Christ and his church. Israel was a national establishment, not a church, in its true sense. Many of their proselytes simply gave their adhesion to the government and politely of the nation, without yielding to the rites or partaking of the privileges of the hierarchy. Widely different is it with Christian discipleship. Christian discipleship was based, solely, on consciousness of transgression—on the cognizance of sin—on the capacity to repent for sin, actually perpetrated, and ability to exercise faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. It is the vital exercise of faith and obedience to the Master's behest, that constitutes a disciple, a believer, a follower of Christ Jesus; and no other is embraced in the commission. The Christian religion admits of no nominal disciples. It is a contradiction of terms; therefore infants are not even implied, much less commanded to be baptized.

The Boston Chronicle states that a pew was recently sold at auction in the Franklin st. Church, and bid off by a woman at $540. As the successful bidder had not the appearance of being one who would be likely to pay so high a price for a pew for her own accommodation, some of the bystanders intimated that she could not pay for it. On being asked by the auctioneer when she would settle the bill, she replied, "This afternoon, or as soon as I can draw the money." This she did, and paid per agreement. This woman has for many years been known as an apple seller on Long Wharf. The pew is "to let."

PREACHING TO SINNERS.

Our exchanges bring the gratifying intelligence, that the Spirit of the Lord is at work in different parts of the country, reviving the churches. We are happy to add, that some of the churches in our own denomination are enjoying tokens of the Divine Presence. Would that we could record such abundant displays of grace, as would warrant us in saying, the Spirit is poured out upon us!

We believe in revivals of religion; we believe, too, in using means to promote them. Nay, more; we believe that the means should be adapted to the end, with as much carefulness as if all the power to accomplish the work resided in the means. But when this is done, it should be remembered, that the natural man is "dead," and God should be implored to make him alive. The sinner should be reasoned with, urged, and entreated, as if he were sufficiently alive to appreciate the arguments set before him; he should then be made as much a subject of prayer, as if he were a mere mass of death and corruption, incapable of motion till the Spirit of God has put life into him.

In the excitement attendant on revivals, the absoluteness of the sinner's depravity is sometimes lost sight of. He is addressed, as if the power to become a new creature were mainly in himself. He is scarcely allowed to dwell upon his utter helplessness, as one lying completely at the mercy of God, but is urged, goaded, driven on to take "a decided stand," as it is called, while his sense of self-sufficiency is not yet destroyed. To lay open to him the depths of his depravity; to teach him that it is total, so total as that all his actions are of the very nature of sin; to show him that he has not merely been imperfect in his obedience, but that his whole life has been one uninterrupted course of foul revolt, and abominable apostacy; that he lies, on account of his depravity, entirely at God's discretion, either to save or not to save him; is thought to be taking a course quite too discouraging—too much calculated to cool his ardor.

It is surprising, how God's ministers will daub over this very important subject with untempered mortar. They seem afraid, in many instances, to tell a sinner how fearfully diseased he is, lest it should discourage him from resorting to the remedy. They dare not deliver the message God has told them to deliver, lest some bad consequence should be the result! They forget that God has promised to be with them in the faithful discharge of their duty, and to accompany the proclamation of truth with the life-giving power of his Spirit. They seem not to believe, that His Word will accomplish that which he pleases, and prosper in the thing whereunto he has sent it; they must needs mend it a little, or at least knock off a few points which appear to them to be of doubtful tendency.

For ourselves, we are so thoroughly convinced of the spurious nature of that religion which is not founded on a conviction of the heart's entire corruption, that we are not satisfied unless this doctrine is made prominent, in time of a revival, from beginning to end. Perhaps there would be fewer cases of conversion, but those that did occur would be of a more reliable kind.

There is no danger of pressing this point too closely, provided it be done in strict accordance with the teachings of Scripture. Men do not fail of salvation because they too clearly see their own depravity, but because they are blind to it; they do not go to hell because they believe themselves helpless, but rather because they do not believe it. They are proud, self-sufficient, and obstinately wedded to the notion that their depravity consists merely in imperfections, and not in a total alienation from God. They conceit themselves possessed of a little good, in virtue of which they can vault up, seize, and appropriate to themselves whatever God lets down from heaven in the Gospel, notwithstanding the express declaration, that the sons of God are born not of the will of the flesh. John 1: 13. Hence, they suppose that the case is not desperate, and so they go on in sin.

We know it seems absurd to worldly wisdom, to call upon souls thus dead—thus totally alienated from God—thus helpless and ruined—to rise up, and walk in newness of life. 'It were as rational,' say they, 'to stand at the grave's mouth, and call upon the dead to come forth.' And we reply, that to call upon dead men in their graves to come forth, would be a perfectly rational act, if God were to command us to do it. We might, in that case, expect that his power would accompany our words, and that the dead would actually arise. It may have seemed strange to Ezekiel, that he should be told to stand in the valley of dry bones, and say to them, "O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord." Yet He who had the power to make them stand up, "an exceeding great army," and to cover them with flesh, and fill them with life, told him to do it; and the result was just what God intended it should be. So, however absurd it may seem to call upon men spiritually dead to perform spiritual acts, it is nevertheless just what God commands us to do.

If this kind of preaching fails to have the desired effect, the reason is, not because it is too discouraging to the sinner, but because it is not mixed with prayer to Him that quickeneth the dead. There is, in many cases, a practical disavowal of the doctrine, after it is preached. Were it truly believed, prayer to God to send forth the necessary quickening power would follow. But it is not believed; there is an inward discontent, on the part of many in the church, whenever it is set forth. They have never received the doctrine that God is the sole agent in giving life to the dead, but have rather thought that the preacher did the work in part, or perhaps the preacher and the sinner together. The truth is, however, that the preacher simply utters the words which he is commanded to utter, while all the life-giving power, from first to last, is of God. "Of Him [and of no other] are ye in Christ Jesus." 1 Cor. 1: 30.

In the efficiency of the mere words of truth to make alive the dead in sin, we have no sort of faith whatever. They are indeed spirit and life to him who believes them, (John 6: 63,) but the very fact that they are so often a savor of death unto death, proves the necessity of a power over and above, to make them truly saving. The Gospel is no farther a source of life to the dead, than as it is a medium for conveying to them the quickening Spirit. We have faith in preaching—we have faith in the words of truth skillfully arranged, and presented to the mind—we have faith in arguments, and appeals to the conscience—but our faith in these things does not terminate upon them, as if in them resided any efficient power to give life, but in a living, personal, power-exerting God—one who, because he has life in himself, raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them. BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Crystal Palace—Papal Persecutions—Infidelity and Atheism.

Glasgow, February 18th, 1853.

The Sunday Opening of the Crystal Palace still continues to excite much attention. The organization of a hundred thousand of the workmen of London alone, to petition for it, is felt by the church to be a fact too significant to be lightly regarded. After the second meeting of the delegates of that organization, last week, a deputation of their number had a meeting with Lord Palmerston, our Home Secretary, in reference to the object. What passed on the occasion has not transpired; but it is already known, that the Government is favorably disposed to the Sunday exhibition. Meanwhile, the works upon the grounds rapidly progress; and in Parliament the standing orders have been declared complied with in regard to the Bill of the Company. The church is feebly taking measures to counteract the influence of Mayhew's band. This week a meeting of working men, also, was held at Islington, for the purpose of petitioning against the Sunday opening. The Rev. Daniel Wilson was the chief speaker; and some working men, who objected to the ground taken, were not allowed to speak. They were informed that no opposition was to be permitted. In Glasgow, on the same evening, a meeting, not largely attended, of the Working Men's Sunday Protection Society, and having the same object in view, was held in Dr. Eadie's Church. Here again the chief speaker was a Reverend Mr. Cowe.

In the House of Commons, last night, Mr. Kinnaird moved an Address to Her Majesty, praying her to make known to the Grand Duke of Tuscany the sense which Protestants entertain of the proceedings against the Madiai. After some discussion, the matter was left, at the suggestion of Lord John Russell, to the management of government. The part taken by the Romish members, shows clearly enough, if there ever had been room for doubt, that the persecuting propensities of their church are unimpaired. One denied, even, that the treatment of the prisoners was severe; although the most authentic accounts prove the contrary. Poor Rosa has recently described herself as gone to skin and bone; and one who saw her on New Year's Day, gave account at the time of the great discomfort of her prison and prison dress. She was, however, cheerful, and in better health—particularly pleased at being permitted by the inspector of the prison to give to each of the female prisoners some pollenta and a glass of wine. One of the Irish Members of Parliament defended the measures of the Grand Duke fully—and not one of them condemned them. To avow disapproval would indeed be to condemn the church, and this is hardly to be expected from them, if they really believe that their future happiness is much dependent on the light in which they are regarded by the priests, and the condition into which their spiritual performances shall place them. It was believed by some, that the enlightenment of our age was such that the leopard must have changed his spots; and when the Earl of Carlisle, who previously had lent all his energies politically in their favor, called upon the Romish laymen of the country to disavow all approval of the Grand Duke's proceedings against liberty of conscience, he doubtless expected that the call would be loudly responded to. He was quite undeceived in his estimate of Rome by the fact that T. Chrisholm Austey, Esq., M. P., only, did personally repudiate his church's principles in this respect, avowing that he stands in a small and decreasing minority in Ireland, and that the general view there is, that "it is false to hold that any church but the true church is entitled to toleration." As Rome asserts that she is the true church, and as her Irish members believe this, we are thus pretty plainly told, that our toleration at home, can only arise from the present want of power on the part of the true church to put us in prison or burn us at the stake. And as the power and the influence of that church are on the increase, we may look forward to the time when such an obstacle to the edifying spectacle of Rome's love for souls shall be removed.

There is another power growing amongst and around us, from whose zeal we may yet have cause to fear. Open infidelity and daring blasphemy are upon the increase. Lectures are given and discussions conducted with the avowed object of vilifying Christianity as a curse to mankind. Mr. Holyoake, the apostle of Atheism, has on three several occasions met in stated controversy the Rev. Brewin Grant, in London, in vindication of what he terms Secularism as in opposition to Christianity. The discussions have been largely attended, and, when concluded, are to be printed. Alas! one of the chairmen for this blasphemer was, in Glasgow, a few years ago, a preacher of the Gospel; and there is now before me an address of his under the title of "Sowing in Tears." Let him, therefore, who thinks that he stands, take heed lest he fall. Let each one of us seek to the Lord for grace, that we may be enabled to endure unto the end. J. A. BEGG.

CALIFORNIA CORRESPONDENCE.

Placerville, California, Dec. 28th, 1852.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

I have had it in contemplation, for a time past, to furnish you a brief statement relative to the present condition of things in this portion of California—which I am requested to do by friends living in the Atlantic States.

Placerville is an inland city, fifty miles east of Sacramento, and about one hundred miles west of the summit of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, on the waters of the American River. It is in the vicinity of perhaps as good a mining district as can be found in California. Its population, I am told, numbers about ten thousand. The inhabitants are divided into three general classes—Miners, Traders, and Gamblers, Many of the Miners are time-servers, of course, and can be bought and sold as the case may be; yet they possess the chief virtue, and may be denominated the salt of this place. The Traders are active and energetic men, and will take every advantage possible for the sake of money. The Gamblers, who are very numerous, do a large business. They build large and commodious houses, in which to carry out their purposes. They own the best and largest houses in the city, situated in the most public places, possessing all the attractions their genius can invent, to draw the attention of the unsuspecting multitude. In these houses the very best musicians are employed, with all manner of musical instruments, as if to quiet that reproving spirit which appears to dwell in the atmosphere. In many of these houses is found a variety of paintings, statuary, &c., some of which are of the most splendid character, but others vile and obscene. Every afternoon in the week, and on Sundays especially, the tables in these Halls are surrounded with gamblers, blacklegs, &c., many of whom are females. No sane mind can witness such scenes, and question that "evil communications corrupt good manners." These things prove the ruin of many a poor Californian.

The Christian needs, I think, more firmness and decision of character in California than in any other part of the inhabited globe. He not only needs to pray, but to "pray with all prayer." Few persons, unacquainted with the ways of the vicious, and surrounded by religious restraints, know themselves. As one who loves the prosperity of Zion, and the Lord's holy Sabbath, I would advise all men, Sabbath-keepers especially, to look at California as it exists, before exchanging for it a pure and holy atmosphere, where Heaven has never withheld the necessaries of life. Remember, that all who come to California do not make their pile; only a few better their condition. When all is footed up, and the balance struck, quite as many make shipwreck of their religion; some learn to swear, some to drink liquor, and almost all to gamble in some shape or other. There are those here who were observers of God's holy day when at home, but now they keep no day. Sabbatarians, if they must come to California, should come in companies, and continue together; otherwise their influence is soon gone.

This might be made a field of usefulness, for here are gathered together people from the four quarters of the earth. Representatives of every nation, kindred, and tongue, and people, may be found here, bearing the characteristic marks of their home and country. Asia, in its divisions and sub-divisions, sends here her people. Africa, too, is represented. Men from all parts of Europe are to be found here. Every kind of religion, also, is here—the votaries of the Virgin, the followers of Mahomet, and of Confucius; in short, a "sprinkling" of all the world. Among others, I have made acquaintance with a Calcuttian, who holds in sacred reverence the Hindoo form of religion, but appears anxious to know more about the Christian religion—why Christians should differ so widely from the followers of Mahomet. These appear te regard the American people as far superior to the European. The same may be said of the Chinamen, who number thousands here. In all their interruptions by and fights with other people, they have not been known to strike an American, or treat one with disrespect.

Some of my friends doubtless wish to know more about the climate of California. It is difficult for me to give a reliable statement without longer experience. During my stay in California, the climate has been any thing but that of a paradise. Previous to the winter season the days were uncomfortably warm, and nights the reverse; traveling extremely disagreeable, in consequence of the dust, which lay in the roads from two to ten inches deep. Since the middle of October, the weather has been most of the time damp and chilly, with considerable frost when clear. It has rained more or less every day since the 28th of November, except during a heavy snow storm, which lasted eight days, and left the ground covered from six inches to four feet deep, according to the elevation. Since that time it has not ceased to rain. Every valley and ravine is flooded with water, and much damage has been experienced among the miners. Mining, upon the whole, is at a low ebb in California. Provisions are extremely high. Flour here is worth $90 00 per barrel. Pork $80 00. B. F. Bond.

SUNDAY TRAVEL.

The plan of a Sunday mail, and facilities for Sunday travel, between New York and Boston, has been consummated. A few years ago, such a thing would have been considered impossible. Then people thought that the arguments of learned divines, and the addresses of popular conventions, had convinced railroad directors that Sunday trains were unprofitable—that the draw-back from "Sabbath accidents" would more than counterbalance the receipts—that, in short, it was good policy to run no trains on Sunday. But it seems that the people were mistaken, or that the railroad directors, if convinced, did not stay convinced. For a year past, facilities for Sunday travel have increased with wonderful rapidity; and now such facilities are to be furnished even in Puritan New England. Surely, the time has come for the self-styled "friends of the Sabbath" to consider whether the dollar-and-cent argument with which they have been wont to ply railroad directors, is not a very unsafe one. "To the law and to the testimony" they must conform their efforts and their practice if they would succeed in stopping railroad travel on the Sabbath.

The following is from the Independent:—

"When the Hudson River Railroad Company began, last summer, the running of Sunday trains upon their road, encouraged by the previously-expressed opinion of their former distinguished president, that such a course would be necessary, it was easy to see that it would be but the beginning of mischief. Accordingly we have had, since then, the starting of Sunday trains on the Sixth and Eighth-avenue roads, and last Sabbath witnessed the inauguration of a system of Sunday travel between this city and Boston. On pretense of a necessity of getting hither as soon as possible the European mails—which are apt to reach Boston, once a month, perhaps, on the Sabbath—we are not merely to have a special train for that emergency when it occurs, but we are to have a regular train every Sunday, and both ways! But more than this. As if a train every week and in both directions were not enough, not only are the mails to be transported, but as many passengers as please to go with them! A truly comprehensive method of solving the difficulty!

"And who knows how far this matter is to go? If the beginning of strife is as when one letteth out water, so is the beginning of such sin...... But we should like to see enough of the old Puritan regard for the Sabbath in some New England legislature, or in some New England town, to forbid the running of Sabbath trains through the quiet villages of Massachusetts and Connecticut for the benefit of speculators in New York."

BOSTON MISSIONARY CONTRIBUTIONS.

A statement from the "Missionary House," Boston, gives the amount contributed in that city, during the month of January, 1853, for the missions of the American Board. It is one-twelfth of the expenses of the Board for the year, or the entire expenses for one month. We copy a portion of the statement, and commend to consideration and imitation the great advance in their contributions, and the manner in which they are made.

"The average annual contributions to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions from the Boston churches, for a number of years past, has been about eighteen thousand dollars. Last year, from a variety of causes, it fell below that, though there was an advance in the contributions of the Commonwealth at large. Before commencing the subscriptions for the present year, pastors and delegates from the churches met to consider whether it was not time to make a decided advance upon the rate of former years, especially upon the amount of the previous year. It was unanimously decided to raise, if possible, not less than $25,000; and a sub-committee of one from each church was appointed to consider how to attain this result.

"The Boston effort for foreign missions is made in the month of January. A sermon is usually preached by one of the Secretaries, and generally another bearing upon the subject, on the same day, by the pastor; and in most cases a meeting is held in the evening to facilitate the subscriptions; and then the work is carried out and finished by collectors, appointed according to some fixed usage; one active and interested member of each church having the special care committed to him of seeing the work done in his particular church and congregation. In one of the congregations the subscription is $5,200; in another nearly $4,000; in another, not less than $3,000; in another, nearly that sum; in two others, $2,500; in others, from $500 to $1,200; and the monthly concert contributions during the year may be estimated at not less than $1,000. The $25,000 are believed to be secured. This is an advance of more than forty per cent. upon the contributions of the last year, and more than one-third upon the average for the last five years.

Wesleyanism in England.—A meeting of some religious interest took place on the 8th of February at Freemasons' Hall, London, to promote the cause of reform in the Wesleyan Church. Apsley Pellatt, M. P., presided, and the meeting was numerously attended. Resolutions were passed protesting against the dogma of pastoral supremacy, against the power claimed and exercised by district meetings, and against the intolerance of the Wesleyan Conference, and further calling on all Wesleyan Reformers for increased activity.

Threatened Outbreak.—Last week the people of Charlestown, Mass., were apprehensive of another affair like that of the destruction of the Ursuline Convent, some twenty years since. It seems that an Irish girl, educated a Catholic, was recently converted to Protestantism, and soon after suddenly disappeared. Some weeks had since passed, and the efforts of her Protestant friends, among them a wealthy and respectable merchant, her guardian, to find her, had proved unavailing. A public meeting was called; and such was the excitement on both sides, the Catholic and Protestant, that the military was ordered to be in readiness, a hundred special constables appointed, and other measures taken to insure the public tranquility. In the evening, some 5,000 rioters assembled near the Catholic church, and, as all attempts by the Mayor and Bishop Fitzpatrick to disperse them failed, the Riot Act was read, and finally the military, with loaded muskets, were called up, who put the rioters to flight, happily without bloodshed. A few days after, the girl, Honora Corcoran, made her appearance. She was found in Philadelphia, where she says she was restrained of her liberty.

The Irish in Missouri.—An Irish Catholic priest, who is traveling in the Far West, furnishes one of the Catholic papers with notes of his observations. In the forests of Missouri he found great numbers of Irishmen at work upon the Pacific Railroad—concerning whom he says:—

"There they were from Dublin, Meath, Louth, Carlow, Wexford, and Kilkenny, working like condemned galley-slaves, felling the forest, clearing away the earth, blasting the rocks, sinking foundations for gulleys and bridges, standing in water with some inches of snow on the ground, the air biting their faces with pinching frost; going to sleep after such labor, not in a comfortable log cabin, but to a miserable shanty, through the apertures in which you could count the myriad stars, twinkling above. These poor creatures strive to remove the feeling of cold and exhaustion by going to the 'shanty groggeries,' and drinking. They lose all self-respect, have no moral restraint, lead the most degraded lives, and die after a few years, either of delirium tremens, congested fever, or consumption, resulting from repeated attacks of fever and ague."

City Reform—A meeting composed of some five thousand citizens of New York was held at Metropolitan Hall, on the evening of March 5th, to consider the recent developments in connection with the proceedings of the Common Council, and to devise means of preventing similar things in future. Among the attendants were many of the leading business men of the City, of whom several delivered addresses upon the subject. The result of the meeting was the appointment of a committee of prominent citizens to go to Albany and procure, if possible, the passage of an act so amending the Charter that Municipal Elections shall be held in the spring; that the Board of Assistant Aldermen shall be abolished, and a popular body of a much larger number be elected in their stead, (perhaps one member from each Election District;) the complete removal of the Aldermen from judicial functions; the establishment of the veto power in the Mayor, as it exists in the President; that heads of Departments shall exercise no powers not delegated by law; that no money shall be expended or debt contracted except as authorized by previous specific laws; and that the statutes should be so amended as to make members of City Governments indictable in Courts of law for malfeasance in office.

A Judge Impeached.—The Wisconsin Legislature have recommended the removal from office of Judge Levi Hubbell, for high crimes and misdemeanors. The charges against him, involving a most extraordinary amount of moral turpitude, are as follows:—

1st. Of receiving a bribe in the case of suit against Comstock and Sanderson. 2d. Adjudicating cases where he was pecuniarily interested—with three specifications. 3d. Willfully and partially passing illegal sentences on persons convicted—with two specifications. 4th. Presiding in cases in which he had acted as solicitor and counsel—six specifications. 5th. Taking for his own use moneys paid into Court—three specifications. 6th. Giving advice in cases before him, in his official capacity—three specifications. 7th. Conducting himself with partiality towards suitors—eight specifications. 8th. Using his official station to induce females to submit themselves to be debauched by him—four specifications. 9th. Arbitrarily using his office to the benefit of particular parties—six specifications. 10th. Allowing himself to be approached and advised with as to suits before him—twenty-two specifications. 11th. Interfering in matters in suits before him—thirteen specificatians.

Bible Movements.—At the monthly meeting of the Board of Managers of the American Bible Society, held on the 3d inst., a letter was read from Rev. Dr. Perkins, of Oroomiah, stating the completion of the Bible in ancient and modern Syriac, so that the Nestorians now have the entire Bible in both languages, published by funds of this Society. Appropriations in money for the publication of the Scriptures were made, viz: for China $5,000, being $1,000 each to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, to the Methodist Episcopal Church, to the Protestant Episcopal Church, to the Presbyterian Board of Missions, and to the Meth. Episcopal Church South; to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, for Madras, $1,000; to the same, for Madura, $1,000; Presbyterian Board of Missions, for Northern India, $3,000; to the Methodist Missionary Society, for Germany, $1,000; for France, $2,000; and $100 to the Methodist Missionary Society, for purchase of Scriptures for the Chippewa Indians in Michigan.

A Sermon on the Death of Eld. James H. Cochran, preached at Alfred by Eld. N. V. Hull, has been reported for the Recorder by J. M. Allen, and will be printed at an early day. Perhaps it may have to wait the completion of Dr. Fahnestock's papers, of which there will be two more.

INAUGURATION OF PRESIDENT PIERCE.

Franklin Pierce took the oath of office as President of the United States on the 4th inst., at 1½ o'clock P. M. The ceremony was witnessed by an immense assemblage. At its close, the President stepped to the front of the platform, was greeted with enthusiastic cheers, and proceeded to read the following Inaugural Address.

My Countrymen: It is a relief to feel that no heart but my own can know the personal regret and bitter sorrow over which I have been borne to a position so suitable for others, rather than desirable for myself.

The circumstances under which I have been called, for a limited period, to preside over the destinies of the Republic, fill me with a profound sense of responsibility, but with nothing like shrinking apprehension. I repair to the post assigned me, not as to one sought, but in obedience to the unsolicited expression of your will, answerable only for a fearless, faithful, and diligent exercise of my best powers. I ought to be, and am, truly grateful for the rare manifestation of the nation's confidence; but this, so far from lightening my obligations, only adds to their weight. You have summoned me in my weakness; you must sustain me by your strength. When looking for the fulfillment of reasonable requirements, you will not be unmindful of the great changes which have occurred, even within the last quarter of a century, and the consequent augmentation and complexity of the duties imposed, in the administration both of your home and foreign affairs.

Whether the elements of inherent force in the Republic have kept pace with its unparalleled progression in territory, population, and wealth, has been the subject of earnest thought and discussion, on both sides of the ocean. Less than sixty-three years ago, the Father of his Country made "the" then "recent accession of the important State of North Carolina to the Constitution of the United States," one of the subjects of his special congratulation. At that moment, however, when the agitation consequent upon the revolutionary struggle had hardly subsided, when we were just emerging from the weakness and embarrassments of the confederation, there was an evident consciousness of vigor, equal to the great mission so wisely and bravely fulfilled by our fathers. It was not a presumptuous assurance, but a calm faith, springing from a clear view of the sources of power in a government constituted like ours. It is no paradox to say, that although comparatively weak, the new-born nation was intrinsically strong. Inconsiderable in population and apparent resources, it was upheld by a broad and intelligent comprehension of rights, and an all-pervading purpose to maintain them, stronger than armaments; it came from the furnace of the revolution, tempered to the necessities of the times. The thoughts of the men of that day were as practical as their sentiments were patriotic. They wasted no portion of their energies upon idle and delusive speculations, but with a firm and fearless step advanced beyond the governmental landmarks, which had hitherto circumscribed the limits of human freedom, and planted their standard where it has stood, against dangers which have threatened from abroad, and internal agitation, which has at times fearfully menaced at home. They proved themselves equal to the solution of the great problem, to understand which their minds had been illuminated by the dawning lights of the revolution. The object sought was not a thing dreamed of; it was a thing realized. They exhibited not only the power to achieve, but what all history affirms to be so much more unusual, the capacity to maintain. The oppressed throughout the world, from that day to the present, have turned their eyes hitherward, not to find those lights extinguished, or to fear lest they should wane, but to be constantly cheered by their steady and increasing radiance.

In this, our country has in my judgment thus far fulfilled its highest duty to suffering humanity. It has spoken, and will continue to speak, not only by its words, but by its acts, the language of sympathy, encouragement, and hope, to those who earnestly listen to tones which pronounce for the largest national liberty. But, after all, the most animating encouragement and potent appeal for freedom will be its own history, its trials, and its triumphs. Preëminently, the power of our advocacy reposes in our example; but no example, be it remembered, can be powerful for lasting good, whatever apparent advantages may be gained, which is not based upou eternal principles of right and justice. Our fathers decided for themselves, both upon the hour to declare and the hour to strike. They were their own judges of the circumstances under which it became them to pledge to each other "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor," for the acquisition of the priceless inheritance transmitted to us. The energy with which that great conflict was opened, and, under the guidance of a manifest and beneficent Providence, the uncomplaining endurance with which it was prosecuted to its consummation, were only surpassed by the wisdom and patriotic spirit of concession which characterized all the counsels of the early fathers.

One of the most impressive evidences of that wisdom is to be found in the fact, that the actual working of our system has dispelled a degree of solicitude, which, at the outset, disturbed bold hearts and far-reaching intellects. The apprehension of dangers from extended territory, multiplied States, accumulated wealth, and augmented population, has proved to be unfounded. The stars upon your banner have become nearly threefold their original number, your densely populated possessions skirt the shores of the two great oceans; and yet this vast increase of people and territory has not only shown itself compatible with the harmonious action of the States and the Federal Government in their respective constitutional spheres, but has afforded an additional guarantee of the strength and integrity of both.

With an experience thus suggestive and cheering, the policy of my administration will not be controlled by any timid forebodings of evil from expansion. Indeed, it is not to be disguised, that our attitude as a nation, and our position on the globe, render the acquisition of certain possessions, not within our jurisdiction, eminently important for our protection, if not, in the future, essential for the preservation of the rights of commerce and the peace of the world. Should they be obtained, it will be through no grasping spirit, but with a view to obvious national interest and security, and in a manner entirely consistent with the strict observance of national faith. We have nothing in our history or position to invite aggression; we have everything to beckon us to the cultivation of relations of peace and amity with all nations. Purposes, therefore, at once just and pacific, will be significantly marked in the conduct of our foreign affairs. I intend that my administration shall leave no blot upon our fair record, and trust I may safely give the assurance, that no act within the legitimate scope of my constitutional control will be tolerated, on the part of any portion of our citizens, which cannot challenge a ready justification before the tribunal of the civilized world. An administration would be unworthy of confidence at home, or respect abroad, should it cease to be influenced by the conviction, that no apparent advantage can be purchased at a price so dear as that of national wrong or dishonor. It is not your privilege, as a nation, to speak of a distant past. The striking incidents of your history, replete with instruction, and furnishing abundant grounds for hopeful confidence, are comprised in a period comparatively brief. But if your past is limited, your future is boundless. Its obligations throng the unexplored pathway of advancement, and will be limitless as duration. Hence, a sound and comprehensive policy should embrace, not less the distant future, than the urgent present.

The great objects of our pursuit, as a people, are best to be attained by peace, and are entirely consistent with the tranquillity and interests of the rest of mankind. With the neighboring nations upon our continent, we should cultivate kindly and fraternal relations. We can desire nothing in regard to them so much as to see them consolidate their strength, and pursue the paths of prosperity and happiness. If, in the course of their growth, we should open new channels of trade, and create additional facilities for friendly intercourse, the benefits realized will be equal and mutual. Of the complicated European systems of national polity we have heretofore been independent. From their wars, their tumults and anxieties, we have been, happily, almost entirely exempt. While these are confined to the nations which gave them existence, and within their legitimate jurisdiction, they cannot affect us, except as they appeal to our sympathies in the cause of human freedom and universal advancement. But the vast interests of commerce are common to all mankind, and the advantages of trade and international intercourse must always present a noble field for the moral influence of a great people.

With these views firmly and honestly carried out, we have a right to expect, and shall under all circumstances require, prompt reciprocity. The rights which belong to us as a nation, are not alone to be respected, but those which pertain to every citizen in his individual capacity, at home and abroad, must be sacredly maintained. So long as he can discern every star in its place upon that ensign, without wealth to purchase for him preferment, or title to secure for him place, it will be his privilege, and must be his acknowledged right, to stand unabashed, even in the presence of princes, with a proud consciousness that he is himself one of a nation of sovereigns, and that he cannot, in legitimate pursuit, wander so far from home, that the agent, whom he shall leave behind in the place which I now occupy, will not see that no rude hand of power or tyrannical passion is laid upon him with impunity. He must realize, that upon every sea, and on every soil, where our enterprise may rightfully seek the protection of our flag. American citizenship is an inviolable panoply for the security of American rights. And, in this connection, it can hardly be necessary to reäffirm a principle which should now be regarded as fundamental. The rights, security and repose of this Confederacy reject the idea of interference or colonization, on this side of the ocean, by any foreign power, beyond present jurisdiction, as utterly inadmissible.

The opportunities of observation, furnished by my brief experience as a soldier, confirmed in my own mind the opinion entertained and acted upon by others from the formation of the Government, that the maintenance of large standing armies in our country would be not only dangerous but unnecessary. They also illustrated the importance, I might well say the absolute necessity, of the military science and practical skill furnished, in such an eminent degree, by the institution which has made your army what it is, under the discipline and instruction of officers not more distinguished for their solid attainments, gallantry, and devotion to the public service, than for unobtrusive bearing and high moral tone. The army, as organized, must be the nucleus around which, in every time of need, the strength of your military power, the sure bulwark of your defense—a national militia—may be readily formed into a well-disciplined and efficient organization. And the skill and self-devotion of the Navy assure you, that you may take the performance of the past as a pledge for the future, and may confidently expect that the flag, which has waved its untarnished folds over every sea, will still float in undiminished honor. But these, like many other subjects, will be appropriately brought, at a future time, to the attention of the co-ordinate branches of the Government, to which I shall always look with profound respect, and with full confidence that they will accord to me the aid and support which I shall so much need, and which their experience and wisdom will readily suggest.

In the administration of domestic affairs, you expect a devoted integrity in the public service, and an observance of rigid economy in all departments, so marked as never justly to be questioned. If this reasonable expectation be not realized, I frankly confess that one of your leading hopes is doomed to disappointment and that my efforts in a very important particular must result in a humiliating failure. Offices can be properly regarded only in the light of aids for the accomplishment of these objects; and as occupancy can confer no prerogative, nor importunate desire for preferment any claim, the public interest imperatively demands that they be considered with sole reference to the duties to be performed. Good citizens may well claim the protection of good laws, and the benign influence of a good government; but a claim for office is what the people of a Republic should never recognize. No reasonable man of any party will expect the Administration to be so regardless of its responsibility, and of the obvious elements of success, as to retain persons known to be under the influence of political hostility and partisan prejudice, in positions which will require not only severe labor but cordial coöperation. Having no implied engagements to ratify, no rewards to bestow, no resentments to remember, and no personal wishes to consult, in selections for official station, I shall fulfill this difficult and delicate trust, admitting no motive as worthy either of my character or position, which does not contemplate an efficient discharge of duty and the best interests of my country. I acknowledge my obligations to the masses of my countrymen, and to them alone. Higher objects than personal aggrandizement gave direction and energy to their exertions in the late canvass, and they shall not be disappointed. They require at my hands diligence, integrity and capacity, wherever there are duties to be performed. Without these qualities in their public servants, more stringent laws for the prevention or punishment of fraud, negligence and speculation, will be vain. With them, they will be unnecessary.

But these are not the only points to which you look for vigilant watchfulness. The dangers of a concentration of all power in the General Government of a Confederacy so vast as ours, are too obvious to be disregarded. You have a right, therefore, to expect your agents, in every department, to regard strictly the limits imposed upon them by the Constitution of the United States. The great scheme of our constitutional liberty rests upon a proper distribution of power between the State and Federal authorities; and experience has shown, that the harmony and happiness of our people must depend upon a just discrimination between the separate rights and responsibilities of the States, and your common rights and obligations under the General Government. And here, in my opinion, are the considerations, which should form the true basis of future concord in regard to the questions which have most seriously disturbed public tranquillity. If the Federal Government will confine itself to the exercise of powers clearly granted by the Constitution, it can hardly happen that its action upon any question should endanger the institutions of the States, or interfere with their right to manage matters strictly domestic according to the will of their own people.

In expressing briefly my views upon an important subject which has recently agitated the nation to almost a fearful degree, I am moved by no other impulse than a most earnest desire for the perpetuation of that Union which has made us what we are, showering upon us blessings, and conferring a power and influence which our fathers could hardly have anticipated, even with their most sanguine hopes directed to a far-off future. The sentiments I now announce were not unknown before the expression of the voice which called me here. My own position upon this subject was clear and unequivocal, upon the record of my words and my acts, and it is only recurred to at this time because silence might perhaps be misconstrued. With the Union, my best and dearest earthly hopes are entwined. Without it, what are we, individually or collectively? What becomes of the noblest field ever opened for the advancement of our race, in religion, in government, in the arts, and in all that dignifies and adorns mankind? From that radiant constellation, which both illumines our own way and points out to struggling nations their course, let but a single star be lost, and, if there be not utter darkness, the luster of the whole is dimmed. Do my countrymen need any assurance that such a catastrophe is not to overtake them while I possess the power to stay it? It is with me an earnest and vital belief, that as the Union has been the source, under Providence, of our prosperity to this time, so it is the surest pledge of a continuance of the blessings we have enjoyed, and which we are sacredly bound to transmit undiminished to our children. The field of calm and free discussion in our country is open, and will always be so; but it never has been and never can be traversed for good in a spirit of sectionalism and uncharitableness. The founders of the Republic dealt with things as they were presented to them, in a spirit of self-sacrificing patriotism, and, as time has proved, with a comprehensive wisdom which it will always be safe for us to consult. Every measure tending to strengthen the fraternal feelings of all the members of our Union, has had my heartfelt approbation. To every theory of society or government, whether the offspring of feverish ambition or of morbid enthusiasm, calculated to dissolve the bonds of law and affection which unite us, I shall interpose a ready and stern resistance. I believe that involuntary servitude, as it exists in different States of this confederacy, is recognized by the Constitution. I believe that it stands like any other admitted right, and that the States where it exists are entitled to efficient remedies to enforce the constitutional provisions. I hold that the laws of 1850, commonly called the "Compromise Measures," are strictly constitutional, and to be unhesitatingly carried into effect. I believe that the constituted authorities of this Republic are bound to regard the rights of the South in this respect, as they would view any other legal and constitutional right, and that the laws to enforce them should be respected and obeyed, not with a reluctance encouraged by abstract opinions as to their propriety in a different state of society, but cheerfully, and according to the decisions of the tribunal to which their exposition belongs. Such have been, and are, my convictions, and upon them I shall act. I fervently hope that the question is at rest, and that no sectional, or ambitious, or fanatical excitement may again threaten the durability of our institutions, or obscure the light of our prosperity.

But let not the foundation of our hope rest upon man's wisdom. It will not be sufficient that sectional prejudices find no place in the public deliberations. It will not be sufficient that the rash counsels of human passion are rejected. It must be felt, that there is no national security but in the nation's humble, acknowledge dependence upon God and His overruling providence.

We have been carried in safety through a perilous crisis. Wise counsels, like those which gave us the Constitution, prevailed to uphold it. Let the period be remembered as an admonition, and not as an encouragement, in any section of the Union, to make experiments fraught with such fearful hazard. Let it be impressed upon all hearts, that beautiful as our fabric is, no earthly power or wisdom could reunite its broken fragments. Standing as I do almost within view of the green slopes of Monticello, and, as it were, within reach of the tomb of Washington, with all the cherished memories of the past gathering around me, like so many eloquent voices of exhortation from Heaven, I can express no better hope for my country, than that the kind Providence which smiled upon our fathers may enable their children to preserve the blessings they have inherited.

FRANKLIN PIERCE.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, FEB. 28.

In the SENATE, after some debate, the Civil and Diplomatic bill was taken up. Some important amendments were made, and a discussion occurred upon a plan to classify Department Clerks at Washington, and another upon building houses for or raising the salaries of Cabinet Officers. The building was rejected; the increase of salaries, including that of the Vice-President to $8,000, was agreed to. An appropriation to supply Washington City with pure water, was proposed. Other amendments followed—one looking to the free importation of iron, another providing for an Assistant Secretary of State, &c. The iron question led to a long discussion, and no decision had been reached when a motion to adjourn prevailed.

In the HOUSE, after some minor business, the Senate's amendments to the Deficiency bill came up in Committee of the Whole. A long debate ensued, in relation to a mint in California.

THIRD-DAY, MARCH 1.

In the SENATE, the Civil and Diplomatic bill was taken up again, but was deferred for a short time that the Post Route bill might be taken up. To this bill two principal amendments were made, one raising the salary of Assistant Postmasters General to $3,000, the other to make all railroads post routes—the bill passed. The former bill was resumed. After considerable debate as to the propriety of Mr. Mason's proposition for repealing the duties on railroad iron being attached to this bill, the amendment to this effect was voted down by a large majority. Mr. Fish offered an amendment providing for an Assay Office in the City of New York. This proposition was favored by the Secretary of the Treasury, and after some discussion, was agreed to. Many other amendments were proposed, some agreed to, some not.

In the HOUSE, the Army bill came up again in Committee of the Whole, the question being upon agreeing to the Senate amendments. Those relating to fortifying San Francisco and various other of our seaports were non-concurred in. That ordering surveys for a railroad to the Pacific was agreed to.

FOURTH-DAY, MARCH 2.

In the SENATE, the Indian Appropriation Bill was reported back from committee, and the Navy Bill, without amendments. The Civil and Diplomatic Bill was then taken up, and amended so as to admit flax machinery free of duty. A great number of other amendments were rejected, among them one to reserve sections of public lands for six miles on each side of railroads constructed through them by the States. The bill was finally read a third time and passed. The House resolution, providing for printing the Census returns was also passed. The Post-Office bill followed, and an attempt was made to add to it an appropriation of land to carry out Alden & Eddy's plan of a subterranean Telegraph to San Francisco, which was lost. Mr. Gwin moved an amendment looking to a semi-monthly mail from San Francisco to China. Mr. Gwin, after some debate, withdrew his amendment, and the bill passed. Then followed the Army bill, which came in from the House with the Senate amendments disagreed to. The Senate insisted, and a committee of conference was ordered. Then the bill to establish the Territory of Washington was passed without change. The Committee of Conference on the Army bill reported that they had receded from several amendments relating to California; from the one providing for the emigrant route, and from that relating to ether, and the report was concurred in. Adjourned.

In the HOUSE, many of the Senate amendments to the Army bill were concurred in. Among them that appropriating $500,000 for the defense of San Francisco, and that for the exploration of a railroad route to California. The Light-house bill passed. The Civil and Diplomatic bill came from the Senate with 85 manuscript pages of amendments. A long discussion followed upon adopting these in the aggregate, referring them, or acting upon them separately. The latter course was adopted, and in Committee of the Whole the amendments to increase the salaries of the Vice-President and Secretaries, to appropriate $300,000 to refund duties on goods destroyed by fire in New York, to suspend duties for one year on railroad iron, were voted down. Amid great confusion, that establishing an Assay Office in New York was adopted.

FIFTH-DAY, MARCH 3.

This being the last day of the session, it was continued all night, and till near twelve o'clock, noon, of Sixth-day. It was mainly occupied, of course, in finishing up the business which had been left undone till this late hour. All the regular Appropriation Bills were passed, after numerous Committees of Conference from the Senate and House. Among the appropriations was $100,000 to establish an Assay Office at New York, where the gold daily arriving can hereafter be cast into bars, slugs, or ingots, of specified values. The amendment to the Post-Office Bill, directing the Postmaster-General to advertise for proposals to carry the Mail from San Francisco to Shanghai, was lost. The Senate voted down several propositions to build national vessels, with caloric engines, on the plan of Capt. Ericsson; also a proposal to abolish the Spirit Ration in the Navy. The printing of the Seventh Census was ordered. The Homestead, Bennett's Land Distribution, Pacific Railroad, Navy Reorganization, French Spoliation, and other important bills, failed for want of time for consideration.

SIXTH-DAY, MARCH 4.

The two Houses closed up the business of the 32d Congress at noon, and adjourned sine die. A few minutes later, the Senate was again called to order by the Secretary, for the first sitting of the usual quadrennial Extra Session. After prayer, Mr. Cass, as the oldest Senator, took the Chair, and on motion of Mr. Badger administered the oath of office to fifteen new Senators. Mr. Atchison was chosen president pro tempore, after which followed the inauguration ceremonies. These being completed, the Senate fixed noon as the future hour of meeting, and adjourned to Second-day.

LECTURES ON GEOLOGY.—On the evening of the 3d inst., we attended, at Metropolitan Hall, the first of a series of lectures on Geology, by Dr. Boynton—a gentleman who is recommended as a lecturer by some of the first scholars of the country, and who was invited to give this course by a number of the most distinguished citizens of New York. Our expectations were move them realized, and we are confident that those who attend will get the worth of their time and money.

European News.

European dates to Feb. 23d, eleven days later, have been received since our last. The news is not important.

In the British House of Commons, on Friday night, a discussion on the state of the relations with France was brought on by Mr. Disraeli, and elicited strong assurances of peaceable intentions.

The Navy estimates, amounting to £7,000,000 Sterling, were voted.

Both Houses of the Church Convocation were in session, with a full attendance of Prelates and the Clergy. An address to the Queen on ecclesiastical affairs was presented and discussed. It refers principally to Synodical jurisdiction.

The weather in England was remarkably cold; a great deal of snow had fallen and a severe frost appeared to have set in.

The overland Indian mail reached London on the 14th ult., confirming the annexation of Pegu to the British dominions in India.

The Queen Victoria steamer, belonging to the City of Dublin Steam-packet Company, while on her passage from Liverpool to Dublin, and during a heavy fall of snow, which rendered it impossible to discern anything from the vessel, struck on the rocks to the north of the Bailey Lighthouse, off Howth. She went down in about 15 minutes afterward. Some of the passengers took to the boats, and others endeavored to reach the land. The loss of life amounted to 68 out of a total of 120 on board. One boat with 17 passengers reached the shore; 8 got on the rocks, and a number of others were taken off a mast.

Sir H. L. Bulwer was on board the steamer that exploded on the Rhone lately, and escaped by swimming.

Napoleon the First's will has been given up by England to France.

Thirty ships have been chartered by Paris merchants to bring ice from Sweden to French ports.

The Turkish Commission in Bosnia has issued a firman, granting the same privileges to Christians as to Turks. To balance this, the Greek journals report a massacre of Christians at Salonica.

SUMMARY.

Steamer Pampero, at New Orleans, from San Juan, brings particulars of suffering and death among the passengers on the steamer Columbia, which left Panama with the passengers having through tickets to the Winfield Scott, for which vessel they had waited eight days at Panama. The Columbus sprung aleak in the Gulf of Tehuantepec, and it was only by the unremitting exertions of the passengers and crew that the vessel was got into Acapulco. They were several days without food, and up to the time the Columbus left Acapulco 40 of the passengers had died and a large number were remaining ill.

At Oldtown, Me., on Tuesday evening, while a party were dancing at Grey's tavern, a young lady discharged both barrels of a double-barreled pistol at a man named Wm. Bowman, of Upper Stillwater. One of the balls entered Bowman's shoulder, and the young lady with whom he was dancing had her face burned by the powder. The lady who fired the shots went home without being arrested. Public sympathy is strongly in her favor, as Bowman had inflicted upon her an irreparable wrong, and then refused marriage.

A dispatch dated Philadelphia, March 6, says that on Thursday night the emigrant train coming East ran off the track in a deep cut on the Pennsylvania Road, between Lewistown and Huntingdon. Persons were sent either way to warn trains nearly due of what took place, but the man who was sent west, after walking some distance, sat down in a shanty, and unfortunately fell asleep. The train that passed him came in violent collision with the crippled train, killing four emigrant passengers instantly. Two others died yesterday, and two others are not expected to live.

The Baton Rouge (La.) Gazette says: A negro man, the property of Mr. Isaac Singletary, of this Parish, drowned himself, on the 19th of February, by jumping over the bow of the ferry-boat. It appears that Mr. Singletary had sold or was about to sell the boy to Mr. John Buhler, of the Parish of West Baton Rouge, whom the boy was unwilling to go to, and expressed his intention to drown himself before he would live with Mr. Buhler. While on the ferry, the boy waved his hand—a last adieu to the pilot, and jumped foot foremost into the river.

The late Dr. William Kirkpatrick, Superintendent of the Syracuse Salt Works, was cousin to the grandfather of the Empress of France, the Consul of Malaga. The Kirkpatricks are not a numerous family, and it is said the Empress has quite a number of relatives in America and Scotland, including several in New York City, one of whom, a cousin of the Empress, has recently left for Paris, to join in the good fortune of his cousin.

The Regents of the New York State University have published their annual distribution of the income of the Literature Fund. New York and Brooklyn get the following sums: Deaf and Dumb Institution, $496 65; Columbia College Grammar School, $343 83; University Grammar School, $215 85; Conference Seminary, $806 10, and $250 for books; Free Academy, $1008 58; Rutger's Female Institute, $447; Brooklyn Female Academy, $659 02, and $250 for books.

A cashier of a bank in Lexington, Ky., writes to the Cincinnati Commercial, that a few months since a teller in that bank paid a forged check for the amount of $633, and that on the 24th ult., he received a letter from Archbishop Hughes, of New York, stating that the money was received from Belfast, Ireland, by the last steamer, from an individual with the request that it be forwarded to the above bank.

In the Legislature of New York, last week, Mr. Taber reported a bill to make a Ship Canal from Albany along the west side of the Hudson River to a point below the Overslaugh, so that navigation for any ordinary draft might be secured.

Count Pulzsky, the friend and companion of Kossuth, arrived at New York last week, by steamship Humboldt. He visits this country for a short time only, on private business.

The following steamers left New York on Saturday: The Collins steamship Arctic, Captain Luce, for Liverpool; the Union, Captain Adams, and the Georgia, Captain Porter, for Aspinwall; the Star of the West, Captain Tinklepaugh, for San Juan; the Alabama, Captain Ludlow, for Savannah; the Marion, Captain Berry, for Charleston; and the Roanoke, Captain Cavendy, for Richmond.

The apparatus which was sent out by the British Government, some years ago, for distilling fresh water from Lake Erie, is still in existence at one of the Canadian Navy Yards, and it is an undisputed fact, that all the war vessels intended for the navigation of the lakes in 1812 were well and thoroughly supplied with tanks and casks for containing a full supply of fresh water!

A negro barber in Albany, when partially recovered from the small pox, left his bed and commenced shaving his customers as usual. A young man whom he shaved, and who, it is supposed, caught the infection from the barber, died a few days ago, and one or two others have taken the disease from him. His shop has since been shut up by the city authorities.

There is in one of the country poor houses of Alabama an old man of more than ninety years, who was the ferryman for Washington and his army when he crossed the Delaware just prior to achieving the great victories of Trenton and Princeton. This is a sad truth. Better provision should be made for the veteran and his wife who shares his humble lot.

Among the last acts of the recently adjourned Congress, was the raising of the salaries of the Vice-President and seven members of the Cabinet to $8,000 each. The four missions to Great Britain, France, Russia, and Spain, were raised from $9,000 to $20,000 each.

The report of the Indiana Insane Asylum shows that "spirit rapping" is a fruitful cause of insanity in that State. During the past year eighteen persons have been admitted whose insanity is ascribed to this cause. The reports from nearly all the insane asylums tell the same story.

Gen. Levi Hubbell, formerly of Ithaca, N. Y., now of Milwaukie, Wisconsin, and a District Judge, was arraigned before the Wisconsin Legislature, on the report of a Committee, charging him with flagrant corruption in his Judicial conduct in several specified cases. The Assembly impeached him on Friday, March 4th.

The contract for building the Alleghany Railroad has been awarded to Leech & Co., Messrs. Chamberlain, and a New York Company. The route chosen lies on the easterly side of the Alleghany River. The guage adopted is that of the New York and Erie Railroad.

The work of grading on the Watertown and Potsdam Railroad has been commenced. The probability is that the track will be in running order from Watertown to Philadelphia, or Antwerp, in the course of one year from this time.

About one hundred letters, addressed to Bostonians, and supposed to contain money, were stolen from the mail agent's office on board the steamer Commodore on her trip from New York, on Friday evening, to Stonington.

Among the ruins of a stable which was burned at Lawrence, Mass., on Friday morning, were found the charred remains of a man supposed to have been murdered. Indentification was impossible.

"Father Giovazzi," so called, a seceder from the Romish Church, arrived at New York on the 6th inst., by the steamer Baltic.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses; Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

American Baptist Register.

THIS Volume, now issued, contains 496 pages; or, reckoning the 26 engravings as two pages each, 548 pages. It is printed on beautiful paper, and embraces (including the ornamental stamp on the cover) engravings of 27 church and college edifices. The sketches of State Conventions, Associations alphabetically arranged, names of churches, dates of constitution, counties in which located, pastors, the baptized in 1851, number of communicants, with the names and post-offices of ordained and licensed ministers, fill 373 pages. These are followed by the American Indian churches, also the Welsh and German churches. Summary tables of the Associations in each State, (the most complete we have ever seen,) fill 26 pages. These are followed by valuable tables, embracing a comparative summary, colored members, Sabbath schools, ratio of churches, ministers and members to the whole population, Baptist periodicals, ordinations, churches constituted, new church buildings dedicated, and obituary notices. Then follows the educational department, embracing theological seminaries, colleges, academies, high schools, &c. Also an account of our Benevolent Societies. Next we find tables of the Baptist churches in other countries, British Provinces, Europe, Asia, and Africa. The concluding pages contain an account of the Anti-Mission, Free-Will, Six-Principle, Seventh-day Baptists, &c., with a grand summary of baptized Christians and religious denominations.

No description of the volume will do it justice. It must be seen to form a correct idea of the expense and labor bestowed upon it. In view of the expensiveness of so many statistical pages, its engravings, &c., it is one of the cheapest volumes ever issued. It contains 200 pages more than was anticipated when the price was announced.

Price, bound in cloth or sheep, $1 50; five copies, $6. It will be sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, for $2.

Published by the American Baptist Publication Society. Orders for the Register should be directed to Rev. [illegible] B. Loxley, 118 Arch-street, Philadelphia.

Just Published.

THE DEMOC[illegible]ACY OF CHRISTIANITY, or an Analysis of the Bi[illegible]le and its Doctrines, in their relation to the principle of de[illegible]ocracy. By WM. GOODELL. Sold also by William Cady and Burgess, New York[illegible] New York. The first Harned, 48 Beekman-street, N[illegible]ation of the Old volume is occupied with an exami[illegible] investigation Testament; the second volume carries th[illegible]ding doctrines into the New, shows the bearing of the le[illegible] trines of the Gospel upon the principle of demo[illegible]cracy, examines the institutions of the New Testament, trac[illegible] the progress and the influence of Christianity in promoting human liberty, to the present time, and, in the light of Scripture prophecy, as illustrated by the signs of the times, unfolds the future prospects of humanity. The work is designed to promote liberty, both in the Church and the State, and to show that the cause of human freedom is identified with the Christian religion.

Price $1 50 at retail, $12 per dozen, or $90 per hundred.

SLAVERY AND ANTI-SLAVERY: A History of the Great Struggle in Both Hemispheres; with a View of the Slavery Question in the United States. By WILLIAM GOODELL, author of "The Democracy of Christianity."

This work is designed to embody a great amount of historical information in a single volume, conveniently arranged for reference. It contains fifty chapters on as many distinct topics, embracing the most important facts in the political and ecclesiastical history of the contest, together with an account of the Anti-Slavery agitation in England and the United States up to the present time; the divisions among American Abolitionists, and the various measures advocated among them; and closing with a brief discussion of the question, "What ought to be done?" The book is an abstract of several volumes, besides the Anti-Slavery history of the last twenty years, a great part of which has never before been collected into any volume, but lies scattered in the newspapers of that period. The Table of Contents and a copious Alphabetical Index will facilitate a reference to particular facts, and to dates when desirable.

It is a large royal 12mo. volume, of about six hundred pages, well printed, on handsome paper, neatly bound in cloth, and lettered. Price one dollar per copy, at retail; $9 per dozen, or $65 per hundred, to booksellers and book pedlars, for cash.

The postage on a single copy will be 30 cents to any part of the United States, and must be prepaid.

For sale by the publisher, WILLIAM HARNED, 48 Beekman-street, New York.

Miscellaneous.

Another Arctic Expedition.

The Tribune learns that the organization of Dr. Kane's expedition is now nearly complete, and that it may be expected to sail by the middle of April. In addition to the brig Advance, the expedition will carry out a smaller vessel in frame, ready to be put together when necessary. It takes also, five whale-boats, two boats made of cedar, and four gutta-percha boats, which can also be used as sledges. On the upper coast of Greenland, 48 dogs will also be added to the party. The scientific corps will consist of three gentlemen, beside Dr. Kane himself, who will not only discharge the duties of Commander of the expedition, but will also share in its scientific observations and labors. There will be an astronomer, who will coöperate with Dr. K. in all matters relating to general physics; a zoologist, who will pay particular attention to the observation of the radiata and lower orders of marine life, the products of the dredge being especially cared for; and a general draughtsman. The expedition takes out a transit instrument, and will it is hoped be able to establish a permanent observatory at the head of Smith's Sound during the whole time that the Advance remains in that region. The sailing officers will be Meeker Brooks, McGeary, John Ward Wilson, and Amos Bonsall, all volunteers. Mr. Brooks was the boatswain of the former expedition. Mr. McGeary has been in Baffin's Bay on whailing expeditions, has been wrecked there and knows the coast thoroughly. Messrs. Wilson and Bonsall are sailors by taste and habit, but gentlemen of position and fortune, who go out from a love of adventure. The crew consists of eleven picked men, stalwart fellows from Maine. Each man has one of Marston's rifles with a due supply of ammunition, as they will have to rely on hunting for fresh meat for themselves, and food for their dogs during the whole time of their stay in high Northern latitudes. The supply of food taken out will consist of Borden's Meat Biscuit and pemmican. The Navy Department has ordered Dr. Kane to receive on board any articles of diet that victualers or others may desire to send for trial, and on his return to report the result of the experiment made with each article. Dr. Kane has also been directed by the Department to prepare a detailed report of the scientific observations and results of the expedition, for publication by the Government on his return. Among the great subjects to which his attention is particularly directed by his orders, is the distribution of magnetism, and the question of the existence and extent of an open sea about the pole.

The Anglo-Saxons.

Theodore Parker, of Boston, delivered a lecture in New York, Feb. 22d, on the Character and Influence of the Anglo-Saxons; from a report of which, we clip the following:

The Anglo-Saxon race numbers from about forty to fifty millions of people at the present time, and they have more commerce than the rest of the world—they possess the one-eighth part of the globe, and the American and British Governments control the one-sixth part of its inhabitants. See the difference in the countries which they colonize. Look at North America, covered with Anglo-Saxon inhabitants and their descendants, and then look at South America, which is inhabited by the descendants of the Spaniards. Look at the cultivation, the produce, and the riches of the one, and then at the poverty, squalidness, and misery of the other. If we compare the state of Para on the Amozon with New Orleans at the mouth of the Mississippi, we will be able to see this the more plainly, and to trace the great prosperity of the latter to the predominating characteristics of this dreadful Anglo-Saxon race, which, by its desire for federation, has become the most powerful of any on the face of the earth. He did not mean military power, but the power which was produced by Commerce, for no other race had the same aptitude of organizing men into groups, and they could not, consequently, with the like facility, transact such an immense amount of business. They were truly a trading, a commercial people, and the dollar was the symbol of the Anglo-Saxon as truly as the sword was the symbol of the ancient Roman. Neither is the descendant of the Anglo-Saxon race very fond of universality—whatever is practicable and useful is more consonant with his ideas and disposition. He knows there is a God—he acknowledges him as the Supreme Ruler, and delights more in his individual independence and freedom than submission to any particular forms of worship which may have been established for him. Though religious, he has no higher-law veneration. We will see this feeling exemplified in the conduct of the first Puritan settlers of Connecticut, who resolved in public assembly, that "the law of God should be the law of the State until they could have time to form a better law." The Anglo-Saxon abhors a universal idea—he loves to deal will tangible things, and with things useful, more than any thing else. In this he differs from the Germanic branch. The English cultivates and deals in things which will produce profit, while the German will ponder over the general idea; and thus, while the latter is generalizing on principles and theories, the former turns men into practical things. Mr. Farraday had to explain to the people of England, that the science of Chemistry was profitable, and if properly encouraged would be the means of producing great wealth, before he could get them to listen to him; while Mr. Liebig was accused by his countrymen of pursuing that profession from a sordid motive of base lucre. The English have the idea of the loaves and fishes predominant, and none can become great among them who will not bring them these; while it is different with the Germans; and before Liebig could gain the confidence or respect of his countrymen, he was forced to disclaim the intention of pursuing his labors from any desire of profit, but merely from the pleasurable ideas to which they gave rise; so the very conduct which makes a man respected in England would disgrace him in Germany. The Anglo-Saxon great man is a doer, while the great German only thinks—is always thinking, and thinks about thinking. This indeed will be found to be the great difference between the two people, and which does not always turn out to the advantage of the Anglo-Saxon man. Their institutions are full of contradictions, and contain none, or at least few, general principles. Their laws consist of a whole host of decisions, and are consequently cumbersome and difficult. Unlike the Roman or French laws, which are founded on original and general principles, and are consequently simple and easily understood, when we come to the English law, we find it to consist of the decision of Lord somebody, which goes against the decision of Lord anotherbody, and both are qualified by another decision of Lord this or that; and after this there is a decision of Baron anybody, explaining this qualified decision, and then the decision of Baron somebody else, which knocks all those gone-before and learned decisions to pieces. Some will say that the Constitution of the United States is a proof that this is not a character of the English mode of legislation; but that Constitution is not of Anglo-Saxon growth, or the production of Anglo-Saxon minds, for the principles and ideas and ground-work of that Constitution were received from the great writers of the continent of Europe. An exemplifying proof of the individuality of the Anglo-Saxon race will be found in the present condition of Britain; for though England is the richest country in the world, that is, if the wealth which it contains was divided among the number of its inhabitants, yet every sixteenth man is a pauper. He becomes destitute, is sent to the poor-house, lives at the expense of the public, and when he dies, at the public expense he is interred. The British nobility are the best fed, best housed, best clothed, and best carriaged people in the world; while the people engaged in agricultural pursuits and labors, and employed in factories, are the most miserably fed, the most barbarously treated, cruelly worked and badly housed and clad of any other people in the whole compass of the civilized world. The aristocracy are the most learned and enlightened of any other people in the world, as well as the most refined; and they ought to be so, for they have the two greatest seats of learning, and the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge are the most richly endowed of any others that we know; but their peasantry are the most besotted and ignorant of any in Europe. In England there is no universal idea—the great idea cherished there is individuality, and this is the substratum of everything, the foundation of every superstructure, and flames out at the roof. This has caused an immense amount of property to be concentrated in particular families or individuals. The Russell family alone possess four miles square in the heart of the City of London, on which are built four hundred thousand houses and more. The head man of business of one of the Lords of this class, I have known to advertise for three thousand hands to erect buildings within the city and the environs of Westminster. One who lives ten miles from the sea, travels to it from his own house without putting a foot-print off of his own property. Rhode Island contains more proprietors, and Long Island more persons who possess an interest in property, than the entire of Great Britain.

The Slave Nancy.

A few years since, says the Cincinnati Gazette, a bright-eyed mulatto woman, the slave of a gentleman residing in Anson Co., North Carolina, fled to the Free States, which, after unusual hardships, and the exercise of more heroism than is generally attributed to her race, she succeeded in reaching. She left behind a husband, who was also a slave, belonging to a Mrs. K., of the same county. To this husband Nancy was strongly attached, and though she was well situated in this State, could give herself no peace until she had resolved to return and attempt his rescue. The long and weary journey to her old home was made on foot, and by night Arrived near the residence of her husband's. mistress, she lay concealed for more than a week in the mountains, before she could procure an interview. But her husband lacked courage. He dared not risk the attempt to flee; and it was several weeks before this black Macbeth's courage could be "screwed to the sticking"—or rather to the running—"point." At last he fled, and had nearly reached the Cumberland Gap, when he was overtaken and captured.

His mistress, by the way, was willing he should escape, but she was in fear of her heirs, who, indeed, were the parties that chased and captured the slave. Nancy escaped and returned to Cincinnati. The aged mistress of the fugitive was so affected by the devotion of Nancy, and the desire of the husband to be reunited, that she conceived the idea of herself running off with her own slave, for the purpose of bringing him to a free state. The preparations were made with the greatest secrecy, and carried out with so much skill and prudence, that she succeeded, and lately passed through this city, on her way to the residence of Nancy, who is now living with her husband. The old lady left what property she had, besides this slave, in North Carolina, and has made no attempt to regain it. She is now permanently settled in this State, and is supported by the charity of her neighbors.

Sale of Slaves in Washington.

From the National Era.

"Piano-Forte, household and kitchen Furniture, Negro Boy, Horses, Harness, Carryall, Carts, Farming Utensils &c., at auction, on Saturday morning, December 11, at 11 o'clock, in front of the auction rooms. I shall sell without reserve, &c., at 12 o'clock: One Negro Boy, 18 years of age; also, a Negro Girl, three Horses, Saddles, Bridles and Harness, Carryall, two Carts, Wheelbarrow, Hay-rake, two Plows, Cultivator, Hay-cart, lot of farm Harness, &c. Terms cash.

JAMES C. MCGUIRE, Auctioneer."

The above advertisement appeared in the National Intelligencer for several days prior to the sale. Pursuant thereto, a crowd collected at the corner of Pennsylvania-av. and Tenth-st., on Saturday morning. After the sale of horses, cows and farming utensils, the human cattle were put up, viz: a boy, — years old, and a girl, — years old.

On putting up the boy, the auctioneer said that he would give any man $25 if he would relieve him of the disagreeable duty of selling those children. No one offering to relieve him, he proceeded to sell them. He stated that he was informed that the boy was restricted to the District, which he believed was the fact; that the boy was deaf, had a running in his head, and was an invalid; that he was the pet of his mother, who was present, in great distress, and desired; as did also the relatives of the family to whom he belonged, not to be separated from him. These children were part of the estate of Jesse Brown, deceased, late proprietor of "Brown's Hotel;" and it was known that Marshall Brown (one of the heirs) was present for the purpose of buying the boy, if sold at a reasonable price, that he might not be separated from his mother. The bidding commenced, and he was struck off to Mr. Brown at $325, when a man by the name of Naylor, a trader, claimed the bid as his, and insisted upon the negro being struck off to him. Mr. Brown averred that the bid was his, and claimed the boy; Naylor threatened to prosecute the auctioneer if he did not get him. After much caviling among the bidders, the boy was again put up, and this man Naylor advanced the bid to $330, when the auctioneer, prompted by feelings of humanity, offered him $25 if he would not bid more. This offer was accepted, with the Chrisian remark, that he (Naylor) "had as lief make $25 in this way as to make it out of a nigger." So the $25 was paid over, and the poor trembling boy was delivered to Mr. Brown.

The girl, only 16 years of age, was next put up, and in the presence of her agonized mother, was struck off to Judge Sturgis, of Georgia, for the sum of $—; and this child is now probably on her way to that distant State, where she will most likely drag out a miserable existence in the cotton field, without a single friend on whom to rely in case of sickness or distress.

This all took place in a Christian community, within half a mile of the Capital of this free and enlightened nation, where sat, at the very time this disgraceful scene was going on, the Representatives of a people whose laws are based on the principle of equal rights and privileges, and who have declared "that all men are created free and equal!"

A Wild Man.

A wild man named Goings, originally from East Tennesee, who has been living in the hollow of trees and caves, and who has frequently been mentioned in the newspapers, was recently captured near Florence, Alabama. He is from 25 to 30 years of age. He had been surprised several times by parties, and tales of romantic encounters with him were deemed fabulous heretofore. Last December an attempt was made to capture him, but he eluded his pursuers, and forsook his then quarters in the hollow of a chesnut tree. A pack of hounds afterwards got on his trail, but owing to the rugged character of the country, the horsemen could not keep up, and the fugitive was lost in the waters of Shoal Creek. All further pursuit was then abandoned, and many believed the whole story fabulous, until last Sunday week, a boy, belonging to A. P. Neely, reported, to his master that he had seen a man upon the bluffs near a noted cave, on the plantation of Judge Posey. Mr. Neely immediately collected a number of gentlemen, and proceeded to the spot indicated. The day was one of the most inclement of the season. On nearing the mouth of the cave, they discovered the shivering form of the poor wretch, buried beneath a covering of straw. He paid no attention to their summons to come forth, and one of the company (thoughtlessly, we hope) tossed in a dog, which, making a furious assault, brought the hapless Recluse to his feet. He then came out in a state of almost perfect nudity, presenting a picture of abject misery and squalid wretchedness, which utterly beggars all description, and we shall not attempt it. He appeared perfectly sane, but gave no satisfactory reasons for his singular conduct, beyond a general charge that the world had treated him badly, and he had determed to come out from it. He protested that he had done no man harm, and begged to be allowed to continue his solitary life, but he finally agreed to go home with Mr. Eastrage, which he did, and when we last heard of him he was suffering from a violent cold, contracted no doubt by his sudden change from a worse than savage to a civilized life.

State Asylum for Idiots.

From the Albany Journal.

About half way between here and Troy stands a house that used to be a famous rendexvous for races, fairs sleighing parties, drinking, and all manner of merry-making—the old "Bull's Head" Tavern. Two years ago the sign of the Bull's Head was taken down, and the place sold to the State of New York.

If you go there now, you will find a plain, unpretending, dark-colored edifice, everything about which is kept with the most scrupulous neatness. You enter, and you find blackboards, pictures, books, dumb-bells, ladders, and other apparatus, indicating that it is either a school, or a gymnasium, or both. And so it is. But there is a strange set of scholars. Boys with the vacant, lackluster stare of confirmed lunatics. Girls with a look of senseless animal imbecility. Children on whose faces there has never been a ray of intelligence; and nearly grown-up young men and women engaged in the occupations and plays of children five or six years old. Their instructors have a watchful, care-worn look, as if they knew their charges could not be trusted to perform even the simplest avocations without constant help and guardianship. It is the State Asylum for Idiots.

From the Annual Report of the Institution, just issued, we learn that there are now forty-two pupils under treatment. Applications have been made for the admission of nearly as many more, but were refused because there was no room for them.

During the time this experiment has been in operation, its results have been of the most gratifying character—far more gratifying than could have been anticipated. Three years ago it was a matter of serious doubt, whether it was possible ever to educate this unfortunate class of beings, so as to be of any use to themselves or others. Now, it may be considered demonstrated beyond a doubt. By a system of gradual training, first in physical exercises, then by slow steps to simple mental exertion, they are led finally to a knowledge of duties, responsibilities, and the truths of religion.

To use the words of the Superintendent, "We have taught a child to walk when we had first to awaken or cultivate a fear of falling as an incentive to any efforts on her part. We have awakened perceptions of sounds in ears where the sense of hearing resided without the use of it. We have developed perceptions of sight through eyes that had never performed their appropriate office. We have been teaching children to speak in every stage of articulation." Cases that three years since only promised to be hopeless, helpless burdens to their friends all their lives, have been elevated to the rank of happy, useful members of society.

"In almost all cases, and with very few if any exceptions, those usually called idiots under the age of 12 or 15, may be so trained and instructed as to rendered them useful to themselves, and fitted to learn some of the ordinary trades, or to engage in agriculture. Their minds and souls can be developed so that they may become responsible beings, acquainted with their relations to their Creator and a future state, and their obligations to obey the laws and respect the rights of their fellow citizens. In all cases, we believe, for we have seen what has been accomplished in apparently desperate cases, they can be made cleanly and neat in their personal habits, and enabled to enjoy the bounties of Providence and the comforts of life, and to cease being incumbrances and annoyances to the families in in which they reside."

Occupations of the Royal Children.

The following details of the manner in which the day is filled up by the children of Queen Victoria are given by the Field, a new sporting paper, "on reliable authority." They rise early, breakfast at eight, and dine at two. The various occupations are allotted out with almost military exactness. One hour finds them engaged in the study of the ancient, another of the modern authors—their acquaintanceship of languages being first founded on a thorough knowledge of their grammatical construction, and afterward familiarized and perfected by conversation. Next they are trained in those military exercises which give dignity and bearing. Another hour is agreeably filled up with the lighter accomplishments of music and dancing. Again the little party assemble in the riding school, where they may be seen deeply interested in the various evolutions of the manege. Thence, while drawing and the further exercise of music and the lighter accomplishments call off the attention of their sisters, the young princes proceed to busily engage themselves in a carpenter's shop, fitted up expressly for them, with tools essential to a perfect knowledge of the craft. They thus early become not only theoretically but practically acquainted with the useful arts of life; a small laboratory is occasionally brought into requisition, at the instance of their father. This done, the young carpenters and students throw down their saws and axes, unbuckle their philosophy, and shoulder their miniature percussion guns—which they handle with the dexterity of practical sportsmen—for a shooting stroll through the royal gardens. The evening meal, the preparation for the morning lessons, and brief religious instruction, close the day.

Australian Wines.

The progress of this branch of industry will be shown by a glance at the statistical returns of the last seven years. In 1845 there were 611 acres of vineyards under cultivation throughout the colony, producing 54,996 gallons of wine, and 1,433 gallons of brandy. In 1846 the quantity of land under vine was 749 acres, and its production was 52,337 gallons of wine, and 1,382 gallons of brandy. In 1847 there were 899 acres of vineyards, producing 54,035 gallons of wine and 1,402 gallons of brandy. In 1848 there were 887 acres of vineyards, producing 97,300 gallons of wine and 1,163 gallons of brandy. In 1849 there were 963 acres of vineyards, producing 95,843 gallons of wine and 1,266 gallons of brandy. In 1850 there were 1,069¾ acres of vineyards, producing 111,085 gallons of wine and 1,958 gallons of brandy; and in 1851, there were 1,860½ acres of vineyards, producing 84,843 gallons of wine and 1,161 gallons of brandy. One of the greatest difficulties which the manufacturers of the Australian wine have had to contend against of late has been that of procuring bottles, and they now have under consideration the propriety of establishing a bottle-factory. This, however, is a difficulty which would not affect the producers of light cheap wines for immediate consumption, as those wines would need no bottling.

THE WONDERS OF OMNIBUS TRAFFIC.—There are daily plying through the streets of London 3,000 omnibuses, each carrying 300 passengers daily, or 2,000 a week, which makes for the entire omnibuses 6,000,000 a week, or the enormous number of 300,000,000 passengers a year. An omnibus coachman driving an omnibus sixty miles a day—which is below the average—although he may not drive a greater distance than five miles each journey, yet passing the same ground over and over again, he would in the course of seven years perform the extraordinary distance of 173,880 miles, or 521,640 miles in twenty-one years, which several coachmen have done without varying their route—say from Chelsea to the Bank. The manual labor employed comprises the following: Coachmen and conductors, 6,000; horse keepers, 3,000; occasional drivers and hangers-on, 2,000; total, 11,000. The value of the metropolitan omnibus establishments is estimated at £962,000, viz: horses worth £600,000; omnibuses, £300,000; harness, £6,000; and sundries, £2,000. The expenditure £787,000 for corn, £225,000 for straw, £750,000 for hay, and £7,800 for horse-shoeing; to which are added £156,000 for wear and tear, and £180,000 for harness, exclusive of stabling and its accidentals. The government duty, at three halfpence per mile, amounts to £393,756.

YOUNG AMERICA.—Mr. M'Kay, of East Boston, has now on the stocks the longest, sharpest, and largest ship in the known world, and has named her Young America. Her keel is 310 feet long; the vessel will be 330 feet long on deck, will have 53 feet breadth of beam, 30 feet depth of hold, with three decks, and will register over 4,000 tuns. The frames are placed close together and bolted fore and aft, and will be diagonally cross-braced with iron, like the Collins steamers, and every other means of strength will be used to make her a perfect ship. Her model is said by competent judges to be the most perfect specimen of naval architecture ever produced by Mr. M'Kay, and she is expected to prove the swiftest in the world. She will have four masts, the after one fore-and-aft rigged, and the others square-rigged, with double topsails. The yards on the fore and mainmast will be alike, and on the mizzenmast will correspond with the yards above the lower topsail yards on the other masts. In rig as well as model all the improvements of the day will be introduced. Mr. M'Kay builds her on his own account, and intends to place his brother, now captain of the Sovereign of the Seas, in command of her. She will cost about $300,000.

THE TERM YANKEE.—Mr. Gustavus Austin gives in the Hartford Courant a new definition of the term Yankee, thus: Would you know the origin of the word Yankee? I will tell thee friend. There were once several tribes of Indians on the shores of Narraganset Bay within the bounds of Rhode Island. They had numerous battles with each other, and one tribe finally succeeded in conquering all the rest and putting them under tribute, were called in the Indian tongue Yankees, or Conquerors. The English, settling in Rhode Island soon after, conquered this tribe, and were called Yankoos, or Conquerors of the Conquerors—a dignified title, shared by all New England, in which Suffield takes the lead and stands Yankoo!

THE MASSACHUSETTS TRUANT LAW.—By a law of Massachusetts, the authorities of towns and cities are empowered to arrest and punish all boys who absent themselves from school and spend their time in idleness about the streets or elsewhere. The law works well, and wherever it has been executed the results are beneficial to truant boys and to society. Boston is divided into three districts under this law, and an officer is appointed in each to look after vagrant children. In September, October, and November, three officers arrested 625 truant children, who were dealt with according to their desert by the Courts. Confirmed truants, of whom there were 191, were sent to the House of Reformation, Schools of Reform, or Farm Schools; others to Charity Schools, or to the Alms-House. The majority of the young offenders were induced to attend school punctually. The decrease of crime among the juvenile population, it is believed, will be one of the excellent results of this system.

AS GOOD AS IF IT WERE IN ÆSOP.—The Nantucket Islander says the following story was lately told by a reformed inebriate as an apology for much of the folly of drunkards: A mouse ranging about a brewery, happening to fall into a vat of beer, was in imminent danger of drowning, and appealed to a cat to help him out. The cat replied, "It is a foolish request, for as soon as I get you out, I shall eat you." The mouse piteously replied that would be far better than to be drowned in beer. The cat lifted him out, but the fume of the beer caused puss to sneeze, and the mouse took refuge in a hole. The cat called upon the mouse to come out, "Did you not promise that I should eat you?" "Ah!" replied the mouse, "I did, but I was in liquor at the time!"

VARIETY.

Ericsson's only brother is the most distinguished engineer in Sweden. He has lately completed a massive and magnificent sluice or lock of marble, which unites the fresh-water harbor on one side of Stockholm with the salt-water on the other, and is now engaged, at the request of the Emperor of Russia, in building a canal to connect the interior lakes of Finland with the Baltic. The house in which these two brothers were born has been purchased by the Swedish Government for preservation as a public monument.

The number of Cigars manufactured in Cuba baffles statistics. Cabargo makes 3,000,000 a year, taking great pains in flushing them. There are other establishments rolling out from 5,000,000 to 7,000,000. And notwithstanding a full tobacco crop this year, cigars have risen in price, within the last three weeks, from three to five dollars a thousand. The cigars are made in the city, chiefly, by men and boys, and there is a good deal of art in the manipulation of a good cigar. Much depends on laying the grain of leaf the right way.

Near Fontery aux Roses (France) a gentleman, who was devoting his leisure to statuary, committed suicide under the following circumstances: He was engaged in the completion of a Leda in marble, which he considered his chef d'œuvre. In giving the last touch to the composition, he broke the swan's beak, which formed part of the group. The artist was plunged from this accident into a state of the most profound despair. He abstained from seeing his friends, and kept himself constantly confined to his house; after a few days he put an end to his life.

The Columbia (Tenn.) Intelligencer tells of, perhaps, the most remarkable family in the United States, who reside in Maury County, the head of which is Mr. John Kennedy, living about eight miles north of that place. He has eighteen children living, seventy-four grandchildren, and fifty-one great grand-children—in all, one hundred and forty-three! There has not been a single death in the family since the year 1806.

"The annual loss of human life from tigers, at Singapore," says Capt. Keppel, "chiefly among the Chinese settlers, is perfectly fearful, averaging no fewer than 360, or one per diem. Great exertions are still making for the destruction of these animal, which is effected by pitfalls, cages baited with a goat, dog, monkey, or other restless animals, and by sundry cunning contrivances."

When a man gets mad and stops his paper, he always borrows the next number of his neighbor, to see if the withdrawal of his patronage hasn't killed the editor and dressed the columns in mourning. This grows out of the fact that none try to show their spite in this way, but the kind of people who imagine that the world rests on their shoulders.

Le Phare de New York tells a story of an old man, eighty years of age, who died lately at Bayonne, (France,) and for the last forty years has slept in a stable on a lock of straw, and derived his subsistence by holding the asses of the peasants who came to Market. After his death 1,786 francs were found belonging to him, which he had saved sou by sou.

There are three kinds of men in this world—the "Wills," the Won'ts," and the "Can'ts." The former effect everything. "I will," builds our railroads and steamboats. "I won't," don't believe in experiments and nonsense; while "I can't," grows weeds for wheat, and commonly ends his days in the slow digestion of a court of bankruptcy.

A letter has been lying in the South Boston Sub-Post-Office for some days, post-marked New York, and directed to the "Handsomest Girl in South Boston." No personal application has yet been made for it, though it has been sent for several times. The Postmaster reserves the privilege of judging as to the respective merits of any claimants that may appear.

The whole number of persons convicted of crime in the United States for the year ending the first day of June, 1850, was about 27,000, of whom 13,000 were natives, and 14,000 foreigners. The whole number in prison, at that time, was about 6,700, of whom 4,300 were natives and 2,400 foreigners.

Mr. Daniel Stall, living near Rome, Oneida Co., N. Y., was shot in the back, accidentally, by a man who was out hunting with him on Thursday last. The Rome Sentinel says: "Stall is the same man whose head was mistaken for a squirrel last year, and received a ball from the gun of a friend."

The strife with evil never ceases. We are afloat in a leaky ship, and must keep pumping to keep from going down.

The surest way to improve one's condition is to improve one's self.

DEDICATION OF CHILDREN.

BY WILLIAM M. FAHNESTOCK, M. D.

Its Nature--Concluded.

Having exhibited, and I trust successfully, the difference between proselytism and discipleship, by showing that proselytism, under the ancient dispensation, was more a nominal adhesion to the nation of Israel, than conversion to their religion, and that Christian discipleship differs from it, in being a vital exercise of conscientious belief; I now adduce some additional testimony, to fortify my position in reference to the absolute necessity of volition and cognition to true discipleship; and this I propose to do by the expressed sentiments of some of the most distinguished Pædobaptist writers, themselves, as collated by J. S. C. F. Frey, the convert from Judaism.

"We assert, that our Lord enjoins two different things upon his disciples, to teach and to baptize—Maccovius, Loci Com. p. 823. In the primitive church, instruction preceded baptism, agreeably to the order of Jesus Christ; go teach all nations, baptizing them—Saurin, Ser. t. 1, p. 301. In Matth. 28: 19, our Lord speaks not concerning infants, but adults, who are capable of instruction—Gomarus, Opera Theolog. p. 148. They could not make disciples, unless by teaching; by that instruction were disciples brought to the faith before they were baptized—Limborch, Inst. l. 5, c. 67, § 7. Because Christ requires teaching before baptizing, and will have believers only admitted to baptism, baptism does not seem rightly administered, except faith precede—Calvin, in Harm. Evang. Comment. ad loc. By the disciples of Christ, I intend them, and them only, who profess faith in his person and doctrine, and to hear him or be guided by him alone, in all things that appertain unto the worship of God, and their living unto him—Owen, Inq. into the orig. Nature of Churches, p. 120. A disciple of Christ is one that will take him for the great prophet of the church, and will learn of him as of the Christ. None are disciples but upon the account of either saving faith, or the possession of it—Baxter, Disput. of Right to Sac. pp. 95, 183. There are some duties of worship that imply a profession of God's covenant, whose very nature and design is an exhibition of those vital, active principles and inward exercises, wherein the condition of the covenant of grace consists; such are the Christian sacraments, whose very design is to make and confirm a profession of and compliance with that covenant, and whose very nature is to exhibit or express those uniting acts of the soul—Jonathan Edwards. Without faith, water baptism cannot by any means be lawful; for the command is, believe first, then also, and not otherwise, be baptized—Hoornbeekius, Socin. Confut. t. 3, p. 389. Faith and repentance were the great things required of those that were admitted to baptism. This was the practice of John, this the practice of the apostles, in the history of their ministry—Watts. What the action itself enjoined is, and what the manner and form thereof, is apparent by the words of our Lord's institution; going forth, saith he, teach or disciple all nations, baptizing them; the action is baptizing or immersing in water; the object thereof, those persons of any nation whom his ministers can by their instruction or persuasion render disciples; that is, such as do sincerely believe the truth of his doctrine, and sincerely resolve to obey his commands—Barrow, Works, vol. 1, p. 518."*

I need not enter into an argument, or analysis of the facts, to show the utter fallacy of tracing "infant baptism" to the days of the Apostles, or to the primitive church immediately after the inspired men of the Scriptures; for the concessions of the Pædobaptists are so abundant, that my only difficulty is to restrain myself within proper bounds in making a few selections from their acknowledgments. "We have not in Scripture either precept or example of children baptized—Cawdrey, in Tombes' Antipædo. Baptism, part 2, p. 84. Among all the persons that are recorded as baptized by the apostles, there is no express mention of any infant; there is no express mention, indeed, of any children baptized by him, i. e. John the Baptist—Dr. Wall, Introd. Hist. Inft. Bapt. It cannot be proved by the Sacred Scriptures, that Infant Baptism was instituted by Christ, or begun by the first Christians after the apostles—Luther. We do freely confess, that there is neither express precept nor precedent, in the New Testament, for the baptizing of infants—Fuller, (Episcopalian,) Answer to Dr. Priestley, Address on the Lord's Supper, p. 7. Infant baptism was not practiced until the third century; nor enjoined as necessary till four hundred years after Christ—Danverse, on Baptism, p. 105. It is, indeed, certain, that Pædobaptism was practiced in the second century, (clinical probably,) yet so that it was not the custom of the church, nor the general practice, much less was it generally esteemed necessary, that infants should be baptized—Venema, Hist. Eccles. t. 3, § 108. In the first plantation of Christianity amongst the Gentiles, such only as were of full age, after they were instructed in the principles of the Christian religion, were admitted to baptism—Dr. Holland, in Dr. Wall's Hist. Inft. Bapt. p. 281. The primitive church did not baptize infants; and the learned Grotius proves it in his Annotations on the Gospel—M. De la Roque."†

To this astounding testimony, for astounding it must prove to some of my Pædobaptist readers, who have always been taught that "infant baptism" had its origin in the days of the apostles—and what descends from the apostles must be right—I shall only add, that the frank and truthful Neander traces the innovation of "infant baptism" to Irenæus, and shows, clearly, that Tertullian opposed it strenuously; and thus it will be seen, that the grounds upon which "infant baptism" is assumed, and the authority for its apostolic origin, fall together.

To these frank admissions, which might be multiplied ad libitum, I proceed to adduce a few extracts from the admissions of Pædobaptist writers, in reference to the baptism of some distinguished personages in the early church; which may aid to set this subject in its proper light, with such persons as rely on that kind of testimony to establish their faith—a position, I candidly confess, I decidedly oppose, and never resort to, but to beat an opponent with his own weapons. Lawson informs us, "that Augustine, the son of the virtuous Monica, being instructed in the faith, was not baptized till about the thirtieth year of his age. Ambrose, born of Christian parents, was instructed in Christian principles, but remained unbaptized till he was chosen Bishop of Milan. Jerome, born of Christian parents, was baptized when about thirty years of age. Nectarius was made Bishop of Constantinople before he was baptized. * * * The doctrine of Fidus concerning dipping or sprinkling children, was new and seemed strange to Cyprian; seeing he could not certify and confirm the same without the sentence and advice of sixty-six bishops. Had it been commanded by Christ, practiced by the apostles, and continued in manner and matter to Cyprian's days, there had not been a necessity for the concurrence of so many bishops concerning the same—Baptismalogia, pp. 75, 87. Bishop Taylor says: "St. Ambrose, St. Hierom, and St. Austin, were born of Christian parents, and yet not baptized until the full age of man or more—In Dr. Wall's Hist. Inft. Bapt. p. 2. The famous Austin, in his Confessions, having said, "I was then signed with the sign of his (Christ's) cross, and was seasoned with salt, so soon as I came out my mother's womb, who greatly trusted in thee;" his translator, Dr. W. Watts, has the following note upon it: "This was the practice of the primitive times, by which religious parents devoted their children unto Christ, long before their baptism, which, in those days, was deferred until they could answer for themselves"—Confes. b. 1, p. 17. Gregory Nazianzen, born in the year three hundred and eighteen, whose parents were Christians, and his father a bishop, was not baptized until near twenty-one years of age—Du Pin, cent. 4, p. 159. Chrysostom, also born of Christian parents, in the year three hundred and forty-seven, was not baptized until near twenty-one years of his age—Grotius, Matth. 19: 14."*

I cannot quit this branch of my subject without inserting a somewhat lengthy extract from one of the most distinguished writers of the present age, and that not exactly a theologian, but from a most cogent reasoner, and from a work of the highest literary merit and philosophical character—namely, Coleridge's Aids to Reflection. Coleridge, who is an Episcopalian, is a writer peculiarly fitted to riddle the intricacies of sophisms, and has spoken frankly and learnedly on the subject. It may be well, however, to remark, en passant, that the reasoning on which Pædobaptists, generally, imply baptism—substitute for circumcision, or as an imitation of "proselytical" baptism—is unquestionably fallacious; and even were it really valid, it would be doubly fallacious to administer it on all children, when it was not (never) administered to the children of those within the Abrahamic covenant, but only to the children of the Gentiles and strangers. Herein lies the distinction to be made between the circumcision of infants and the baptism of infants; and here the analogy fails entirely, totally; therefore infants are not implied, I repeat, much less not commanded to be baptized. To carry out correct deductions from their premises, Pædobaptists can only claim that "infant baptism" is designed for the offspring of infidels who embrace Christianity, and not for the children of professing Chaistians—disciples in covenant with God; for their children, according to Whitby and others, are "seminally holy."

COLERIDGE'S CONCESSION.

‡ A born and bred Baptist, and paternally descended from the old orthodox non-conformists, and both in his own and in his father's right a very dear friend of mine, had married a member of the National Church. In consequence of an anxious wish expressed by his lady for the baptism of their first child, he solicited me to put him in possession of my views respecting this controversy; though principally as to the degree of importance which I attached to it. For as to the point itself, his natural prepossession in favor of the persuasion in which he was born, had been confirmed by a conscientious examination of the arguments on both sides. * * * * *

Our discussion is rendered shorter and more easy by our perfect agreement in certain preliminary points. We both disclaim alike every attempt to explain anything into Scripture, and every attempt to explain anything out of Scripture. Or, if we regard either with a livelier aversion, it is the latter, as being the more fashionable and prevalent. I mean the practice of both high and low Grotian divines, to explain away positive assertions of Scripture on the pretext, that the literal sense is not agreeable to reason, that is, their particular reason. And inasmuch as (in the only right sense of the word) there is no such thing as a particular reason, they must, and in fact they do, mean that the literal sense is not accordant to their understanding, that is, to the notions which their understandings have been taught and accustomed to form in their school of philosophy. Thus a Platonist who should become a Christian would at once, even in texts susceptible of a different interpretation, recognize, because he would expect to find, several doctrines which the disciple of the Epicurean or mechanic school will not receive on the most positive declarations of the Divine Word. And as we agree in the opinion, that the Minimifidian party err grievously in the latter point, so I must concede to you, that too many Pædobaptists (asserters of Infant Baptism) have erred, though less grossly, in the former. I have, I confess, no eye for these smoke-like wreaths of inference, this ever widening spiral ergo, from the narrow aperture of perhaps a single text; or rather, an interpretation forced into it by construing an idiomatic phrase in an artless narrative with the same absoluteness as if it had formed part of a mathematical problem. I start back from these inverted pyramids, where the apex is the base. If I should inform any one, that I had called at a friend's house, but had found nobody at home, the family having all gone to the play; and if he, on the strength of this information, should take occasion to asperse my friend's wife for unmotherly conduct in taking an infant six months old to a crowded theater; would you allow him to press on the words "nobody" and "all the family," in justification of the slander? Would you not tell him, that the words were to be interpreted by the nature of the subject, the purpose of the speaker, and their ordinary acceptation; and that he must or might have known, that infants of that age would not be admitted into the theater? Exactly so with regard to the words he and all his household. Had baptism of infants at that early period of the Gospel been a known practice, or had this been previously demonstrated, then indeed the argument, that in all probability there were infants or young children in so large a family, would be no otherwise objectionable than as being superfluous, and a sort of anti-climax in logic. But if the words are cited as the proof, it would be a clear petitio-principii, though there had been nothing else against it. But when we turn back to the Scriptures preceding the narrative, and find repentance and belief demanded as the terms and indispensable conditions of baptism, then the case above imagined applies in its full force. Equally vain is the pretended analogy from circumcision, which was no sacrament at all, but the means and mark of national distinction. In the first instance it was, doubtless, a privilige or mark of superior rank conferred on the descendants of Abraham. In the patriarchal times, this rite was confined (the first governments being theocracies) to the priesthood, who were set apart to the office from their birth.) At a later period, this token of the premier class was extended to kings. And thus, when it was reordained by Moses for the whole Jewish nation, it was at the time said, Ye are all priests and kings—ye are a consecrated people. In addition to this, or rather in aid of this, circumcision was intended to distinguish the Jews by some indelible sign; and it was no less necessary that Jewish children should be recognizable as Jews than Jewish adults—not to mention the greater safety of the rite in infancy. Nor was it ever pretended that any grace was conferred with it, or that the rite was significant of any inward or spiritual operation. In short, an unprejudiced and competent reader need only peruse the first thirty-three paragraphs of the eighteenth section of Taylor's Liberty of Prophesying, and then compare with these the remainder of the section, added by him after the Restoration; those, namely, in which he attempts to overthrow his own arguments, I had almost said, affects, for such is the feebleness, and so palable the sophistry of his answers, that I find it difficult to imagine that Taylor himself could have been satisfied with them. The only plausible arguments apply with equal force to Baptist and Pædobaptist, and would prove, if they proved anything, that both were wrong, and the Quakers only in the right.

Now, in the first place, it is obvious, [that] nothing conclusive can be drawn from the silence of the New Testament respecting a practice, which, if we suppose it already in use, must yet, from the character of the first converts, have been of comparatively rare occurance; and which, from the predominant and more concerning objects and functions of the apostolic writers, (1 Cor. 1: 17,) was not likely to have been mentioned otherwise than incidentally, and very probably, theresore, might not have occurred to them to mention at all. But, secondly, admitting that the practice was introduced at a later period than that in which the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles were composed, I should yet be fully satisfied, that the church exercises herein a sound discretion. On either supposition, therefore, it is never without regret that I see a divine of our church attempting to erect forts on a position so evidently commanded by the strong-hold of his antagonists. I dread the use which the Socinians may make of their example, and the Papists of their failure. Let me not, however, deceive you. (The reader understands, that I suppose myself conversing with a Baptist.) I am of opinion, that the divines on your side are chargeable with a far more grievous mistake, that of giving a carnal and Judaizing interpretation to the various Gospel texts in which the terms baptism and baptize occur, contrary to the express and earnest admonitions of the Apostle Paul. And this I say, without in the least retracting my former concession, that the texts appealed to, as commanding or authorizing Infant Baptism, are all, without exception, made to bear a sense neither contained nor deducible; and likewise, that (historically considered) there exists no sufficient positive evidence, that the baptism of infants was instituted by the apostles in the practice of the apostlic age.*

I need not pursue any further the error of "infant baptism"—which term I only use as a quotation, for I could not perpetrate such an absurdity of language—an absurdity in reference to the purpose of the Lord's institution, as well as an absurdity in the mode of administering the rite—a subject which, perhaps, should not have occupied so much of my space, but that it underlies most of the difficulties existing in the professing church, and is so pertinaciously persisted in by the Pædobaptists, maugre the total absence of any scriptural authority for it; which term Pædobaptist I desire to be understood always as using as I do the word Catholic, not recognizing its literal signification.

CONSECRATED ASSOCIATION.

Having shown that the passage in Mark 10: 13—16, and its correlative in Matt. 19: 13—15 does not mean—does not in the most distant degree infer—"infant baptism," I now proceed to expound its true meaning, and enforce the propriety of observing the rite, as inculcated by the precept and the example of the blessed Master.

"Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not," &c., is the gracious invitation of the tender-hearted Saviour; an intimation approximating to a command, to bring our children unto him, for his blessing, through his church—his living representative on earth—after his own precept and formula—"no more, nor less, nor otherwise, than the example." That formula had not the slightest, not the most distant semblance to baptism—contains not the slightest pretext for the use of water, applied after any mode; nor any thing like it.

He took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them. Here we have the express formula in the example to lay hands upon them and pray for them; as "pray for them" is Matthew's interpretation of "bless them." And this is all. No honest interpreter can make aught more of it, without disingenuously contorting it. The text speaks for itself. It needs no comment but to remove the false application of it by Pædobaptists. I do not claim any thing for the institution like the nature of a federal rite, or a covenanting rite, (which would make materially for my cause, were I to avail myself of that kind of adventitious support—spurious support—it needs no such equivocal aid,) but simply, to bring them into consecrated association. I disclaim all else, as pertaining to this privilege and this rite.

While Dr. Schmucker, with an innumerable host of his predecessors, regards "infant baptism" as conferring church membership on children, and while Dr. Dwight makes the nice distinction between being members of the church general (to which he contends they belong by baptism,) and a particular church. Mr. Helfenstein and Dr. Kurtz—the former a minister in the German Reformed Presbyterian Church, and the latter already announced as a prominent minister of the Lutheran Church—deny that baptism is the initiatory ordinance for little children into the visible church, but regard it simply as the act of recognizing them as members in virtue of Christ's atonement. "It is a common sentiment, (says Mr. Helfenstein,) that the baptism of children makes them members of the church; but this is an error; their baptism does not make them members, it only recognizes their right of membership already existing; their membership is not founded upon their baptism, but their baptism upon their membership; and whether that seal of the covenant be applied to them or not, they are (in the case of believing parents) not without but within the pale of the church."* Dr. Kurtz contends, that baptism is only "a formal recognition of membership in the church of God. Baptism (says that writer) is almost universally spoken of as an initiatory rite, or means of introducing individuals to membership in the church. * * * Children are members of the visible church of God through the merits of Christ's atonement, and in virtue of their birth of Christian parents, or of their being brought under Christian guardianship, and therefore have no need to be made members by baptism."†

This is a considerable step towards the truth; and a startling one it is to most of the strenuous advocates for "infant baptism," to find it admitted, by some of their own distinguished writers, leaders, that children are members of Christ's kingdom without that mutilated rite—reducing it to a mere ceremony of recognition—not the essential ordinance for regenerating infants. This view of the subject, in the main, is that in which the Baptists, generally, regard the condition of children under the Gospel dispensation, namely, that little children—unconscious babes—are embraced in the atonement of the precious Redeemer, who loved little children; which induces them to deny the necessity of baptism to infants, and rigidly withhold it, until they come to years of maturity—until they are capable of complying with the concomitant prerequisites, faith and repentance, and profess an allegiance to the King of kings. The Baptists can cordially adopt this phase of controverted truth; and I rejoice, exceedingly, to learn that this principle is spreading rapidly, and gaining much favor among the Presbyterians, Lutherans, and nearly all sects of Pædobaptists. But the Baptists err as much as the Pædobaptists, in not recognizing any manifestation whatever, not even the legitimate manifestation of the Master, to receive their offspring into consecrated association with the family of the redeemed, in their proper position, and by the rite suited to their condition.

To Messrs. Helfenstein and Kurtz's theory I take no exception whatever; I object, only, to their departure from the true "seal of recognition"—that the recognition by baptism is, in such cases, premature, improper, and not warranted, (as I have shown from the best authorities,) by a single passage of Scripture.

This brings me to a definition and an illustration of consecrated association. Consecrate, consecration, and consecrated, I have already defined and explained. Associate and association I employ in its simplest meaning, as defined by Bailey—to keep company with—making a considerable distinction in it with compeer, confederate, and partner. Crabb, my favorite author, in explaining the terms, association, society, company, and partnership, says: "Association is general, the other specific. Whenever association is used in distinction from the others, it denotes that which is partial in its object, and temporary in its duration." I would, therefore, define consecrated association: Set apart unto the Lord, under the guardianship of the household of faith—not identified in full rights and privileges with believers, but commingling with them for the benefit of their examples of faith and good living. Instead of being compeers in the church, or partners in the society of believers, are to be regarded more as novitiates for full fellowship, when they shall be qualified for that relation, agreeably to the conditions of the covenant—taken, at the instance of the Master, within the portals of the Gospel temple, not to serve at the altar in their present state, but to receive protection and instruction in the things which pertain to holy life.

Associations may be formed from community of purpose and community of feeling, without absolute identity, as well as from community of interest. Thus, in "society," many associations are formed in the pursuit of pleasure, founded on mere comity, which do not extend beyond the flitting hour; yet for the time being may prove to be the boonest companions, without the least identity, or claim upon any other rights or attentions, not connected with that momentary social intercourse. Union prayer meetings, of the most motley and incongruous sects, for mutual edification, are seen, daily, without establishing any alliance, or any immediate fellowship, among them. In some of the so-called "benevolent" institutions of the day, we find many distinct orders and degrees in the same fraternity, conferring different grades and ranks, each of which grade or rank is invested with separate and distinct rights and privileges, which the other cannot enjoy, unless initiated into that particular order or degree. While there is a general mystic tie among them—the recognition of the first degree—and each degree has its own secret watchword, to exclude others, and that no one may claim equality, or rights, although associated in one fraternal brotherhood, or rather union, of one great aim and end; so in this consecrated association—a term which I use only for want of a better one—we may be associated in the same purpose, and to the same end, namely, the glory of the Master. Infants, having no volition, no responsible volition, cannot enter the church, even in a brevet degree, because not capable of exercising any function of the obligation attaching to membership, yet may be taken into association for protection and instruction.

We have an illustration in our political relations of our General Government, tending to elucidate this point. The Indian tribes, the peaceable Indians, who are living under the protection of our Government, are not full citizens, only a sort of quasi denizens. They enjoy no rights apart from protection; and while separated from community of interests, and community of rights, have a nominal tribal prerogative (if I may coin a word for my purpose,) yet no national qualifications to treat with our Government as a foreign nation, although their right to the soil in their possession is respected, and we recognize that right by purchasing their lands; and while we respect their rights, in that sense, and purchase their lands from them, we extend protection to them, and feel obliged to confer upon them civilization and the blessings of Christianity. We cannot force them to accept either of them, but we take them within our family influence, trusting to our good example and our good efforts to reclaim them from their savage life, and aim to bring them within Gospel privileges, and eventually to full rights of citizenship, when they shall become competent to those functions.

Again: All foreigners are received into the bosom of the American family, and are entitled to the protection of our Government, while yet they are not entitled to any of the rights of citizenship. So soon as their feet touch our shores, we cast around them the ægis of our Constitution, while yet they cannot, legally, perform a single function of a member of the Republic; and they have to serve a probation of five years to become instructed in the principles of our Government.

But we have a more appropriate simile for this connection with the church, or association, as I prefer to denominate it, in the relation and standing of the Catechumens in the primitive church. "Having given an account of the several names of Christians, (says, Bingham,) I proceed now to speak of the persons, and several orders of men, in the Christian church. Some divide them into three ranks, others into four, others into five; which yet come much to the same account, when they are compared together. Eusebius reckons but three orders, viz: the hegoimenoi, pisoi, and catechoimenoi—rulers, believers, and catechumens. There are in every church (says he,) three orders of men, one of the rulers or guides, and two of those that are subject to them; for the people are divided into two classes, the pistoi, believers, and the unbaptized, by whom he means the catechumens. St. Jerome makes five orders; but then he divides the clergy into three orders, to make up the number; reckoning them thus, bishops, presbyters, deacons, believers, and catechumens. * * In all of which accounts, these four things are proper to be remarked: 1. That the name, believers, and fideles, is here taken in a more strict sense only for one order of Christians, the believing or baptized laity, in contradistinction to the clergy, and the catechumens, the two other orders of men in the church. And in this sense the words pistoi and fideles are commonly used in the ancient liturgies and canons, to distinguish those that were baptized, and allowed to partake of the holy mysteries, from the catechumens. Whence came that ancient distinction of the service of the church into the missa catechumenorum, and missa fiedelium. * * 2. We may hence observe, that the catechumens, though but imperfect Christians, were, in some measure, owned to be within the pale of the church. Forasmuch as Eusebius, Origen, and St. Jerome, reckon them one of the three orders of the church. And the councils of Eliberis and Constantinople give them expressly the name of Christians. Though, as St. Austin says, they were not yet sons, but servants; they belonged to the house of God, but were not yet admitted to all the privileges of it; being only Christians at large, and not in the most strict and proper acceptation."* I barely add, that they were subject to the discipline of the church likewise. The same order is also asserted by Mosheim Giesseler, Neander, and a host of ecclesiastical historians.

Here, it will be observed, was an order in the primitive church of unbaptized persons, yet regarded within the pale of the church—enjoying many of the privileges of the Christian economy, yet denied the right to the full benefit of the "better covenant;" while they were at the same time subject to the discipline of the household of faith. I have no space, nor any inclination, to extend remarks on this point, but leave it to the good sense of the reader; believing that, from the foregoing, he will comprehend fully my position, and will not attach more stress or importance to any of those positions than I have introduced in the discussion of the above matter, to illustrate and enforce the true import of the delicate rite and the tender association I have endeavored to advocate.

IMPOSITION OF HANDS.

Before leaving the subject of the Nature of the institution, and closing the exposition before me with an article on the Propriety of observing this endearing rite, I must make a few remarks on one point intimately connected with it, namely, the Imposition of Hands.

The doctrine of the laying on of hands was so important a matter to the apostles as to induce Paul to record it, in his Epistle to the Hebrews, (6: 2,) and class it among other important principles and practices of the Gospel; it must therefore mean something more than the miraculous imparting of the Holy Ghost, and that circumstance is prima faciæ evidence of it being an ordained appliance for special purposes in the Christian church. From a very mistaken view of this subject, the Baptists, generally, regard the laying on of hands as only intended to confer the gift of the Holy Spirit, and limited to apostolic times. Should I succeed in removing that erroneous impression, I shall, thereby, overcome much of the blind opposition to the touching rite of the dedication of little children.

Cramped for space, it must suffice to adduce one scriptural illustration, which, of itself, is sufficient to disprove that futile position. When the infant church was waxing strong in numbers, and when it was found necessary to set apart some of the brethren to serve tables—Deacons—the disciples were directed to select seven men of honest report, "full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom." And when they had chosen Stephen, a man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost, and six others, whom they sat before the apostles, and when they had prayed, they laid their hands on them. Acts 6: 1—6. Here we have an indisputable instance of the ceremony of the laying on of hands and prayer—and for what purpose? To confer the gift of the Holy Ghost? That would have been superfluous; they were already full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom. It was, most assuredly, simply a setting apart to a particular calling, by a ceremony which had been employed in all ages of the church—through the whole old economy, and in every economy—to express the consecration of a person to God, or to any particular calling or office in the church. The blessed Redeemer adopted the same form to set apart infants—to recognize their association with the family of the redeemed. And this is all I claim for it, in setting apart little children unto the Lord, and committing them to the care or guardianship of the church. The same rite or ceremony was uniformly administered, in the primitive church, on all persons baptized, as their baptism. "The imposition of hands, (says Neander,) was the usual sign of religious consecration, borrowed from the Jews, which was used in different cases as the sign of consecration, as well as to the common calling of a Christian in general as to its particular branches. When the Apostles, or the pastors of the church, laid their hands on the head of the baptized person, they called upon the Lord to bestow his blessing on the rite they had now completed, and prayed that he would suffer all that this rite typified to be fulfilled on the person now baptized; that he would consecrate him with his Spirit for his Christian profession, and shed his Spirit upon him. This was the closing rite, inseparably united with the old act of baptism; all, here, had reference to the same principal matter, without which no man can be a Christian—the birth into the new life proceeding from God, the baptism of the Spirit, which was symbolically represented by the baptism of water. But in after time men were led, by a misunderstanding, to separate these two things from one another in an erroneous manner."* In the German Seventh-day Baptist Society, the laying on of hands has invariably been practiced on baptized persons, while the candidate remains kneeling in the water. A most appropriate time and a most appropriate posture for the recognition of having been set apart by open profession to the service of God.

That this is the design of the laying on of hands, has been most satisfactorily settled by the learned Dr. Bloomfield, who correctly remarks: "Selden and Wolf deduce the origin of laying on of hands from the age of Moses, adverting to the seven Seniores, on whom Moses laid his hands. (Num. 27: 18.) Hence the custom obtained in the Jewish church, and was thence introduced into the Christian. As the laying on of hands had always been used in praying for the good of any person present, in order to show for whom the benefit was entreated; so it was also, from the earliest ages, a rite of institution to office, which it conferred by symbol."† There is ample testimony in the records of the early church to prove, (so far as that kind of testimony is regarded as proof,) that the laying on of hands was regarded as part of the ordinance of Baptism—as necessary to its completeness. "The ancients, (says Bingham,‡) it must be owned, sometimes gave it (the laying on of hands) the name of a sacrament, and called Baptism and Confirmation two sacraments. But then it is very evident that they take the word sacrament in a very large sense for any sacred ceremony, rite, or mystery belonging to baptism; that is, the immersion in water and the unction with the Holy Chrism, both of which are spoken of as sacraments or ceremonies belonging to baptism. Thus, in the Council of Carthage, under Cyprian, Nemesianes Tubeonesis says, "It was not sufficient for men to be regenerated only by the Imposition of Hands, but they ought to be born again,§ by both the sacraments in the Catholic Church; that is, as well by the washing in water, as imposition of hands; both of which he makes sacraments—sacred rites of the sacrament of Regeneration. In the same sense Cyprian¶ himself says: Both the sacraments of regeneration were required to complete man's santification; which plainly shows, that by two sacraments he means no more than the two principal ceremonies that belonged to a complete and perfect Baptism. In like manner, Optatus° makes imposition of hands and unction to be only parts and ceremonies completing Baptism. * * Optatus professes to describe the order and parts, and mysteries of Baptism, from the similitude of the baptism of Christ. In these he makes three sacraments or principal mysteries, the washing, the unction, and the imposition of hands; which are not properly three distinct sacraments, but three parts, or rites of the same sacrament of Baptism—ordered and shadowed and completed in the baptism of Christ. * * Haimo Haberstatenses expressly makes Confirmation a rite or ceremony of Baptism; always accompanying and administered at the same time with it, as the consummating act and perfection of it;‖ so when the ancients call Confirmation a sacrament, they always mean, that it is a part or ceremony of the sacrament of Baptism."

The Baptists of the present day do much damage to their distinctive feature, by stripping the initiatory ordinance into the church of this appendage; which has not only the testimony of the ancient writers in its favor, as part and parcel of complete baptism, but has the full recognition of the time-honored Philadelphia Baptist Association, whose Confession of Faith of 1742 declares: "We believe that laying on of hands, with prayer, upon baptized believers, as such, is an ordinance of Christ; and ought to be submitted to by all persons that are admitted to partake of the Lord's Supper; and the end of this ordinance is not for the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, but for a further reception of the Holy Spirit of promise, or for the addition of the graces of the Spirit, and the influences thereof." In laying it aside, in these latter days, they have departed from the land-marks of their own profession; and have singled out and put asunder what the Scriptures have joined together.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, March 17, 1853.

SUNDAY SANCTIFICATION.

A reformatory movement is on foot in our wicked city with regard to the Sabbath (?.) The growing profanation of what is commonly, though without any Scriptural authority, called the Lord's Day, renders our clergy uneasy, and they have resolved upon a special effort to counteract it. A series of discourses upon the subject is to be delivered on successive Sunday evenings. The following is the arrangement, as given in one of our daily papers.

1. Origin and History of the Sabbath. Rev. A. D. Smith, D. D. Sabbath, March 13, 7½ P. M.; in the Jane-st., Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church, near Eighth-avenue.
2. Jewish and Christian Sabbath. Rev. G. Potts, D. D. March 20, 7½ P. M.; in the Church on University-place.
3. Temporal Advantages of the Sabbath. Rev. S. D. Burchard, D. D. March 27, 7½ P. M.; in Dr. Burchard's Church, Thirteenth-st.
4. Spiritual Advantages of the Sabbath. Rev. Thos. De Witt, D. D. April 3, 7½ P. M.; in the Reformed Dutch Church, Bleecker-st.
5. Sabbath Desecration and its Consequences. Rev. G. B. Cheever, D. D. April 10, 7½ P. M.; in the Church of the Puritans, Union-square.
6. The Purpose of the Sabbath. Rev. G. W. Bethune, D. D. April 17, 7½ P. M.; in the Church corner of Fifth-av. and Twenty-first-st.
7. Mode of Sabbath Sanctification. Rev. Joel Parker, D. D. April 24, 7½ P. M.; in Dr. Burchard's Church, Thirteenth-st.
8. Practical Duties of Christians in reference to the Sabbath. Rev. John Krebs, D. D. May 1, 7½ P. M.; in the Church corner of Fifth-av. and Nineteenth-st.

Here are four Presbyterian ministers, three of the Reformed Dutch Church, and one Congregationalist;—no Baptist, no Methodist, no Episcopalian, none of any sort, indeed, except such as are thoroughly Puritanic in their theological views. All right, however, for nothing short of Puritanic stringency will avail with the lawless and disobedient. The milk-and-water doctrine of those who predicate Sabbath observance upon nothing but Apostolic example, or perhaps not even that —nothing higher than the general usage of the Church—has not hitherto effected any good results.

We wish we could get the ears of the leaders in this movement, long enough to suggest a few thoughts. We have no idea, however, that they will pay the smallest attention to what we say; and we would not trouble ourselves to say any thing, only that we remember, it is sometimes a duty to speak, whether men will hear, or whether they will forbear to hear.

The first discourse will have been delivered, before our paper goes to press. If the author should prove to be master of his subject, he will have afforded his hearers abundant proof, that the Sabbath was instituted in Paradise—that it was incorporated with the Decalogue, and given to the Israelites—that it was observed by God's people down to the coming of Christ—that it was observed by Christ himself, and so commended to his followers—that it was observed by the early churches—that it was observed even after Constantine's time—and that its observance was practiced by here and there a scattering band of Christians down to the time of the Puritans. But we are very suspicious, that his hearers will not learn from him, that this Sabbath, from first to last, was the seventh day of the week.

We would suggest to the Rev. Dr. Potts, that when he comes to talk about the "Jewish and Christian Sabbath," he will do well to reflect whether Christ ever made such a distinction—whether the New Testament any where recognizes such a distinction—whether it is not a distinction of mere human contrivance, and made for the purpose of sustaining a foregone conclusion. Jewish Sabbath and Christian Sabbath That is, as we suppose, one Sabbath for the promotion of Judaism, another for the promotion of Christianity. We would also suggest the outlines of a brief Catechism, which he may use at his convenience.

Quest. Which is the Sabbath for the promotion of Judaism?

Ans. The seventh day of the week, commonly called Saturday.

Q. Which is the Sabbath for the promotion of Christianity?

A. The first day of the week, commonly called Sunday.

Q. How does the observance of the seventh day of the week serve to promote Judaism?

A. By reminding the people of the work of creation; that the world and the things therein did not spring into existence by chance, as the Atheist teaches, but were the workmanship of an all-wise Being, who designed every thing for the best and wisest purposes. This point of theology lies at the foundation of Judaism!

Q. But is not this a fundamental point of Christianity also? Is it not a part of the faith, that the worlds were framed by the word of God? Heb. 11: 3.

A. Well, there may be something in that, but then it would seem very anti-evangelical to observe an institution which commemorates the fact; it seems too much like doing as the Jews did; and Constantine said, "Let us have nothing in common with that odious brood."

Q. Is Constantine your Master?

A. No; Christ is our Master, and we glory in observing his Sabbath, rather than the Sabbath of the Jews.

Q. How do you know that the first day of the week is Christ's Sabbath? Did He ever observe it?

A. Observe it! Certainly. Did he not appear to his disciples on the first day of the week, after his resurrection? And did he not say to them, "Peace be unto you?"

Q. That is not an answer to the question. Did Christ observe the day as a Sabbath? Did he rest from labor on that day? Did he command his disciples to do so? If so, furnish the proof.

A. If you must have chapter and verse for the thing, it must be owned that the proof is somewhat deficient. But is it not reasonable to suppose that, if Christ met with his disciples on the first day of the week, it was for the purpose of designating the day as a Sabbath?

Q. You confess, then, that there is no proof of the fact at all. Christ neither observed the day himself, nor commanded his disciples to do so. Why, then, do you call it the Christian Sabbath?

A. Because it is intended to be the means of promoting Christianity.

Q. So Constantine intended, it is true; but in what respect is it better for this purpose than the seventh day of the week?

A. Much every way; chiefly because it commemorates the new creation, rather than the old. For though it is well to acknowledge Jehovah as the Creator and Former of all things, yet the continued recurrence to it in a weekly commemoration is very unnecessary. It is much better for a Christian to commemorate the new creation, in comparison with which God says, the old creation "shall not be remembered, nor come into mind."

Q. Has the new creation yet come into being? Is it yet finished? How can it be commemorated, before it is completed?

The answer to the last question we shall leave for the Rev. Doctor to furnish, if he thinks best. But, seriously, is it not time that such botched theology be given to the winds, and God's Word, in its naked simplicity, enforced upon the people?

Upon the other points proposed for discus sion in this series of discourses, we have no suggestions to offer at present. We intend to hear them all, if opportunity serve.

MISSION TO CATHOLICS.

There is no more doubt of such an enterprise being successful, than a mission to the heathen. Though both hold with a tenacious grasp to the dogmas and superstitions in which they have been trained, yet the gospel is the power of God, which can and will break down all that exists in the human mind opposed to God and truth. The gospel is a suitable remedy for human guilt and misery, and when presented in the fullness and freeness and richness of its grace, from a warm Christian heart, in the exercise of faith and dependence on the Divine Spirit, it cannot fail of glorious results. To assail Romanism before an auditory of its adherents, or an individual, would mostly fail; but to preach to such as sinners, and present the grand doctrine of a crucified Saviour as an atonement for sin—as a remedial system for polluted and degraded human nature, and as a foundation for the hope of lost man—is sure of commanding attention. Strong as the prejudices of the mind may be, we may expect God to employ the instrumentality of his own appointing to break them all down. And the prejudices of those who have been trained up in papal doctrines, and have always been under the instruction of the Romish priesthood, are very strong and deep-rooted. The religion (if it is worth the name) of the Church of Rome is just suited to human nature; for, being destitute of all spirituality, and opening up a certain way to final happiness, without any penitence of heart, a humble dependence on the merits of Christ alone for salvation, and a holy life, the depraved mind readily coincides with it, and holds to it as the great good. The reason why so many of the Irish Catholics have gone over to the Established Protestant Church, is because it is so much like their own, and the more so of late, through the influence of the Oxford Tractarians. They have gone over from one system of baptismal regeneration and religious formality to another, and if the truth could but be fairly fathomed, by worldly inducements held out to them greater than they at present enjoy. In fact, it is a conversion from Romanism to a nominal Protestant faith and practice, without any religion or spiritual Christianity about it. But that blessed light which emanates from the Holy Spirit —that mighty power which can break the hardest heart, and subdue the most stubborn will—which can tear away the strongest prejudices from the soul, and set the captive to error, superstition, and folly, free—can make a poor ignorant and deluded Catholic a Christian. The means which God has appointed, and has commanded his servants to employ, are the same for all people and all lands, and the promise of success is sure. "My word shall not return unto me void, but shall accomplish that which I please, saith the Lord." Nor has the promise failed, but it is fulfilling every day. It has been verified in the experience of Christians and Christian ministers in Canada, and we may expect the enterprise projected by our Missionary Board, carried out faithfully, equally as full of promise. Arduous as the task may be, that strong-hold of the devil must be assailed every where. The torch of truth must be carried into the deep and dense darkness of Popery, by those who have the light within them. Armed with love and faith and Christian zeal, that citadel of darkness must be assailed by the servants of the Lord of Hosts. The time has fully come for the friends of truth to prepare themselves for the expected struggle, indications of which may be seen in every direction, this country not excepted. The noble-hearted men who are willing to buckle on the armor, and in the prime of life go forth to the battle, must have the prayers and coöperation of their brethren; and if our brother Jones goes to this spiritual conflict in Canada, the prayers and sympathies of his brethren must gather round him in the onset, and follow him through the whole campaign. May he thus go, and with the especial presence of him who dwelt in the bush, is the sincere desire of the writer of this communication. W——R.

AGRICULTURAL LECTURES—NO. 5.

BY PROF. GURDON EVANS.

Growth and Structure of the Plant.

The plant is propagated, with one or two exceptions, from the matured seed. The potato, one of these exceptions, is best produced by the tubercles formed under the ground. Its seed is formed in the small balls attached to the vines. A farmer of New York State raised over one hundred varieties from the seed of a single vine. The production of the seed is usually small, and hence, with its many varieties, becomes unfit for the propagation of the potato. A controversy exists among agriculturists, whether large potatos, when planted, yield a greater crop than small ones. It is difficult to settle this question, since we have many and various results from well-tried experiments, which tend to favor both views. A farmer in Pennsylvania, lately, raised eighty bushels from one of small potatos.

The germ of the new plant is formed before the seed sprouts, as may be seen in the bean. The germ is first developed by the influence of warmth and moisture. Hence seed should not be sown till the earth is in proper condition to act immediately upon it, causing it to put forth in a few days roots and a plume. In its first stages, the germ is supported by the nutritive elements of the seed; but soon little fibres are sent out, which, with the small mouths attached to their extremities, imbibe nutrition from the earth; and when the plant is above the ground, it derives also subsistence from the atmosphere. Thus Carbonic Acid, the chief food of the plant, is supplied to the growing vegetable through the earth and air. The plume or sprout, which is soon sent out, is at first shorter than the root, and before reaching the surface of the ground is colorless. Sugar is probably the first organic portion of the plant formed. It soon is converted into gum, starch, and woody fibre, and sustains the plant growing in an upright position.

The plant is composed of the root, stem, bark, leaf, blossom, and fruit, which we purpose to describe separately.

The primary object of the root, is to attach the plant to the earth; the second enables it to become the receptacle of its mineral food. The inner formation of the root, while it is more porous, very much resembles the wood of the stem. How the sap is forced up through the different parts of the vegetable, remains an unsolved problem. Some have attributed it to capillary attraction, but this cannot be the cause. Other interesting experiments have been tried. Take a glass tube, and cover one end with a membrane, pour sweetened water in the tube, and then immerse the tube in pure water; the pure water will pass into the tube through the membrane faster than the sweetened water will pass into the pure. Some have supposed that the circulation in the plant is carried on in the same manner; the sap being heavier than water, passes out of the roots slower than the water pours into them.

The stems of plants are of two kinds—exogens and endogens. The characteristic difference between them lies in the structure of the grain of the wood. Bread fruit, palms, corn, and grasses, are examples of endogens, which receive their additions on the inside. They have no separate bark, no annular layers, as the oak or maple has, and the veins of the leaves are long and parallel. The top of a sprout of the endogen plant is frequently formed of nearly all water, but it soon passes into sugar, and afterwards through the other processes as before described. The rule with some farmers is to allow their grasses or grains to stand until the seed is ripened. A great waste attends this method. The starch of the vegetable is thus permitted to pass into woody fibre, and this, in the stomach of the animal, is indigestible, and hence has no more nutritive properties than saw-dust. In wheat, for instance, the amount of flour is lessened, besides materially injuring the straw for fodder. The following is an account of an experiment made by Mr. Hannam, Yorkshire, Eng., illustrative of the injury arising to wheat by late cropping; also, of the proper time for cutting. He cut samples of wheat at five different times, as follows:—

No. 1 was cut a month before fully ripe.
" 2 " three weeks "
" 3 " two weeks "
" 4 " two days "
" 5 " when fully ripe.

Of these lots, 100 pounds of grain of each yielded as follows:—

No.	Flour.	Seconds.	Bran.
1,	75 pounds,	7 pounds,	17 pounds.
2,	76 "	7 "	16 "
3,	80 "	5 "	13 "
4,	77 "	7 "	14 "
5,	72 "	11 "	15 "

It will be seen, that No. 3, cut two weeks before it was fully ripe, was superior.

Woody fibre is not composed of tubes, but of small elliptical-shaped cells. Through these the sap circulates. These fibres are supposed first to be globules of starch.

The bark formed of woody fibre, is not indespensible to the growth of the plant; for a tree stripped of its bark in the Spring will continue to thrive, and a new bark be formed around the new layer, which in the exogen is yearly added to the tree. To this new layer the bark becomes necessarily a protection. It is formed of concentric layers, as the wood of the exogen stem, but much thinner and more porous. In the spring, the bark is loosened by the formation of this new layer. In the circulation of sap, the fluid passes up in the body of the vegetable, and down between the bark and wood, and there deposits the matter necessary to the growth of the tree; and hence, in exogens, as the term indicates, the tree increases on the outside. The upward circulation is obstructed by old age, and consequently decay commences at the center.

The leaf is composed of cells, and two sets of veins, one communicating with the inside, the other with the outside of the tree. Through the former the sap is carried to the leaf of the plant, where, becoming impregnated with the carbon which the leaf has separated from oxygen in Carbonic Acid, it is carried back through the latter veins to the outside of the tree, and deposited in the new layer. This process is similar to the action of the lungs in animals.

SHILOH, N. J., Feb. 15, 1853.

THE PERSECUTED MADIAI.

The persecution of the Madiai has already caused more discussion of the principle of religious liberty, and the opposing practice of the Romish Church, than any other event within the last fifty years. It is not impossible—nay, it is quite likely—that most important changes may result from it. The Earl of Roden, President of the Deputation to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, recently delivered a speech in Dublin upon the subject, in which he described the actual state of religious freedom on the Continent, and showed the need of reform in the laws. He alledges that the Madiai are persecuted for reading and circulating the Bible. The apologists of the Tuscan Government, however, alledge that it is for "proselyting" native Tuscans, for which purpose a company of fifty, supported by funds from England, divided themselves into smaller sections of ten, and held meetings, without license, contrary to law. In a speech on the subject in the British Parliament, Lord John Russell said that laws restrictive of religious freedom in thought, speech and action, were unjust and intolerant everywhere—that when he introduced the "Anti-ecclesiastical Titles Act," it was in opposition to the Pope's assumption of a temporal authority—and that, in no part of the British dominions was there any restriction on the holding or propagating any religious opinions, and trying to bring as many as possible over to them. Several other Members of Parliament gave expression to the same sentiments; while a few were found to justify the course of the Grand Duke.

A Turin paper has published a full account of the trial and imprisonment of Francesco and Rosa Madiai, from a translation of which one of our exchanges condenses the following:—

"Francesco Madiai was born in the country near Florence. Going to the city early for employment, he learned French and English, and became a courier to foreign families traveling to foreign lands. Thus he visited England, and even the United States. Rosa Madiai was born in Rome; thence removed to London, where she resided some 17 years, in the service of foreign and other families. Oh her return to Florence she met Francesco Madiai, with whom she was previously somewhat acquainted, and they were married by a Protestant clergyman, and partook of the sacrament in the Swiss Protestant Church in Florence. Uniting their little savings, they furnished a house and let it to foreign families, particularly English. Rosa remained at Florence, busying herself with her domestic duties, while Francesco continued his journeys as a courier.

On the night of Nov. 15th, 1851, these pious and inoffensive citizens, together with nearly twenty other persons of all ages and conditions, were arrested by the gendarmes, as heretics, and thrown into prison like traitors—a Judas, one of the little band of brethren, having betrayed them to the police. The Madiai were thrown into separate cells, and there kept in confinement until June 4th, 1852, when they were brought to trial, not before a jury, but a bench of judges, who sat with closed doors, admitting only a few Englishmen by the interposition of Sir Henry Bulwer.

In answer to the questions of the judges, Francesco and Rosa both acknowledged themselves Protestants, or "Christians, according to the Gospel;" declared that they had been induced to forsake Romanism by reading the Scriptures, from which they learned the errors and contradictions of the Papal Church. In answer to the question—Who advised you to leave the Catholic faith? Francesco replied, "Nobody: it has been a matter between God and my own soul." He admitted that he had held meetings for prayer and religious conversation in his own house, to which some Catholics were admitted, at their own request, desiring to become acquainted with the eternal truth. The judge then asked, "Have you ever had any religious controversy except the time you spoke against the church?" Francesco: "Yes, sir, only when I was provoked I spoke of the dogmas of the church as contrary to the Bible, but have never used, during this conversation, any disrespectful language."

With this closed Francesco's examination. Rosa was then questioned as to her change of religion, &c., and answered substantially as Francesco had.

On the 5th of June, the witnesses against the Madiai were examined, and on the next day Signor O. Maggiorani, a learned jurist who had kindly volunteered his services, made an able and affecting plea for the accused. The next day the prosecuting attorney summed up the charges; and on the day following, the Court, after long consultation, decided against the accused, and the presiding Judge read with a trembling voice:—

"Francisco Madiai, the Court has decided that you should be condemned to fifty-six months in the galleys and hard labor in the prisons of Volterra; and you, Rosa Madiai, are condemned to forty-four at the ergastolo, (the female galleys) at Lucca, also with hard labor. Besides this, you both are answerable for all the expenses of the trial, and subject to three years surveillance by the police, after the completion of your punishment."

The sentence was immediately executed on the poor Christians. The Novella says:—

"A special order of the Tuscan government prescribed that the Madiais should be entirely deprived of all religious service and books of their faith, nor should any Protestant clergyman be allowed to visit them—a rule which is not even applied in the same country to the worst criminals. They were soon separated from all the prisoners, and kept in a private and solitary cell—the husband on the hills of Volterra, and the wife at Lucca, a distance of fifty miles. When they are allowed to walk about, it is in a yard, surrounded by walls, from which you see nothing but the sky."

MISSIONARY LABOR IN ILLINOIS.

SOUTHAMPTON, Ill., Feb. 28, 1853.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

I returned home last evening from one of my stations, where I have been holding a series of evening meetings for two weeks, at which the congregations were quite large in the beginning, and gradually increased in numbers and interest till yesterday (Sunday,) when, preaching for the sixteenth time, I became so hoarse from a violent cold, that I had to desist, and leave the ground. What may be the result in the end, I know not; but appearances at the time I left were very favorable. Some who seldom went to a place of worship became interested in attending. One man in particular, who confessed that he had exerted a strong influence against religion, professed that he would reform, and turn his influence in favor of it. Some professors, who had been lukewarm, were much revived; some backsliders reclaimed; and though I had no evidence of any real conversions, yet I do know that there were quite a number anxious, who wept over their sins and desired prayers for their conversion. One very intelligent family appeared to be candidly inquiring into the claims of the Sabbath. S. COON.

REVIVAL INTELLIGENCE.—Our exchanges bring intelligence of interesting revivals in various parts of the country. At Carmel, N. Y., twenty persons were recently baptized; at Hamilton, N. Y., thirty-two; at Orland, Ind., about one hundred.

Rev. A. Tucker, in giving an account of a revival at Lafayette, Ind., says:—

"During the time Bro. Knapp was with us, seventy-three were baptized, several received as candidates for the ordinance of baptism, and a few backsliders were reclaimed. Since then, we have baptized fifty-nine, and the work is still going on with but little abatement of interest. The whole city has been moved —every denomination has shared in the glorious work—and up to the present time, probably not less than five hundred in the different churches have been converted, some of whom were atheists, infidels, universalists, etc."

Speaking of the revival in Newport, N. H., the Congregational Journal says:—

"We are informed that about 300 individuals entertain the hope that they have begun the Christian life since the commencement of the religious interest. About sixty have united with the Congregational and as many with the Baptist Church, while a still larger number has joined the Methodist class upon probation. So powerful a work of grace was never enjoyed in the town."

THE WALDENSES.—The Rev. J. P. Thompson, of New York, now in Europe, has lately visited the Waldenses, and gives, in one of his letters to the Independent, an interesting account of their condition. He says:—

The Waldenses now number some 23,000 souls, who are comprehended in 16 parishes. In their church organization, they do not fully carry out our American principle—which is also the principle of the New Testament—of making an evangelical experience the condition of Christian fellowship. Trained as they have been, and with the idea of State churchism which is inherent in the European mind, it is difficult to bring them to the adoption of that principle, though their ministers and teachers, so far as I have conversed with them, are satisfied of its soundness and importance. So long as they were under the harrow, there was little danger of formalism; and their historic spirit and life, as well as the truly evangelical spirit now rife among them, may long preserve their spirituality; but the danger is, that as they increase in numbers and in prosperity, their indiscriminate union of parish and church will lead to formalism and degeneracy.

MODEL HOUSES.—The N. Y. Courier and Enquirer says that a gentleman of this city is building a Model House, so called, on Thirty-seventh-street, designed to furnish wholesome tenements for working men at a cheap rate, embracing all the advantages of the English plan, with abundance of Yankee inventions by way of improvement.

"The building is forty feet by thirty-seven in area, four stories (exclusive of the basement) in height, and is calculated for the accommodation of thirty-nine families, each set of family apartments consisting of a parlor twelve feet by fourteen, with an alcove four feet by eight, a bedroom eight feet by ten, a kitchen eight feet by eight, with a pantry and coal bin attached. In the basement is a large coal bin capable of containing one hundred and fifty tons, to be filled by the proprietor at that month of the year when coal is cheapest, and to be sold to the occupants of the house without profit. The roof is tinned, and provided with fittings for drying clothes, and with screens to protect in summer against the heat of the sun. Every part of the building is thoroughly supplied with Croton water.

THE NEW YORK ALDERMEN SENTENCED.—Several month ago, when the Broadway Railroad project was under discussion, and it was probable that the immensely valuable privilege of building it would be granted by the Common Council to their favorites for a trifle, the Superior Court interposed with an injuction forbidding the grant. This injunction was disregarded by the Aldermen, and a resolution was even passed by them impugning the motives of the Court. For this they were attached on a charge of contempt. The judgment in the case was pronounced last Sabbath, in the Superior Court, twelve of the accused Aldermen and eleven Assistants being present. It was that Alderman Sturtevant (who presented the offensive resolution) "shall be imprisoned in the City Prison 15 days, pay for the benefit of the City Treasury the sum of $250, and to the relators for counsel fee and costs $102 20. In relation to the other Aldermen, except Ald. Smith, who offered an excuse, and Ald. Doherty, who did not vote on the resolutions of Ald. S., the judgment is, that they pay a fine of $250 each for the benefit of the City Treasury, in addition to $101 50 for costs and expenses of relators." An appeal was taken in each case to the Court of Appeals, with the exception of Ald. Smith. Security was entered into by the respective parties to abide the appeal, and in the mean time proceedings in the judgment have been stayed.

MASSACHUSETTS TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.—A State Temperance Convention was held at Boston last week, when addresses were delivered by Mr. Hawley of Hartford, Ct., Rev. Mr. Woolcut of Belchertown, and Rev. H. W. Beecher of Brooklyn. Resolves were adopted denying that the Maine Law movement is of a fanatical character; asserting that the friends of the Law have not the slightest fear that it is unconstitutional; that the decision of Judge Curtis is rather encouraging than otherwise; that the proposal for the repeal of the Law cannot be tolerated; that the friends of the Law in the Legislature should not allow my amendments to pass impairing its efficiency; that the law, if faithfully executed, will shut up every grog-shop, guard the young and weak from temptation, suppress the chief source of crime and pauperism; that the benefits already arising from this Law are unquestionable; that the consumption of liquor is already diminished, while no legitimate interests have been injured; that the chief hinderances to the Law are, want of proper care in framing indictments, the mingling of the Law with party politics, and virtual nullification in Boston.

WASHINGTON MATTERS.—The Senate was in session every day last week, but we do not see much in its proceedings to report. With the exception of confirming the President's Cabinet appointments (which will be found below) and a few other appointments, the time was mostly occupied in a discussion about "the Bulwer-Clayton Treaty and the Monroe doctrine." One day, however, was spent in overhauling the contract of the Secretary of the Navy with Howland and Aspinwall to furnish coal for the Japan Expedition. Mr. Cooper alledged that that firm are to make the enormous commission of $160,000 out of this job. He offered a resolution calling for the contract and for the facts in the case, which was passed.

THE NEW CABINET, as nominated by President Pierce, and approved by the Senate, stands as follows:

Sec. of State,	WM. L. MARCY.
Sec. of the Treasury,	JAMES GUTHRIE.
Sec. of the Interior,	ROB'T. MCCLELLAND.
Sec. of War,	JEFFERSON DAVIS.
Sec. of the Navy,	JAMES C. DOBBIN.
Postmaster General,	JAMES CAMPBELL.
Attorney General,	CALEB CUSHING.

DEAF AND DUMB IN NEW JERSEY.—There was an interesting exhibition at Trenton, before the Legislature, recently, of Deaf and Dumb residents of New Jersey, who are beneficiaries in the New York Deaf and Dumb Institution. They were under the care of Mr. J. Van Nostrand, a teacher in the Institution. There are in the State of New Jersey 192 deaf mutes, of which 111 are white males, and 81 females. Of these there are 22 males and 9 females under 10 years old; 44 males and 33 females between 10 and 30; 44 males and 37 females between 30 and 70. There are 15 of them in the New York Institution, 7 being males and 8 females, 13 of whom are supported by the State. A number are also supported in the Pennsylvania Institution. Gov. Fort stated in his message that the appropriation for this purpose was not exhausted, and reccommended that more pupils should be educated.

DEATH OF A GOOD MAN.—Mr. John B. Graham, of Brooklyn, a gentleman intimately associated with the philanthropic institutions of that city, was found dead in his bed on the morning of March 11. In conjunction with his brother, the late Augustus Graham, the deceased projected and contributed toward the erection of the Brooklyn Institute, the Home for Aged and Indigent Females, and the Brooklyn City Hospital, all of which he endowed with the means to put them into successful operation. Mr. Graham also aided in founding the Mariners' Industrial Society, on Staten Island, and was a large contributor to the New York Home for the Friendless.

LIBERAL ENDOWMENT.—Miss Catharine E. Beecher has offered to endow the Professorship of a Female Seminary in Dubuque with the sum of $20,000, and also to furnish books and apparatus to the amount of $1,000, provided the citizens of Dubuque will erect a building and guarantee a certain number of scholars. The proposition has been accepted, and a Committee appointed to solicit donations.

According to Lyon's N. H. Register, the number of ministers of different denominations in the State is as follows:—Congregationalists, 181, of whom, however, 25 have no pastoral charge; Baptists, 67; Methodists, 107; Free-Will Baptists, 103; Christians, 23; Episcopalians, 9; Universalists, 22; Unitarians, 12; total 464. Estimating the present population of the State at 320,000, an equal division would give about 700 people to every minister.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

The Report of the New York Juvenile Asylum shows that the $50,000 required by the act of incorporation has been contributed, and the Board of Supervisors have appropriated a like sum, making $100,000, to be expended for a permanent location and buildings. The collection of $50,000 entitles the Asylum to receive from the City, or from the Commissioners of Emigration, a yearly sum of $40 for each and every pupil kept and instructed by it; thus endowing an institution which it is believed will be a great blessing to the neglected children of our City.

There is pending before the Board of Overseers of Harvard University, a proposition which covers a great deal of ground. It is that a portion of the School Fund of the State be recommended to be set apart to provide scholarships at the Colleges for meritorious youth from the Common Schools, so as to widen the field of academic instruction, to relieve the Common Schools from a tendency to over action, and to set before the pupils a lofty aim.

During the year 1852, there died in South Africa, says the Independent, two venerable missionaries, Rev. William Anderson, of Pacultsdorp, and Rev. Mr. Read, of Kat River, both of whom left England in the year 1800, and after all the varied experiences incident to a missionary life, deceased within a few months of each other. The period of their united labors exceeded a century!

The chaplain of the Indiana State-Prison at Jeffersonville, after the sermon on Sunday, spends the whole afternoon in visiting the cells, and holding religious conversation with each prisoner; tracts, too, are put into the hands of the prisoners, and valuable books are regularly given out to them, every Sunday, from the prison library, which has been increased the past year by some 150 volumes.

A gentleman, who has with much labor collected the facts, states that there were added, by profession, during the last year, the following numbers to the different Evangelical Churches in Boston; 14 Orthodox Congregational churches, 286; 13 Baptist churches, 383; 9 Methodist churches, 361; 11 Episcopal churches, 193; total added by profession 1,223.

There are two infidel clubs in Cincinnati. The first is the society of German Turners or Freemen, numbering some five hundred persons, and the other is the Society of English "Liberals," composed of about one hundred members. The German Atheistic sheet circulates some three thousand five hundred copies.

Rev. Dr. Murray, alias Kirwan, describes Achilli as a short man, firmly built, with jet black hair, and a black and restless eye. His age may be an advance on forty years; his manners are pleasant; and in "conversation he is free, decidedly talkative."

The New York Times advises young men to keep away from this city. It says that nineteen-twentieths of the young men who come here to seek their fortunes, not only drag out an existence of poverty, but become miserable vagabonds.

Dr. Sharp, of Boston, is in a very feeble state of health. He is suffering under general prostration by his constant and vigorous labors for so many years. He will preach no more for the present, but will seek rest and relaxation.

The graduates of Brown University are taking measures to bring together all the alumni next commencement in September, 1853, and hold a distinct celebration by themselves during the commencement exercises.

Puseyism! What is it? The best definition we have seen, is that given by Bishop M'Ilvaine: "Puseyism is Romanism restrained." So soon as relieved of restraint, it is open and decided Romanism.

Mrs. Harriet B. Stowe, with her husband and family, sailed in the steamer Glasgow on the 4th of March for Glasgow.

Rev. J. J. Teeple, late of Morrisville, N. Y., has taken the pastoral charge of the Baptist church at Adams Center, Jefferson Co.

Judson's Memoir is to appear in May, next—so says the Register.

An Extraordinary Storm.

A correspondent of the Gardiner Fountain, writing from Bass Harbor, Mount Desert, describes the storm of the 13th ult., as it appeared there, to have been awful and sublime. A thunder-cloud passed over the place, which, for terrific appearance, exceeded anything ever witnessed there. The same correspondent adds:

"The lightning was of a purple color, and sometimes appeared like balls of fire, coming in through the windows and doors and down the chimneys, while the houses trembled and shook to their foundations.

Mrs. E. Holden was near a window, winding up a clock; a ball of fire came through the window and struck her hand, which benumbed her arm. She then, with all in the house, retreated into the entry. Another flash succeeded, and in the room from which they had retired, resembled a volume of fire, whirling round and producing a crackling noise. A similar appearance of fire was seen, and crackling noise was heard in a large number of the houses. Some who heard the noise say that it sounded like breaking glass.

Capt. Maurice Rico had his light extinguished, and his wife was injured. He got his wife on a bed, and found a match—at that instant another flash came and ignited the match and threw him several feet backward. J. L. Martin received so severe a shock that he could not speak for a long time.

A great many persons were slightly injured. Some were struck in the feet, some in the eye; while others were electrized, some powerfully and others lightly. But what was very singular, not a person was killed, or seriously injured, nor a building damaged; but a cluster of trees within a few rods of two dwelling houses, was not thus fortunate. The electric fluid came down among them, taking them out by the roots, with stones and earth, and throwing all in every direction. Some were left hanging by their roots from the tops of the adjacent trees—roots up, tops down.

The lightning, after entering the earth to the depth of several feet, and for a space some 8 or 10 feet in diameter, diverged into four different directions. One course which it took led through the open land, making a chasm to the depth of several feet, and continued to march unobstructed by the solid frozen ground, or any other substance, to the distance of 370 feet; lifting, overturning, and throwing out junks of frozen earth, some of which were 10 or 11 feet long by four feet wide; and hurling at a distance, rocks, stones and roots."

European News.

The steamer Africa, with European dates to Feb. 27th, arrived at New York March 13th.

The advices by the Africa are not favorable for Cotton and Breadstuffs.

The Africa brings interesting news from Constantinople. The Austrian demands have been rejected, and the Austrian embassy is closed, and war is expected. Russia is at hand, and Prince Menchikoff is appointed to command the army on the frontiers. France and England sustain Turkey. The conduct of the French Ambassador at Constantinople indicates especially that Louis Napoleon would like to see the war going on. England strives for peace, but must stand by the Sultan at any event.

The British Parliament had been discussing the grant to Maynooth Roman Catholic College, and the Jewish Disabilities Bill.

Vienna letters are full of the recent attempt on the life of the Emperor. The assassin's name is now spelled Janos Libeny, a journeyman tailor, from Stuhlweissenburg in Hungary. His age is about 23. He maintains with vehemence that he had no accomplices, and that his intention was not to kill the Emperor, but to give him "a mark." He further maintains that he had had the intention ever since 1850, and watched for three weeks past for an opportunity to find his victim unattended. The Emperor's wound was slight, and is going on favorably. When led to prison, Libeny cried, "Vive Kossuth!"

German papers state that a rising was anticipated at Pesth, and fears were entertained of an outbreak throughout Hungary. The Police of Pesth had arrested 20 travelers at the Hotel d'Angleterre. The garrison of the city is kept constantly under arms and ready to act at a moment's notice. Sentinels are posted at all the gates leading to the fortress of Buda, from which, and other circumstances, it would appear that a coup de main to liberate the political prisoners is feared.

The Immense Gardiner Fraud.

The case of the United States versus Geo. A. Gardiner, indicted for false swearing, in order to obtain an award from the late Mexican Board of Commissioners, was taken up in the Criminal Court at Washington, March 11. Mr. May opened the case for the United States with a succinct history of the matter, and a statement of what the prosecution expected to prove. Dr. Gardiner, in a memorial to the Board of Commissioners, stated that early in the year 1844, he was largely engaged in mining operations in the State of San Luis Potosi, Mexico; employed 500 laborers; had upward of $300,000 invested in men, buildings, steam engines, horses, mules, and men of science; that in 1849 he was compelled to abandon the establishment, his property having been despoiled by the Mexican soldiery; that said mines were worth half a million, and would have yielded him $50,000 per annum. The accused filed with this memorial depositions purporting to be from persons residing in Mexico, going to show that he owned said mine. The issue was on the truth or falsity of these assertions. The United States affirmed, and expected to prove, that every statement in the memorial, and every paper presented by him, were false—from beginning to end pure fiction and invention. Gardiner received from the United States as the fruits of the fraud, $428,750. The mine was so vaguely located that it could not be found by the Commissioners, although they offered $500 reward for it; that persons whose names were furnished as evidence of title could not be found in Mexico; that every one of the depositions were made in Washington—the title was manufactured here; that Dr. Gardiner was a poor dentist, and never could have worked such a mine as he described; that he was practicing dentistry and peddling small wares on the Pacific coast, thousands of miles distant, instead; that the mine, the title, the seals and signatures of public officers in Mexico, were all forged.

SINGULAR DEATH.—Two young men of the village of Brandes, in France, lately perished in a very singular manner. They went out to shoot wild ducks, and in order to arrive at the marshy ground which the birds frequented, they determined to proceed down the canal in a boat, and then, crossing over to the other side, to walk the rest of the way. The waters being unusually high in consequence of the rains, the young men found that they could scarcely pass under the arch in their boat. They thought, it is supposed, that by lying down in the boat they could pass. It so happened that the water was higher than they thought, and was rising every moment, so that when the boat had got under the arch it stuck fast, thus inclosing the young men completely, without their having any means of extricating themselves. They were found two days after dead in the boat and clasped in each other's arms.

BANK FAILURES.—The failure of two shinplaster banks was announced March 11—the Woodbury Bank, and the Eastern Bank of West Killingly, both purporting to be situated in Connecticut, but really owned and operated by a New York broker. This person has various business connections in the Western States, where the bills were sent for circulation, but they were redeemed in Wall-st., at a discount. The joint circulation of the two amounted to about $380,000, and the assets were small comparatively. The two Banks alluded to were among the last batch of special charters granted by Connecticut, and the public have no security for the redemption of the notes. The Bank of North America, another Connecticut concern, was also in difficulties, but being really sound, although temporarily embarrassed, has been assisted by its friends and will go through. The Baton Rouge (La.) Comet of the 25th, says: The New Orleans, Red River and Texas Telegraph Company are making arrangements to put down a submarine wire across the Mississippi River at this point, and continue their wire down to Plaquemine, thus connecting the Capital with the great South-western and Northern portion of Louisiana and Texas. This telegraph system, connecting as it will the Mississippi and the East with the far Southwest, is one of the most important, and will be among the most profitable in the United States.

SUMMARY.

Some two hundred girls, all Americans, are employed in ornamenting and finishing porcelain ware in New Haven. All of them except four are employed in the process of burnishing the gold after it comes from the furnace, and the painting is all done by experienced male artists. The gilding of China ware is done in New York to a considerable extent. Importers find it cheaper to buy the white ware in France and England and have it ornamented in this country. The duty on the increased value of the ware is thus saved.

In the great case of Sturges & Anderson vs. Longworth, on bill of review from Hamilton county, the Ohio Supreme Court has pronounced an opinion in favor of the plaintiff. This case involves the title to some 40 acres of land in Cincinnati, which was bought by Nicholas Longworth many years ago on sale by administrators. From some defect in the proceedings, the sale is now set aside, and the heirs of the deceased have the benefit of the enormous rise in value. It is equivalent to a judgment of from $200,000 to $250,000 against Longworth.

The United States Senate Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the memorial of Levi L. Hill, in reference to his alledged discovery in Hillochrome, or sun-painting, as denominated by Mr. Hill, made a report prior to the close of the session, which fully recognizes his claim to the originality and priority of invention. The committee being unable to devise any better mode by which to recognize the claim of Mr. Hill, they recommend that his memorial, with the report, be placed on the records of the Senate.

Alexander Mayne was tried at the Oyer and Terminer at Canton, St. Lawrence County, for the murder of Samuel Snawdy, and convicted of manslaughter in the second degree. Mayne was 19 years of age and Snawdy 21. The latter attacked the former on the highway, and striking him several times with his fist, was stabbed in return, and died in a few minutes. They had previously been on ill terms. Mayne was sentenced to seven years' confinement in the Clinton Prison.

The Maine Steam Navigation Company have nearly completed a new steamer, which they have named the Daniel Webster. It is stated that, in honor to the name given to the vessel, an elegant boudoir pianoforte, valued at $700, has been presented to her by gentlemen of Boston, friends of the late Daniel Webster. Her length is 240 feet; breadth of beam, 33 feet; depth of hold, 11 feet; and, about 900 tuns measurement.

The snow which occurred at Syracuse on the morning of the 3d inst., commenced at 3 o'clock, and at 7 o'clock two feet of snow had accumulated—being at the rate of six inches per hour! We do not believe the records of meteorology will furnish any parallel to this. At Geneva, 50 miles west, and at Utica, 50 miles east, but from two to four inches fell. Twenty miles north of Syracuse there was about 15 inches, and at Rochester but a mere sprinkle.

The steam yacht North Star was launched Thursday, March 10, from the ship yard of J. Simonson, foot of Nineteenth-st., East River. This beautiful model of a vessel has been built for Cornelius Vanderbilt, Esq., and under his immediate supervision. She is to be fitted up in the most magnificent style, and it is expected will be finished about the middle of May, when Mr. Vanderbilt, with a party of relatives and friends, will proceed to Europe on their contemplated excursion.

By the arrival of the brig Favorite at this port from Bathurst, at the mouth of the Gambia, we have advices to Feb. 3. A war was raging between the different tribes, the difficulty being about drinking. The King of Combo attacked the town of Savaga, containing some 4,000 inhabitants, on the 2d December, and was repulsed by the Mirabous, with a loss of 17 men—the latter losing but one, and he a trader.

The Portland Advertiser, in speaking of the historical value of newspapers, mentions the fact that the Legislatures of several of the States have authorized County Clerks to preserve files of two or more newspapers published in the County. There is a similar law in Maine, and the Advertiser suggests that there should be a penalty for neglect of keeping files as required.

As the workmen engaged upon a row of new buildings in progress of erection in Twenty-second-st., between the Seventh and Eighth-avs., New York, were about leaving their work on Thursday evening, two of the houses in the center of the block suddenly fell to the ground. There were seventeen persons at work upon the building at the time, all of whom escaped injury except two laborers.

Iron will be the great material for almost everything at the proper time. A company is being organized at Cincinnati, Ohio, to pave the turnpike from the head of Western-avenue, at Brighton, to Comminsville, Spring Grove and Carthage, with iron plates. The sides of the road will be filled in with dirt, and ornamented with shade trees.

There are three thousand two hundred and twenty-eight McDonnells and McDonalds in the County of Glengarry, Canada, among a total population of only seventeen thousand. Rode's Directory of New York City, for 1852–53, has the places of business of upward of 150 members of this numerous Celtic family.

The West Jerseyman says that the New York speculators are in Burlington County, N. J., contracting for poultry of the 'capon' breed, to be delivered in May, at 25 cents per pound. Anticipation of a throng in the city during the World's Fair is the reason of this exorbitant price for poultry.

A tornado visited the vicinity of Clarksville, Tennessee, on Sunday night, leveling dwellings, stables, barns and trees to the ground, but, as far as heard from, no lives were lost. The track of the storm was half a mile wide, and so terrific was it that the roads were filled with fallen timber.

The Albany Atlas states that the double track of the Hudson River Railroad will be completed through in August, when the express train will make the whole distance in three hours, and the efficiency of the road will be vastly increased.

Mr. Randall, of Athens County, Ohio, has recovered $1000 damages of the N. O. & O. Telegraph Company, for injuries received by himself and wife when his horse ran away and became entangled in the wire which had been left down across the road.

The notorious pickpocket Bob Sutton, who is now in the Auburn State Prison, has fallen heir to property in England, by the death of a brother, to the value of $90,000. Sutton is over 60 years of age, and having been sentenced to prison for a term of years, it is very doubtful whether he will live to enjoy this unexpected freak of fortune. He has, however, a family residing in St. Louis, who enjoy the good opinion and confidence of the people of that place.

The most destructive fire that ever occurred in New Orleans broke out on Wednesday, March 2, in the upper part of the Alabama cotton press. The flames spread rapidly, and gained a tremendous headway before the engines arrived. It destroyed nearly all the contents of the press, besides a large quantity of cotton piled in the street. It is supposed that over twenty-thousand bales of cotton were destroyed.

The schooner Splendid went ashore about 7 o'clock on the morning of the 4th inst., about one mile south of Glade's House, Cohasset, and must have struck on the ledges south of Minot's Ledge during the night, and all hands are supposed to have perished, as two bodies were found on the beach next day. The schooner's log-book was found on the beach.

The steamer Narcissa, of Cold Spring, L. I., went ashore at the back of Cape Cod, three miles north of Highland light, on Friday night, March 4, about 11 o'clock. The crew remained on board until nearly 8 o'clock the next morning, when the Captain, Mate, and one of the sailors, were saved by some men on the shore, who arrived from Providence. Two men were drowned.

The Middletown Whig Press says, that many farmers in Orange County have discontinued selling their milk, and resumed their old practice of butter making, anticipating an increased demand and enhanced price for that article in the New York market, which the influx of visitors to the World's Fair must create.

The bark Lady Suffolk reports that the ship Roxburgh Castle, from Melbourne, Australia, for London, put into Cape Town on the 6th January. She had on freight eight tons of gold, valued at over five millions of dollars, being the largest lot ever shipped from Australia.

A Mr. Stephen Johnson, of Hempstead, Queen's county, L. I., raised, the past year, on twelve square rods of ground, potatoes and peas which he sold for $603, besides using from the same lot for family purposes, and 31 bushels of turnips. Reckoning the produce at their market value, this would be at the rate of about $235 per acre.

The oath of office was not administered to the Vice President on the 4th inst. Mr. Rodney, the Vice Consul, visited Mr. King on the 3d for the purpose; but Mr. K. considered the ceremony unnecessary, fearing that he should never be able to reach Washington to assume the duties of the office, and if he should, the oath could be administered at Washington.

We have received Mexican dates to Feb. 21. The Trait d'Union says—There is little doubt that Santa Anna will be reëlected. A house has been already secured and furnished for him, and a Mexican revenue cutter sailed from Vera Cruz, on the 21st, with a commissioner to invite his immediate return.

A most destructive storm swept over Columbus, Ga., on the 10th inst. The damage, it is estimated, will amount to at least $250,000. The telegraph line between Columbus and Alexandria was completely demolished for several miles, but has again been put in working order.

A Niles (Michigan) correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, says the California fever is raging in that part of the country as fierce as ever. Many who had gone thence to the land of gold had returned, bringing back highly favorable reports, and determined to go again.

The Barre (Mass.) Gazette states that an Irish servant girl in that town recently received intelligence of the death of a maiden aunt in the old country, leaving to her and her brothers and sisters, six in number, £18,000, or about $90,000.

A law has passed the Legislature of New Jersey reducing the rate of ferriage of the Jersey City and Hoboken Ferries from four cents to three cents for passengers, and making the charge of ferriage for vehicles and other articles about 25 per cent. less than at present.

In Southwark, (Philadelphia,) on Thursday night, Feb. 10, two women were murdered, probably by persons intent upon getting money known to be in the house. One of the women was wounded in forty-five places, and the other in seventeen.

The Sandy Hill (Washington Co.) Herald says that the celebrated tree near Fort Edward, under which Jane McCrea was assassinated by the Indians, is to be cut down and made into snuff-boxes.

The name of Fever River, on which the thriving city of Galena stands, has been changed by the Common Council of that place to Galena River. The old name, it seems, had the effect sometimes of frightening people.

The Chicago Democrat says that disclosures of the recent State survey of Illinois make it certain that the coal fields of that State are equal in extent to those of Pennsylvania, if not greater.

The Illinois Central Railroad is completed, and the cars have commenced running between Chicago and Peru. By that route passengers from Chicago can reach New York by railroad within four days.

The English ship Crowningshield, bound from Melbourne for London, with seventy thousand ounces of gold dust, touched at Pernambuco on the 15th of January. She had also on board an ingot of pure gold weighing forty-six pounds, Troy weight.

A bill was passed by the Lower House of the Canadian Parliament, to permit lenders to charge what rate of interest they please, but 6 per cent. only, to be recoverable by law.

Many of the persons so suddenly imprisoned by Louis Napoleon were very young. Among them was a child of ten years, apprenticed to a saddler.

The steamship Unicorn, Captain Lapidge, will leave Panama in the early part of April for Australia, under steam and canvas.

The government, it is said, has ordered a caloric engine of sixty horse power for the Navy Yard at Washington.

Samuel S. Howland, Esq., senior partner of the house of Howland & Aspinwall died at Rome on the 9th of February last. Mr. Howland left New York a few weeks since for Europe, in the hope that a sea voyage, and a tour to Italy would benefit his impaired constitution. He died of disease of the heart.

On Saturday afternoon, on the Lawrence Railroad, forty loaded baggage cars out of a train of fifty, were thrown of the track, and eight of them pitched down an embankment of 20 feet. The freight conductor was badly injured, and the track considerably damaged.

Two hundred and five vessels are now on the berth at British home ports for the Australian Colonies, and comprise 90,000 tuns with no scarcity of either passengers or cargoes.

The will of B. S. Hairston, of Henry Co., Miss., by which his whole estate, amounting to nearly a million of dollars, is given to a little colored boy, was admitted to record at the last term of the County Court.

Rev. Antoinette Brown has two invitations to settle as pastor of religious societies in this State—one of them at Troy. It is probable that she will accept one of them.

John Hooker, of Farmington, Conn., has been nominated by the Free Soil party as their candidate for Congress, in the 1st Congressional District of Connecticut.

DIED,

In the town of Willing, Allegany County, N. Y., Feb. 23d, in the forty-first year of his age, Deacon ELIPHALET H. JOHNSON, after a short but painful illness Deacon Johnson had been for many years a professor of religion. At the time of his death he was a member of the Church of Amity. It was during his connection with this church that he was ordained to the office of deacon. He was highly esteemed by the church, for his godly walk and for the faithful manner in which he discharged his Christian duties. He has left a widow and several small children, who must of necessity feel that they have sustained an irreparable loss. As our brother's life was one of obedience to God, so in death did his God graciously smile upon him, giving him strong hope through grace of eternal life. N. V. H.

At Farmington, Ill., Feb. 23d, GEORGE THOMAS, only child of Joshua and Maria Wheeler, aged one year and twenty days.

Missionary Society—Board Meeting.

THE next Quarterly Meeting of the Executive Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society will be held at the house of David Dunn, New Market, N. J., on Fifth-day, March 31st, at 10½ o'clock A. M. GEO. B. UTTER, Rec. Sec.

A Quarterly Meeting of the Board of Managers of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society will be held at the same place at 2 o'clock P. M.

Notice—Eastern Association.

THE churches composing the Seventh-day Baptist Eastern Association are requested to take a contribution to aid the missionary operations within the limits of the Association, and remit the same to the Treasurer, Asher M. Babcock, of Westerly, R. I., previous to the 1st of April, as the money is needed.

By order of the Executive Committee,
S. S. GRISWOLD, Secretary.

Western Association—Executive Board.

THE Executive Board of the Western Association will hold its next quarterly session at Nile, on Fourth-day evening, April 6. J. BAILEY, Sec.

Ministerial Conference.

AT a meeting of several of the ministers of the Eastern Association, for the purpose of considering what is advisable for the ministers to do in addition to their regular pastoral labors for the advancement of religion in their several churches, it was thought advisable to form a Ministerial Conference, the object of which should be the promotion of Christianity among the churches, and the mutual improvement of the ministers. And to carry the same into effect, it was concluded to hold a meeting with each church located in the eastern part of the Association, at least once a year. The first meeting of said Conference is to be held with the church at Greenmanville, Ct., commencing April 10th, at 2 o'clock P. M., to continue as long as circumstances shall require.

It will be remembered, that the primary object of this arrangement is the advancement of religion; therefore members of sister churches are requested and expected to attend as convenience may permit.

It is to be hoped, that our churches will coöperate with us in this effort, by their prayers and labors; and may the Head of the Church favor us with his presence and blessing. S. S. GRISWOLD, Sec. of Con.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses; Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

Extract of a Letter from Hon. Wm. Jay to the Author.

"Your analysis of the slave laws is very able, and your exhibition of their practical application by the Southern Courts, evinces great and careful research." "Your book is as impregnable against the charge of exaggeration as Euclid's Geometry, since, like that, it consists of propositions and demonstrations. The book is not only true, but it is unquestionably true."

Miscellaneous.

Remarkable Phenomenon.

The Holmes County (Ohio) Farmer contains a communication from an eye witness of the facts stated therein, which discloses the existence of a rare phenomenon in that part of Ohio. The following extract from the communication explains the character of this curiosity :—

In company with several gentlemen I visited the farm of Sylvanus Purdy, Esq., three miles west of Oxford, on the Mount Vernon road, in Wolf creek valley, for the purpose of examining his newly discovered "gas works," and, to my astonishment, found the following state of facts :—Mr. Purdy's farm lies on the north side of Wolf creek ; the road runs near his house, at the base of the hill ; just below his house the level bottom of the valley begins, and stretches out southward to the creek. Some eight or ten rods south of the house is a curious kind of earth, resembling dark sawdust. The owner, for some years, has been aware of the existence of some wonderful phenomenon. The place on which the discovery has been made, has been cultivated for a number of years, and it has been observed that, in a number of places, everything sown or planted, and all kinds of vegetation, would dwindle and die, and seemingly burn up. After the late rains, the water was discovered to be agitated and to bubble up in several places, which led Mr. Purdy and others to experiment, by collecting a bottle of this gas and setting it on fire, when, the instant a lighted match was touched to it, the vapor ignited, and sent the bottle whizzing through the house. I found the extent of the space from which this igneous or inflammable vapor issues, to be about two and a half rods wide, and fifteen or twenty rods in length ; the soil to the depth of six inches or there-abouts is, as above stated, loose, and resembling dark sawdust ; beneath this is the common clay soil. An examination of this led to the discovery of small holes, about half the size of a man's little finger, out of which this vapor issues. There are undoubtedly many hundreds of these holes in the space above indicated. Into one of these holes Mr. P. thrust a small hollow stick, and upon applying a light the vapor was ignited, and burned throughout the night. This led to a further and more critical examination, when they procured a barrel, and taking out one of the heads, uncovered two of those holes, and placed the barrel over them, and having secured and closed it properly, bored a small hole in the head, and inserted a tin tube ; to this a light was applied, when the vapor was instantly ignited, and has been burning a large, steady, brilliant light, day and night, for nearly two weeks, at the time I am writing. It has no smell, and emits no smoke, but it is about as warm as the heat of a common tallow candle. It looks much like the gas light, is firm, bright, and steady at night, and can be seen for miles up and down the valley. Hundreds have visited the place since the discovery, and as yet no one has been able to account for the phenomenon. It will not smoke glass when held over it, and it is believed to be free from any poisonous substance. It is thought by some that it proceeds from burning stone coal—the hills above the road seeming to favor that idea. But, upon the other hand, it is argued that if it proceeded from such a cause, it would smoke glass, or have an odor. The light is of a bluish color where it is emitted from the tube, but it is of the usual color above that. The earth at these places is somewhat raised above the level of the field, and can be readily distinguished.

Minnesota.

Rev. H. M. Nichols, who is now in Minnesota prospecting for a colony that intend to emigrate from Massachusetts in the Spring, tells some magnificent stories about the country, in letters written to the Northampton Courier. He says the sleighing is excellent, but the air is dry, with no wind to cause any drifts of snow. The clearness and dryness of the atmosphere render the climate favorable to those of a consumptive constitution, and then there is so much electricity in the air that a person cannot feel languid. Speaking of wild fruit, he says :—

"Cranberries, blackberries, strawberries, raspberries, whortleberries, plums, cherries, grapes, crab apples, gooseberries, black currants, black haws, rice and beans, all grow wild, and some of them in the greatest abundance. And besides these, there is the m'do or Dacotah potato, and two species of turnips, which grow wild and are much used by the Indians for food. One of these last named, the tipsinna, or Dacotah turnips, grow in size from year to year, increasing with every summer that passes over it. Apples will flourish here, if grown in the first place in a northern climate, and nurseries are now growing in St. Paul, where persons can supply themselves with grafted trees at a cheap rate. Quinces will do well here, but it is not yet fully proved whether peaches will flourish here or not.

"Melons of all kinds grow luxuriantly ; indeed, the accounts of the vine race are such as to challenge the strongest faith of my Eastern friends. I have it as a sober truth, from a man of veracity, the present Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives, that a squash, raised by himself, grew so large that he was unable to turn it over, and that it required two men to load it into a wagon, rolling it up an inclined plane. Cucumbers have been grown here eight and nine feet long, and pumpkins measuring three feet in diameter.

"Garden vegetables surpass anything ever know at the East. Onions, so large they cannot be put in a flour barrel whole ; cabbages, the solid head two and a half feet in diameter ; beets, six inches in diameter ; carrots, three feet and a half long ; ruta-baga turnips, so large that one will not go into a half bushel. Now I am aware that many of your readers will call this a 'fish story,' and pass it by. I can assure them, however, that these are the statements of sober and truthful men, and are what has actually been done here. Every one cannot do this ; every place will not do it ; but these are real occurrences. And if you don't believe it, come and see."

An Arctic Settlement.—Capt. Penny, the eminent Arctic navigator, has at length succeeded (says The Literary Gazette) in forming a Company for prosecuting the Whale Fishery, and founding a permanent settlement in the Arctic Regions. He designs to employ propellers in whale-fishing in the bays and inlets of Davis' Straits. A Colony is to be founded in the inlet known as Northumberland Inlet, or Hogarth Sound, in about the same latitude as Archangel. In this locality there are not only excellent fishing grounds, but great store of mineral wealth, especially of plumbago. The Company will send out two screw steamers of 500 tuns each, in the spring months, to the seas between Greenland and Nova Zembla, and later in the year the steamers would start for Hogarth Sound, so as to arrive there before August. They would remain there until the ice forms in November, when they would return to England with the produce, leaving settlers to prosecute the inshore fishery, and store up the proceeds until the return of the steamers in the spring.

One of Kosciusko's Wills.

The recent decision in the Supreme Court of the United States of the controversy between the Russian Government and the heirs of Gen. Kosciusko, has reminded us, says the Charlottsville (Va.) Advocate, of the original will of Gen. Kosciusko of the 5th day of May, 1798, now on record in the Clerk's Office of our county, which we publish below. The orthography and punctuation are published literally from the will :—

"I Thaddeus Kosciuszho being just in my departure from America do hereby declare and direct that should I make no other testamentary disposition of my property in the United States I hereby authorize my friend Thomas Jefferson to employ the whole thereof in purchasing Negroes from among his own or any others and giving them liberty in my name, in giving them an education in trades or otherwise and having them instructed for their new condition in the duties of morality which may make them good neighbors good fathers or moders, husbands or vives and in their duties as citizens, teaching them to be defenders of their liberties and Country and of good order of society and in whatsoever may make them happy and useful, and I make the said Thomas Jefferson my executor of this.

"15th day of May 1798. T. KOSCIUSZHO."

Thomas Jefferson, at a Circuit Court held for Albemarle County, the 12th day of May, 1819, refused to take upon himself the burden of the execution of the said will.

Slavery among the Indians.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune writing from Chihuahua, gives the following account of slavery among the Indians :—

Of all the numerous Comanches and Kiowas, whom we met on the Arkansas in the neighborhood of Fort Atkinson and the crossing of the river, there was indeed scarcely one who had not one or several male or female Mexican children with him, whom they themselves boasted of having kidnapped in Mexico, telling us the places where they were from. To conclude from what we saw, there must be, not hundreds, but thousands of Mexicans, most of them of a tender age, in slavery among the Indians of the plains. Others were full-grown men and women, the former entirely barbarians like their Indian masters among whom they had lived from their youth, the latter in some cases a good deal more cultivated on account of their having been kidnapped at a more advanced age, which is never the case with a male captive, full-grown men being always killed when they fall into the hands of these savages. Some of the Mexican men whom we met in this state of captivity looked worn-out and poor, and complained of being ill-treated and not getting food enough, while others declared that they would by no means, even if they could, return to their native country, and confessed that they were themselves used to participate in those horse-stealing and kidnapping expeditions which the Comanches and Kiowas proudly call "campañas," speaking with an expression of cupidity of the "cavallas, mulas, mugersey muchachas," the horses, mules, women and girls, of Mexico. The boys appeared to be gennerally well-treated. Some of them had even been adopted as children by the Indians. An old Kiowa chief who visited our camp, had three boys with him whom he declared to be his children, telling us at the same time that of two of them he was the real father, while he had brought the third one from Mexico in one of his military expeditions. This third boy was evidently kept as well as the two real sons of the old man, and when we asked the chief, as well as the boy, whether they would like to separate in case we should pay him a good price for the boy for the purpose of taking him along with us to his native place, both laughed with a sort of contempt, showing fully that both were as well satisfied with each other as with their situation in general.

The fate of the girls kidnapped in a tender age is even less painful. They are generally brought up by those who capture them to make the wives of their sons. The chiefs visiting our camp with their families, all had Mexican wives. The fate of a full-grown woman falling into the hands of the Indians is often not so easy as this. She seldom escapes violence and brutality.

Slave Auction at Richmond, Va.

The N. Y. Tribune publishes a letter dated Richmond, Va., March 3, 1853, from which we make the following extract :—

I have spent two hours at the public sales of Slaves. There are four of them, and all in the same street, not more than two blocks from the Exchange Hotel, where we are staying. These Slave depots are in one of the most frequented streets of the place, and the sales are conducted in the building on the first floor, and within view of the passers-by. There are small screens behind which the women of mature years are taken for inspection ; but the men and the boys are publicly examined in the open store, before an audience of full one hundred. These examinations are carried on by various persons interested, and are enough to shock the feelings of the most hardened. You really cannot conceive that men in human form could conduct themselves so brutally ; each scar or mark is dwelt upon with great minuteness—its cause, its age, its general effect upon the health, &c., &c., are questions asked and readily answered. I saw full twenty men stripped this morning and not more than three or four of them had what they termed "clean backs," and some of them—I should think full one quarter of them—were scarred with the whip to such an extent as to present a frightful appearance ; one in particular was so cut that I am sure you could not lay your finger on any part of his back without coming in contact with a scar. These scars were from the whip and were from two inches to one foot in length. These marks damaged his sale ; although only about 45 to 50 years old, he only brought $460 ; but for these marks he would have brought $750 to $800.

I saw several children sold ; the girls brought the highest price. Girls from 12 to 18 years old brought from $500 to $800.

I must say that the slaves did not display as much feeling as I expected, as a general thing —but there was one noble exception—God bless her ! and save her too ! ! as I hope he will in some way, for if he does not interpose there were no men there that would.

She was a fine looking woman about 25 years old, with three beautiful children. Her children as well as herself were neatly dressed. She attracted my attention at once on entering the room, and I took my stand near her to learn her answers to the various questions put to her by the traders. One of these traders asked her what was the matter with her eyes ! Wiping away the tears, she replied, "I s'pose I have been crying." Why do you cry ? "Because I have left my man behind, and his master won't let him come along." "Oh, if I buy you, I will furnish you with a better husband, or man as you call him, than your old one." "I don't want any better and won't have any other as long as he lives." "Oh, but you will though, if I buy you." "No, Massa, God helping me, I never will."

Maple Sugar Making.

A meeting of the Farmer's Club was held last week at the rooms of the American Institute, New York, when the Forest Trees of America, and the Power of Vegetation, were the topics for discussion. A paper was read by Mr. Alanson Nash on the Sugar Maple. This tree grows extensively in most parts of North America, and is one of the most useful and ornamental trees on the continent. It seeks a frosty climate, and a rich, strong soil. Its hight is sometimes 100 feet. It usually grows to a hight varying from 40 to 80 feet. It is bushy, therefore an elegant shade tree. It makes the best of fuel. Its great excellence consists in yielding sap for the manufacture of vast quantities of maple sugar in the country during the months of Spring. An open winter, constantly freezing and thawing, is a forerunner of a bountiful crop of sugar. The orchard of maple trees is almost equal to a field of sugar cane of the same area, in the production of sugar. This tree reaches an age of 200 years. The statistics of the United States Census for 1850 show that about 34 millions of lbs. of Maple Sugar were manufactured in that year :—

Maine	97,541	Louisiana	260
New Hampshire	1,392,429	Arkansas	8,825
Massachusetts	763 596	Tennessee	159,647
Vermont	5,159,641	Kentucky	388,525
Connecticut	37,781	Ohio	4,528,548
New York	10,310,784	Michigan	2,423,897
New Jersey	5,886	Indiana	2,921,638
Pennsylvania	2,218,641	Illinois	246,078
Maryland	47,740	Missouri	171,942
Virginia	1,223,908	Mississippi	110
North Carolina	27,448	Iowa	70,684
South Carolina	200	Minnesota	2,950
Georgia	50
Alabama	473	Total	33,776,671

There is a balance of about two million pounds produced by Rhode Island, Texas, Oregon, California, Utah, New Mexico, Delaware, and Florida. The above statement does not include the sugar made by the Indians, east of the Mississippi River, which may be set down at 10,000,000 lbs., and west of that river 2,000,000 lbs.

The Maple Sugar product of the Canadas in 1849 is stated as follows :—

Upper Canada	4,160,667 lbs.
Lower Canada	2,303,168 lbs.

Besides the above Sugar crop, there was a yield by the Sugar Maple in the United States in 1850, of 40,000,000 gallons of Maple Molasses.

Webster on War.

The Burlington (Vt.) Courier, after criticising the political delinquencies and personal faults of Daniel Webster, holds him up as the friend of peace, the enemy of war—in his diplomatic capacity, the international pacificator. And here, it contends, must rest Mr. Webster's best claims to the love and admiration of posterity. His early Christian education, which was always his safest dependence, led his giant, logical mind, to such a conclusion, and induced him to advocate such a policy.

"I concur," said Mr. W., to an advocate of the Peace Cause—"I concur in sentiment with all those who think that improvement in arts, the diffusion of knowledge, and above all the influence of the Christian religion, tend strongly to render war more and more an object of dread and dislike. The peace of the world must be the wish of every good man in it."

Mr. W. always spoke and voted against war. And the negotiation of the Ashburton treaty, or treaty of Washington, and other public acts, gave the right to say what is recorded below.

"Soon after the Ashburton treaty," said Rev. M. Choules, "I was in the State Department, sitting with Mr. Webster, when a Massachusetts gentleman, who had long been in Europe, came in to pay his respects to the Secretary. Alluding to the treaty, he expressed a deep sense of the obligations of Americans abroad for his eminent services in preserving the peace of the country. Mr. Webster thanked him for his kind remarks, and then said : 'Sir, there have been many occasions, while sitting at this table, when I could, by the motion of my hand, have lighted up a war ; but, sir, my duty was perfectly plain. I had only to remember that I was negotiating for a Christian people, with a Christian people, and that we were living in the nineteenth century of the Christian era.' Mr. Webster never uttered a nobler sentiment."

"With the advancement of society," said Mr. Webster soon after the treaty, "and the improvement and diffusion of the means of education, a new and elevated tribunal has come into being, to which the disputes of nations must in all cases be referred. I mean that of public opinion. Nations cannot now go to war unless for grounds and reasons which will justify them in the general judgment of mankind. The influence of civilization, the increase of knowledge, the extension of commerce, and, more than all, that heavenly light which beams over all Christendom, restrain nations from gratifying an inordinate ambition by the bloody scenes of war. It has been truly said, that every peace arrangement is a tribute to Christianity, and a new proof of the benign influences of the Christian faith."

Dressing Furs.

We find the following description of one process by which Ladies' Muffs are manufactured in London, in a magazine before us :—

"The workmen are ranged in tubs along the sides of an apartment, or shed, or any kind of outhouse, in a yard, or some secluded spot in London. Every tubber, with the exception of those who may be unwell, and who may then wear a loose sort of jacket, which, however, tells against the efficiency and rapidity of his work, is altogether naked ! The tub in which the man works reaches up to the waist, and a thick yellowish cloth is thrown over its top, which the workman keeps every now and then gathering about him, and which he can draw around like a bag, so that, while at his labor, the upper part of his person alone is visible. To a stranger, the effect of a visit to such a workshop—to which it is not easy to gain admission—is startling. Pale, brown, and often hirsute men, move up and down in their tubs, stamping and alternating their feet with little cessation ; sometimes in silence, and in many cases with little or no expression in their faces. Each of these men are 'tubbing,' that is, treading or stamping, first upon one foot, and then on the other, on the skins which are the complements of his tub. These skins are for the supply of the furriers who employ the master skin-dressers. There is no water or any other fluid used in tubbing, but the fleshy part of the skins are all buttered, and with the cheapest butter or scrapings, and in some places rancid butter, when such things are purchaseable in sufficient quantity. Saw-dust is used, which gives the butter a firmer tread, and tends to aid, by its friction, in scouring the skins. Upon these tubbed skins, so prepared, the man treads, and the perspiration which sometimes pours from him, is considered better and readier for the cure of the skins than any butter or other fatty compound, which are looked upon as merely auxiliary to what oozes from the workman's body. And in this way men's sweat is forced for hours together into the skinny parts of the furs which are to be ladies' muffs, boas, and tippets."

Gerrit Smith's Nurse.

Among the good men of our land, of whom it is no flattery to speak well, there is one, named above, whose memory will be embalmed in the living hearts of thousands when he is dead. He is distinguished as much by the attachment of those who have become acquainted with him, as he is by his personal dignity and simplicity of character. An incident occurred during the late canvass, that resulted in his election to Congress, which is so characteristic of the man, and so touching, that it is deemed worthy of record.

After an address at the town hall in Mexico, N. Y., while the audience were slowly dispersing, Gerrit Smith might have been seen standing on the platform or in the desk, exchanging salutations with his numerous friends. Slowly pressing through the crowd, anxious to speak with him, there came an aged woman, poorly clad, with tottering step, bowed with infirmity, and apparently fatigued.

She reached out to him her trembling hand, exclaiming, "Mr. Smith, I came a good ways to hear you speak to-night. I walked all the way from Pulaski, just to be at this meeting."

"Indeed ! mother," said he, "why should you take so much pains to hear me ? I don't know that I ever had the pleasure of seeing you before."

"O yes, you have," she rejoined, "my name is Babcock. When you was a little infant, I was your nurse, and carried you in my arms many a time." The tears stood in her eyes as she added, "I have kissed you many and many a time, when you was a baby."

"My dear old nurse !" said the great hearted man, "and you shall kiss me again," stooping toward her low bending form, while the tears fell fast and free. And there they stood like little children, or rather mother and child, her withered arms about his neck, and his manly form subdued and bent with tenderness—the poor old nurse in her tattered garb, and the man of princely wealth, and generous feelings equal thereunto.

The lecture had been mighty by its impressions ; but the gushing tear that burst from many an eye that night, wore a much deeper channel in the heart than all his eloquence. To those who know him, it is unnecessary to add the detail of his action on the following day, that placed within the reach of the long unknown nurse many comforts she lacked.

The Potato Disease.

Mr. Chauncey E. Goodrich, of Utica, lately communicated to The Utica Gazette some well compacted essays on the Potato. His leading ideas are that the Potato, being a native of a mountainous tropical region (part way up the Andes) requires for its perfection a long, cool, moderately damp, reasonably uniform season, and inevitably degenerates in our capricious climate, if propagated (as is usual) from the edible tubers formed underground. Gradually enfeebled in constitution by our rapid alternations from intensely hot, dry to cold and damp, together with our forcing, over-stimulating culture, with a view to large crops, it has at length fallen a victim to a disease whose immediate incitement is a cold, wet chill, or a hot, damp rust or blight. Unusual and ungenial weather always precedes and causes the rot, and no worm or insect is the usual cause of that calamity.

Mr. Goodrich's remedies may be summed up thus : Avoid late planting, which subjects the growing tuber to the malign influence of the chilly nights and storms of September. Cultivate seedlings extensively, especially those from varieties recently imported from the native clime of the Potato. (He instances the 'Rough Purple Chili' as the best of the new varieties.) But do not rely on any established varieties, and go on replanting its tubers from year to year ; for the disease has not passed away—on the contrary, it has become permanent, and will be more or less prevalent from year to year in different localities, according to the weather. We must be perpetually planting the healthiest balls, produced from the newest and hardiest varieties, and then replanting the potatoes thus produced for seedlings, as but one in a large number of new varieties usually proves valuable. The importation of healthy and primitive varieties must also be vigorously persisted in. Such is nearly the substance of Mr. Goodrich's essays.

Cold in the Rocky Mountains.—A letter from Fort Laramie, written in January, says that the winter in the mountains was accounted by the oldest trappers and traders as the coldest, within their memory, ever experienced in that region. The whites about the fort remained confined as much as possible within the houses, while the Indians left their lodges only when absolute necessity drove them out in quest of food. A number of cattle belonging to the fort had perished from the cold, and some time in November two young gentlemen from Canada, who had journeyed to the Rocky Mountains for pleasure, and had taken quarters in the fort, were frozen to death. They had imprudently ventured abroad during a snow-storm, and it appeared became bewildered and unable to retrace their steps ; their bodies were found on the ensuing day, six miles only from the fort, frozen through. The snow is said to have fallen in great quantities, the storm lasting, with intermissions, almost a whole month.

The Slave-Market at Memphis.

A correspondent of the Chicago Daily Times gives the following description of some things he saw at Memphis :—

"I landed at this place Christmas morning. The first thing that met my eye, standing on a high bank facing the river, was the following inscription in large letters, upon a fine building, with piazza and pillars in front : 'Bolton, Dickens & Co., Slave Dealers.' In addition to this, I soon found two others on one of the principal streets in the city, situated nearly opposite to each other. The sign of one reads thus : 'Byrd Hill, Slave Market ;' the other, 'Ben Little, Slave Market and Livery Stable.' I visited them, and was invited to 'walk in and look at the stock.' Oh ! how my whole being recoiled at the thought. There were men and women, girls and boys, of almost every shade of complexion, ranging in age from ten to thirty or forty, all well dressed, as you see no other slaves, except some favored body servants. Some of the best looking young women were attired in beautiful de laine, made in the fashion too. When a stranger goes in, they are quickly arranged upon seats on either side of the room, and they watch with interest any one they suppose intends to buy. Of course, you can examine teeth, limbs, &c., and call for any exercises from them you choose. They are taken out every day and walked around in a large circle—the men and boys under one leader and the females under another. I was not permitted to look into their place of confinement for the night, but only saw the grated window. Near by are horses and mules for sale, and they are fat and sleek, because in the market. For the same reason were these men and women well dressed.

VARIETY.

A fish, peculiar to Surinam, called anibleps, has the front, or corner of the eye, shaped like the two sides of a glass prism ; the pupil is therefore divided, horizontally, in the middle ; one half being adapted for seeing in the air, and the other in the water. These singular fishes run out of the deep water into the slimy banks of the river, in quest of a species of worm, which form their principle sustenance ; in doing which their bodies are necessarily half out of the water. Thus, while searching in the mud with the lower division of their eyes, with the upper they keep a vigilant watch on their constant enemies, the birds of prey.

A cabbage will throw out, during its growth, in the form of insensible vapor, half its weight of water. A sun-flower, not more than three feet high, threw off two pounds of water in one day. A sprig of mint weighing 27 grains, threw out 2,543 grains of water in 77 days, a little more than 33 grains per day, and a sprig of night-shade, weighing forty-nine grains, threw off 3,700 grains in the same time, or more than 48 grains per day. It has been calculated that an acre of land growing 640 trees, eight inches in diameter, will throw off, through their leaves, 3,875 gallons of water in 12 hours.

A singular crime has just come to light in the little principality of Lippe Schaumburg. A country gentleman of large property in that principality died, leaving one daughter and two sons. The daughter, who was heiress to the greatest part of the property, soon after disappeared, no one knew whither, and consequently the two brothers became sole heirs of the estate. Now, after the lapse of some 15 or 20 years, accident has brought to light the fact, that the daughter still lives, and has been kept imprisoned by her two inhuman brothers during all this time in a cellar. The matter has already come into the courts, and the monsters will get their deserts.

Hon. Alvah Hunt was recently initiated into the White Heron Totem of the Iroquois, by the name of Wan-nis-he-yo—"The Beautiful Day." There were present to perform the interesting ceremony, two Chiefs of the Cayugas, two of the Onondagas, two warriors of the latter tribe, an aged Chief of the Oneidas, and his colleague, with two warriors and two interpreters. This honor was conferred in testimony of gratitude for the services of Mr. Hunt, in preventing the remnant of the Cayugas from being driven from their homes. The scene is described as one of high and romantic interest.

Mr. McAlpine estimates that it would require two double track railroads from Albany to Buffalo, to do the business which the Erie canal did last year, and that those roads would cost fifty millions of dollars. He also estimates that it would require nine railroad tracks to do the business which the enlarged Erie canal could do, and such tracks would cost nearly one hundred and twenty millions of dollars.

In Meurs, a Prussian town near Dusseldorf, an aged Jewess died on the 8th ult. She was born there in 1746, and had consequently reached the age of 107 years. On the first of the same month, at another town called Humme, Miriam Goldstein died still older, having been born at Metz, May 11, 1742—making her nearly 110 years of age.

Rev. Dr. Scudder, the eminent servant of Christ, and veteran missionary, writes that his sigh is fast failing. He is thankful that it is not his voice, or both sight and voice. If he cannot see, he can still preach the Gospel. He may yet be known in the annals of the church as the "Blind Missionary." "Thy will, O Father, be done !"

DEDICATION OF CHILDREN.

BY WILLIAM M. FAHNESTOCK, M. D.

Its Propriety.

From the foregoing remarks on the Nature of the institution under consideration, it will be seen, that I do not claim for children dedicated unto the Lord, actual membership in the visible church of God, other than children derive from the atonement of Christ Jesus imputed to them before they arrive at years of maturity, and willfully transgress in their own bodies; that I do not claim any special rights or privileges for them, other than the care and guardianship of the church; and that I do not entertain any affinity whatever for "infant baptism"—not the most distant concord with it, nay, not even sympathy enough to tolerate it; for I not only regard it as a perversion, but a wanton, a flagrant, and a most dangerous perversion, of a simple and beautiful rite, instituted by the precious Redeemer, and adapted, peculiarly adapted, to the state and condition of children, and equally harmonizing with the wants of the sanctified nature of earthly parents.

In my paper on Motherheart, which gave rise to the present extended exposition—(feeling that I had no right to decline giving a reason, and full reasons, for the faith I profess, when called upon publicly, as I have been in this instance, and especially when in reference to a point assumed by me, even if only, as then, incidentally introduced)—I attempted, and I trust successfully, to educe the philosophy of the natural longings of the regenerate heart for consecrated association of their offspring; and pointed at the sad perversion of the touching and endearing rite instituted to meet this want of the regenerate heart. In further exposition of its claims to a place in the Gospel economy—the visible kingdom—I now proceed to exhibit its relevancy from the nature of the institution and the wants of sanctified human nature.

It has, very correctly, been observed by a distinguished writer, Brown, that "Christ came not to curtail the privileges of his church, but to enlarge them;" and as children were placed in covenant relation with their parents under the old dispensation, he certainly would not, he did not, destroy, utterly destroy, a privilege so well adapted to the wants of the parental breast, and one so well calculated to promote the child's eternal welfare, although he saw proper to change the aspect of the institution, which could only correspond with a covenant of works—the ministration of death—and instituted a new mode of receiving our tender offspring unto himself, by a rite better suited to their condition, and one more appropriate to the new and better covenant—the perfected covenant of grace.

In no part of the Redeemer's code has he required us to steel our hearts against the tender claims of our children, or to put an embargo on the legitimate manifestation of deep concern for their spiritual interests. Jesus was no stoic; he was fashioned, as a man, after our own nature, that he might be touched with a feeling of our infirmities; and when the mistaken disciples rudely repulsed and rebuked the persons who sought the Saviour's blessing on their children, He recognized that want of the human heart, and established, thereupon, this means of approach, to bring their offspring unto him, and thus to dedicate them, and place them under the care of his church, of which he is the ever-living Head. After giving the precept to "suffer little children to come unto me"—suffer them to be brought—he gave the formula, not of sprinkling water, but the laying on of hands and prayer. I repeat, that I do not claim for this rite any thing like constituting them members of the visible church; yet it cannot be disputed, that it recognizes them as lambs of the flock, by the express declaration of the Head of the Church, calling them to his fold, and sealing them with his seal of recognition—his blessing—his mode, and his seal of recognition for little children. "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God. And he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them." Mark 10: 14 and 16. Dr. Clarke truly remarks: "Christ loves little children, because he loves simplicity and innocence; he has sanctified their very age, by passing through it himself—the Holy Jesus was once a little child;"[*] and, again, the same writer, in another place, says: "Jesus Christ loves little children; and they are objects of his peculiar care. Who can account for their continual preservation and support, while exposed to so many dangers, but on the ground of a peculiar and extraordinary providence."[†] I wish to be understood, distinctly, that I do not claim it as a covenant rite, nor as a federal rite, (much as that position would make for my cause,) unless Christ be regarded as the federal head, and it depend not upon the frail, earthly parent; for I confess that I have too little confidence in the "federal holiness" of human nature to predicate any reliance on it, or attach any confidence whatever to an arm of flesh; even when, as I have heard it claimed by a distinguished church dignitary, "that his hands were connected by the three-chorded golden chain of apostolic succession, with the throne of heaven, and that when he laid his hands upon them, they would feel the Holy Spirit descending and abiding upon them." I not only repudiate but deprecate such mummery, such blasphemous mummery. Christ was sufficient, and the only one sufficient; and while the fullness of the Godhead bodily dwelt in him, He, in his wisdom, appointed this mode of approach and recognition for little children, to become associated with the family of the redeemed.

It will also be readily perceived, that I do not regard this rite as an absolute ordinance, but as a mere ceremony for the public recognition of a most exalted privilege; for I look upon it only in the light of a privilege, and as bearing the same relation that many other of the most gracious privileges, which have been bestowed on the followers of the lowly Jesus, do—privileges which are regarded as very periapts of spiritual life. By referring to the definitions and explanations of terms, in my preliminary remarks, the reader can almost anticipate my argument for himself. A cursory application of some of those definitions and explanations, together with a few comments, may elucidate the subject more satisfactorily to persons not fully acquainted with the bearing of those matters.

Laying aside the term ordinance, as not legitimately applicable to the rite now under consideration, I would remind the reader, that a rite is not an ordinance, but simply a solemn act of religion—the manner of performing religious service, or solemn service established by law, precept, or custom. I, therefore, turn to notice it as a privilege—the distinguished favor of approaching unto the Lord, and the peculiar right of appropriating unto ourselves all and every mode of his own appointing, connected with his means of grace, and adapted to our capacity and condition, "whereby God not only comes near to us, but we draw near to him." Circumcision was the sign or seal of a nation. If Baptism is its substitute, it would likewise be a sign or seal to some one nation, to whom was committed the New Covenant; but Baptism is unto all nations, as "the answer of a good conscience towards God," and as a simple sign or seal of recognition, or embracing the Gospel, and confessing Christ to be the Messiah; for in apostolic times it was administered to all who confessed that Jesus was the Christ, and sought admission into his kingdom. It may seem strange to some persons, yet it is nevertheless the fact, that the only confession required by the apostles was, "Believest thou that Jesus is the Christ?" And to this end John says: "These (his gospel) are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God."[*] Baptism, therefore, instead of coming in the place of a national seal, is the sign of all nations who enlist under the banner of the Cross, and prove loyal to the Captain of their salvation—the ratification of the New Covenant, embracing all "nations, tongues, and kindred," when all the conditions shall be complied with by man. Circumcision was esteemed a covenanting rite—a federal rite—to the children of Israel, as a national seal, to be inflicted on unconscious babes; and consistent with the same, the Passover was regarded in the same light, and the unconscious babes were, in like manner, forced to partake of the Passover. To be consistent, those who advocate Baptism as the substitute for Circumcision, ought to insist upon having the Communion administered to them also. This many of the Pædobaptists would consider a monstrous perversion; but, certainly, no greater, or no more monstrous, than the perversion of Baptism in substituting sprinkling for immersion, and unconscious babes for believers. To be consistent, I repeat, they must follow the first ordinance by the second; and this obtained, and was strenuously advocated for many centuries, as attested by Mosheim, Bingham, Waterland, Gieseler, and others without number. But unfortunately there is no consistency in the conceptions of the most distinguished Pædobaptist writers respecting "infant baptism;" or, what is equally difficult, we can scarcely find one, even of the most prominent among them, consistent with himself; which has been frequently wielded, and with much success, against the Protestant Church, by Roman Catholic writers, and especially by Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, in his History of the Variations of the Protestant Churches.

Mr. Helfenstein and Dr. Kurtz are right in regarding the atonement of the Redeemer as covering the imputed sins of our first parents, and as making little children partakers of the blessings of redemption, while they remain in their innocency, (I ought to have said children of believing parents, for that is their belief;) and therefore, while I repudiate the administration of a mutilated ordinance to recognize that relation, under the Gospel, I do think, and think most solemnly, that we have no right to refuse or delay a formal acceptance of that kind and gracious provision; for I consider that every one who has experienced the transforming love of the blessed Saviour, and has professed to be a follower of the lowly Jesus, is under the greatest obligations to show forth his or her thankfulness for so wise and so excellent a provision to meet this want of our own breasts. It is a high and blessed privilege, which should, unquestionably, draw out our hearts in gratitude to our Heavenly Parent, the giver of every good and perfect gift, and prompt us to go up to the Sanctuary with every pledge of love the Father of Mercies commits to the keeping of earthly parents.

In connection with this matter I most unhesitatingly declare, that I reject the theological idea of original sin, as an imputed sin, bearing the penalty of the original transgression of our first parents, on all the sons and daughters of every succeeding generation, till the end of time; for which sin they remain under condemnation, unless regenerated, even before having volition to sin, or capacity to accept means of redemption. It is this latter doctrine, this horrible doctrine, for I can not regard it in any other light, which introduced and has maintained, with so much pertinacity, the perverted institution of "infant baptism," after that "philosophy," founded on the mystery of iniquity, which began to work even in the days of the apostles, had become concocted and embraced, partially, and this mutilated rite—this mummery—was presented as a regenerating panacea. But while I reject the theological idea of original sin, still I have no desire to reject the scriptural idea of the depravity and corruption of human nature; which I confess and advocate on all proper occasions. I regard human nature corrupt through the transgression of Adam—tainted with tendency to sin, and to sin continually, so soon as human nature comes into active relation or reaction with the material world and in contact with spiritual iniquity—just so prone as the sparks to fly upward; but I likewise think that sin and transgression can only attach, under the Gospel, through volition, absolute personal perpetration of sin. While I acknowledge that the imprecation of God's displeasure rested on all flesh, under the ancient dispensation, yet I regard that the atonement of Christ, under the better covenant, restored man to a better condition, until by his own personal rebellion, in casting off the gracious overtures of the Redeemer, and by his own voluntary, responsible act, he declares that he will not have Him to rule over him, he thus makes himself an alien and a stranger to the covenant of promise. My reasoning, in a word, for I must be very brief on this point, (for it is simply an opinion, and cannot affect the validity or the propriety of the rite under consideration,) is on this wise: If by the act of the first Adam, sin entered the world, and condemnation passed upon all men, so by the atonement (the at-one-ment) of the second Adam, Jesus Christ, we are all made alive—made susceptible, generally, not specially, to divine and spiritual influences—brought into harmony with the principles of the gospel, and imbued with power to accept the benign provisions which are to perfect newness of life in our fallen nature. From whence the infant race of man fell, through the common head of the human family, to a somewhat similar position, save the taint, the inherent taint—tendency to sin—Christ's atonement restores the unconscious infant—the child of man; and, in that sense, he declares, explicitly, "Of such is the kingdom of God." Christ's redemption was fully equivalent to Adam's fall—yet conditional. As the race fell with Adam, and became dead to all good, so with Christ man is made alive—restored to capacity to receive spiritual good, and be moulded by the truths of the Gospel. Therefore, infants need no baptism to regenerate them, for they are regenerated by Christ; and therefore they become proper subjects to be publicly dedicated unto the Lord, to obtain the immediate position of his redemption, and to be placed under circumstances for spiritual development, and be restrained from evil influences. While I cannot see the least propriety of administering a rite not imposed by lawful authority, and not appropriate to the subject, yet that does not militate against one appointed by the Master, and every way suited to the purpose, as a proper manifestation of obedience on our part, to bring our offspring under holy influence, by associating them with the family of the redeemed.

And why, I ask, should not this privilege be enjoyed; nay, why should not all Christians esteem it a special favor, and a bounden duty, thus to dedicate their children to so gracious a Redeemer? The Lord's Supper I have shown to be more an exalted privilege than a duty. Are we not to embrace any and every distinguished favor, "whereby God not only comes near to us, but we draw near to him," unless forced to do so by commandment, by absolute injunction? Then should we enjoy but a moiety of the exalted privileges vouchsafed unto the disciples of Jesus; who, while he preferred mercy to sacrifice, yet has provided abundant means of grace—numerous opportunities to approach the Mercy Seat; and connected with some of them, as with the rite under consideration, the tenderest incentives and legitimate motives to obedience. Shall we not, then, avail ourselves of all the gracious promises of grace and comfort appointed unto us? And is not the bringing of little children unto the Lord, to place them under his patronage, for he alone is our "Patron," and under the guardianship of his church, a peculiarly appropriate manifestation for all the disciples who have been entrusted with the responsibility of bringing up children "in the nurture and the admonition of the Lord?" I think so, most unquestionably; for I maintain, that whatever is dedicated unto the Lord, agreeably to his express precept and formula, should ever abide under the special care and guardianship of the church. I repeat, that the dedication of children rests on the same platform with many of the other acknowledged means of grace; and why make invidious distinctions? and, still more, why distort so simple and so appropriate a rite, and substitute, to say the least of it, a most questionable one? Prayer, I have already shown, Dr. Dwight regards "the method Nature points out for obtaining blessings from God;" and this bringing our children unto the Lord, and dedicating them unto his praise, is the instinct, if I may so express it, of the regenerate heart. It is part of a man's renewed, sanctified constitution; and if we disregard it or neglect it, we do despite to our own spirits, and inflict damage on our offspring; and thereby dishonor our gracious Master; who has afforded his followers this fitting opportunity, by this touching rite, to harmonize our inherent wants with his wise and liberal provision—a beautiful, as it is a grateful, correspondence between his proffered protection and blessing to our little ones, and our own deep convictions of the necessity of a higher power to guide them through the mazes of life, and secure their safety against the snares of the Tempter here below.

I have not space to argue this point, and must, therefore, be satisfied to state my firm conviction, that a child solemnly dedicated unto God, cannot but feel its influence through life, if the parent follow it up by his own duty, faithfully and indefatigably. Neither have I much space to show, that such great privileges bestowed, bestowed freely, impose the duty on the parent. The Scriptures are full of admonitions in respect to the relation we sustain to our children; and not only full of admonitions, but replete with encouragements to the discharge of that duty. It must suffice to adduce one or two scriptural injunctions. "These words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thy heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and talk of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up."[*] "Ye shall command your children to do all the words of this law."[†] "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."[‡] The privilege of approaching the Mercy Seat in devout supplication, imposes the duty of prayer and thanksgiving; the privilege of reading the Word of God, imposes the duty of careful perusal, meditation, and examination of its sacred contents; the privilege of hearing of the preached word, imposes the duty of waiting on the regular ministry of the Word of Truth; the privilege of praising God "in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs," imposes the duty of engaging in this solemn exercise—in all of which "God not only comes near to us, but we draw near to him." In like manner, the privilege of bringing our children unto him, after his own precept and formula, imposes the duty as imperatively upon our consciences, or at least ought to do so, if we are not derelict to consistent duty, and turn a deaf ear to righteous convictions. Certainly, the same motives which prompt the observance of the other means of grace, ought to impel us to the discharge of this tender obligation; for I not only urge it as a simple duty, but as an obligation, accruing from the nature of the favor. Circumcision made us "debtors to the law;" this delicate institution makes us "debtors to grace," under the Gospel. Our indebtedness to grace divine constrains, yea, requires us, to accept and embrace, cordially, every overture of divine Beneficence, and to implicitly obey every injunction, and every intimation of duty, especially when that intimation is followed by an example or pattern. As followers of the lowly Jesus, it becomes our bounden duty, with every opportunity, to magnify and honor every one of his acts and institutions; and what so natural and so endearing—what so appropriate and so consonant with the gushing exercises of the regenerate heart, as duly attending to this gracious privilege—the privilege of taking our children to the tender Jesus for his blessing? How should it warm all our souls, and all that is within us, humbly to acknowledge his appointment of this delicate and truly assimilatory rite, to associate parent and child in spiritual interests—in eternal hopes? How much is it calculated to quiet our anxious perturbations of mind on the uncertainty of our children's destiny, when wholly without consecrated association—our natural concern to be assured of their being included in the great salvation of Christ; and, so far as lies in our power, to certify ourselves of having placed them within the Redeemer's recognized means of safety. And if it be deemed too overweening on our part, when we regard the salvation of infants secured by the general atonement of Christ, to desire any act of ours to secure it, I remark, that as all blessings are communicated through certain appointed means, it is necessary that we should comply with every requirement of those appointed means—those intimated terms—as a free-will offering of the heart, to one who has been so exceedingly gracious, to obtain their full benefit. So great a privilege demands a ready compliance with every legitimate mode of manifesting our acceptance of the boon for our children. Dr. Waterland, in some excellent comments on being prepared to partake worthily of the Eucharists, pertinently remarks: "It has been thought somewhat strange, by those who have imbibed wrong notions of the case, that all Christian privileges should be supposed to follow a single duty, when they really belong to a whole system of duties. But when it is considered, that these privileges are never conceived to be annexed to a single duty, in any other view, or upon any other supposition, but as it virtually carries in it all duty, the main difficulty will vanish; for it may still be true, that those Christian privileges go along with the whole system of duties, and with nothing short of it."[*] The same writer says: "The comparative value of any duties, depends not upon their positive or moral nature, but upon their relation to or connection with the general good of the whole rational system, taken in its largest compass, both of extent and duration."[†] So until the privilege of dedicating our children is embraced, all our duty cannot be performed—an important item of duty remains to be fulfilled; it must be regarded and complied with, to complete the band, the cement of all our duties, before we may claim all blessings to descend upon us.

But while distinguished privileges roll an amount of duty and obligation upon us, which cannot be disregarded or rejected without peril, the example of the Master does infinitely more. By referring, again, to my preliminary remarks, it will be seen, that example is a precedent for our imitation; that examples have a peculiar power above naked precepts; that they most clearly express to us the nature of our duties; that example, by secret and lively incentive, urges us to imitation. A distinguished writer, Richard Watson, asserts expressly, (and it may be well to remark, that it is the first sentence of his chapter on Baptism,) that "the obligation of baptism rests upon the example of our Lord, who, by his disciples, baptized many, that by his discourses and miracles were brought to profess faith in him as the Messias."[‡] Dr. Dwight as distincly declares, that the example of the Saviour renders prayer a binding law. "Christ, as is well known, says he, lived a life of continual and extraordinary prayer. * * * This example, you know, is not only a pattern, and a motive, but a law, also, binding us with divine authority."[†] And Professor Pictet, of Geneva, Switzerland, resorts, falsely, to the force of example, (knowing the force of example,) as his sole reliance for the observation of the first day of the week as "Lord's day," while he acknowledges that the apostles have left no command to sanctify it. "Let it be observed, (says that writer,) that the Sabbath was abolished, with other ceremonies of the law, and in the place of it succeeded the 'Lord's day;' which the apostles did not expressly command, but which they observed; whose example, therefore, the church is bound to imitate, although one day is not in itself holier than another."[‖] In this way we often find, among great and learned men, quasi—spurious—example assumed to sustain a mutilated or perverted rite or ordinance, while they wholly disregard the express precepts and explicit examples of the only legitimate power to prescribe injunctions or ordain religious examples. If Christ's example makes prayer and baptism laws unto us, why not this example of bringing little children unto him of as binding force? For he gave the precept first, and then the precise formula for our imitation. It is truly singular to what shifts men will resort to stretch an assumption, and to what subterfuges others fly to evade the plain truth which does not chime with their predilections. It would be an easy matter to fill the whole paper with illustrations of this nature, but I must pass on with the remark, that they can infer any thing, however incongruous and contradictory, as truth and duty, and dispatch, yea, decapitate, any obligation, as easily, by inferring it to be a nullity.

After this fashion precept and example are turned aside for inference. When will man learn the force of example? The law of example has yet to be written. It would occupy entirely too much space even to glance at it in this place; it must, therefore, suffice to say, that much metaphysical fume has been exhausted on hair-spliting vagaries, while the source of practical duty, arising from the express examples of the legitimate, the only legitimate Exemplar, is neglected, shamefully neglected. The blessed Redeemer, who spake as man never spake, and who understood as man never understood, understood the workings of the human mind, and all its psychological relations, better, nay, ten thousand times better, than the countless legions of quirking philosophers who preceded and who have followed him, and who have ever made themselves ridiculous by attempting to be wise above the Written Word. He (Christ) not only understood the general workings of the human mind, but he, who formed and fashioned all our members, understood well which faculty of the mind is first brought into activity, and the importance of using that faculty to his own highest purposes. That faculty is, confessedly, the faculty of Imitation. The first apprehension of the infant mind is the cognizance of the actions of others, and its first monitions are exhibited in its efforts to imitate what it perceives done by others. This is a fundamental in the constitution of the human mind, which ought not ever to be overlooked in any system or species of education. Levison correctly observes:

> "When we reflect on the multiplicity of ideas which are acquired by children without any kind of direct tuition, we must conclude that there is an innate faculty of imitation, which acts with more a less energy, and educates itself (as most of our affections do) from an inherent impulse. Imitation may be excited by all the feelings and sentiments; and we shall soon perceive, that however indispensable this faculty is, it is liable to certain aberrations, unless controlled by a good organization, or early regulated by education.
> "The organ of Imitation is situated on each side of Benevolence, and, from its natural tendency, might be designated the 'mimic power,' as it is this same faculty which gives to children a language of natural expression long before they acquire the least knowledge of artificial sounds (verbal language): and, in this manner they comprehend physiognomical signs, even when they do not understand the words which orally represent them; as, for example, the nod of the head as an affirmative; and the lateral shake as the negative. They also evidently distinguish between the frown of anger and the smile of appropriation, as they intuitively shrink back at the exhibition of the former, and are attracted by the pleasing impression of the latter.
> "It is also the imitative instinct which enables the deaf and dumb to express, by the powerful aid of natural language, the various feelings and sentiments, and this with such a nice discrimination of the many shades of affections which the different faculties are susceptible of impressing, under various degrees of excitement, as is far superior to the parrot-like repetition of words with which most people express the same sentiments and feelings."[*]

This first developed faculty of the human mind, which is certainly educated by example, is designed to lead us to embrace, submissively, without questioning the behest of the Most High, the teachings of his economy, as manifested in ordinances and rites, whether truly exhibited to our visual organs, or discovered in his Word—the lamp to our feet and the light to our path. The abuse of this faculty is seen, on leaving the explicit examples of the legitimate Exemplar, and following the perverted examples of false teachers, shrouded in the smoke of a superstitious age; and which they were brought to revere irrespective of an express injunction from proper authority; and thus imbibe and practice the most absurd vagaries and childish mummeries ever palmed on man, when set before them by venerated dignitaries. And it is thus that example, for evil or good, moulds and controlls the popular movements in religion as well as in politics. The sanctimonious air of a popular prelate, may set up or overthrow almost any doctrine or practice that he may advocate or question, when accompanied with a devout example and the confident expression of sincere faith. The more showy the religion—the more it is made up of externals—the more popular it becomes, until their illusion becomes apparent. Mankind can imitate better than they can cogitate, and deduce the why and the wherefore of their belief—can follow an example, placed before their eyes, better than analyze and test its truth. Mankind are swayed infinitely more by the authority of example than they are by inductive reasoning. Therefore, when the parental breast is alive to a deep solicitude for the spiritual welfare of their offspring, and being cognizant to the union of parent and child, under the ancient dispensation, they look for a like provision for them under the New Covenant, naturally, and I may say properly, (for our precious Saviour would not have us do such violence to our renewed affections as to disregard their eternal welfare or be satisfied without some token of consecrated association of eternal destiny,) look for an opportunity to manifest their internal sense of good and propriety, and not finding a legitimate one exercised by the Church, prefer to embrace a perverted, a mutilated one, rather than suffer the deprivation of any expression. This explains the prevalent practice of "infant baptism" throughout the "christianized" world; and thus it is, that the example of that perversion recommends itself to the warmest feelings of the masses, regardless of the absence of any divine warrant for it.

How then can we excuse ourselves for neglecting the observance of this endearing rite? And how can man justify himself for foisting a mutilated, perverted ordinance, without the slightest precept or the most distant example, when a proper one is provided for him by the Master? When will man learn to regard the behest of the only Lawgiver in Zion, and obey implicity his express examples? How can conscientious men resist so strong an appeal to their quickened sensibilities, and become so indifferent, so steeled, to such a touching rite, which unites parent and child in consecrated association? How can a father, or a mother, restrain a child from the blessings vouchsafed to that offspring by the precious Redeemer?

The rite I am advocating is a double privilege—an endearing privilege to the parent, and an efficacious blessing to the child. I need not illustrate how it is a privilege to the parent, for every renewed heart must feel, feel deeply, how great a privilege it must be, to be certified of having his offspring in consecrated association with him, under the pledged smiles of the Lord.

I might enumerate scores of incentives, and detail numberless motives, to commend this tender rite; but as I am admonished by the extent of my article to draw it to a close, I shall only add, that the strongest evidence of its propriety will be found in the simple observance of it. It will speak a thousandfold more potently to a congregation than whole pages of argument or persuasion. Horace truly says:—

> "Segnius irritant animos demissa per aurem
> Quam qua sant oculis subjecta fidelibus."

If a Pastor, who may doubt its propriety in theory, will make the practical experiment a few times, he will soon become convinced, not only of its propriety, but of its efficient instrumentality against that hydra-headed monster, Pædobaptism—will find it to be the most efficacious weapon that can be wielded against that flagrant error. And as it may be a new ceremony to him at first, I will volunteer a suggestion to aid him on the occasion. After his regular service, let him come down from the pulpit, read the passages in Matthew and Mark, already sufficiently pointed out, invite persons forward who desire to dedicate their children to the Lord, and while they are going forward, have the following hymn sung:—

1 The gentle Saviour calls
  Our children to his breast;
He folds them in his gracious arms,
  Himself declares them blest.

2 "Let them approach," he cries,
  "Nor scorn their humble claim;
The heirs of heaven are such as these,
  For such as these I came."

3 Gladly we bring them, Lord,
  Devoting them to thee,
Imploring that, as we are thine,
  Thine may our offspring be.
